Lord Justice Scrutton.—This case raises an interesting question with regard to the effect of the knowledge by a shipper of the route by which it is intended to convey his goods on a ship. Mr. Frenkel, a merchant carrying on business in London and in Malaga, sues the MacAndrews Line, a very well known line which has carried on a trade between the British Isles and Spain and Portugal for over 50 years, for the loss of some oil which he shipped on a vessel of the line at Malaga. It appears that the MacAndrews Line has for years run its out-and-home voyage in this way. It does not call at every port out and home. In the slack season, if it has cargo for a small port it may go in, and if there is cargo there to be taken it may take it for England, but by the route that it will go on, on its outward voyage as far as it goes, and then return, not calling at the port at which it has picked up the cargo for England. On the other hand, the ship may sometimes not call at the port on the outward half of the round voyage, but call at it as she comes home. There appears to be a perfectly well recognized way of advertising in the local papers and describing the voyage in the shipping card according to whether the cargo is taken on board on the outward half of the round voyage or on the inward half. If the steamer is then on the outward half of its round voyage and takes cargo for England, the route will be described as "via Levante," by the east coast of Spain, meaning that it is on its outward voyage and will turn round and bring the cargo home when it has got to the end of its outward half of the round voyage. On the other hand, if it picks up the cargo on the second half of the round voyage, the inward half of the round voyage, it will be said to be taking the cargo for England "Directo," and in the present case the cargo was put on board at Malaga by Mr. Frenkel's representatives, his son, his shipping clerk and his chief clerk, after a series of daily advertisements that the Cervantes was proceeding homewards "via Levante," meaning that it was going on up the east coast of Spain before turning round and coming back. Sometimes in the same paper there were advertisements—the particular one that I have in mind I think is as to Bristol—that such and such a boat was going to Bristol "Directo."

The Malaga representative and the manager of the line were called and proved these facts, and proved that in Malaga, unlike many other ports, the representatives of the shipping firms called round on the regular shippers every day and left their shipping cards (with which one is very familiar) with them, stating the same thing as was stated in the advertisements, that in this case the Cervantes would take a cargo for England "via Levante."

Nobody from the Malaga shipping office was called, and I unhesitatingly draw the inference that the facts stated by the Malaga representative of the MacAndrews Line were well known to the persons in the Malaga shipping office, who knew perfectly well that the goods that they put on board were going "via Levante," and they were quite content that they should do so. Mr. Frenkel, who has been shipping goods on the MacAndrews Line for 15 years, has somehow remained during the whole of that time in a state of blissful ignorance of the fact that the MacAndrews Line does pursue this course of business. The learned Judge has not made any finding as to whether he believes him or not. I did not see him, and make no similar finding; but if he has been ignorant during the 15 years that he has been shipping of the course of business of the MacAndrews Line he must have been doing his business with his eyes tightly shut.

What happened was that the Cervantes taking on board this non-perishable goods, that is to say, oil, proceeded on its ordinary voyage north; but before it got to its next port it met with a very heavy gale. I see that the records of some of the ships in that gale are that the wind was Force 11, the highest force in the Beaufort Scale being 12, and there appears to have been undoubtedly a very heavy gale; and in that very heavy gale the casks of oil, or one or more of them, broke loose, and were so strained that the oil ran out and perished.

Thereupon, Mr. Frenkel brings an action against the MacAndrews Line, alleging, first, that the ship was unseaworthy, as to which he failed, because the learned Judge has found that there is no evidence that the ship was unseaworthy either by itself or in stowing. Secondly, the plaintiff says: "You were not on the route. You had deviated, because you were bound by your bill of lading to proceed direct homeward from Malaga to England, and you, in fact, were going the opposite way; you were going north along the east coast of Spain when you should have been going south to Gibraltar." The learned Judge has not himself expressed any opinion on the law, but he says that he is referred to a decision of Mr. Justice Hill in T. M. Duché and Sons v. Owners of Steamship Maria (3 Ll. L., 184), which is very shortly reported, upon a bill of lading which is said to be the same bill of lading, and Mr. Justice Rowlatt thinks that in that case on similar facts Mr. Justice Hill gave a decision which would be in favour of the plaintiff in this case, and he thinks himself bound by judicial comity to follow that decision.

Now, first of all, I think that the decision of Mr. Justice Hill in T. M. Duché and Sons v. Owners of Steamship Maria (supra), so far as we can gather it from the report, and from the statement made by Mr. Langton, who was counsel in the case, and has with him his old brief, is on facts quite dissimilar from this case. What appears to have happened in the case which Mr. Justice Hill decided, and upon which Mr. Justice Rowlatt relied, was this: Some goods were shipped on the Paulina at Tarragona, which is well to the north on the east coast of Spain, under a bill of lading which gave liberty to trans-ship at Valencia to a steamer of the same company. The goods were trans-shipped at Valencia and put on board a ship called the Maria, and the Maria then proceeded north instead of going south. On that, Mr. Justice Hill held that Burriana, which was the port to which the Maria went, was not on the route from Valencia to London, and that, therefore, there was a deviation, because, though there was a clause giving leave to call at ports, the port was not on the route.

Now there are a number of differences between that case and this case, and the most marked one is this: The plaintiffs in T. M. Duché and Sons v. Owners of Steamship Maria (supra) were not the shippers, but were indorsees, and consequently under the decision in the case of Leduc and Co. v. Ward (4 The Times L.R., 313 ; 20 Q.B.D., 475) they were not bound by any knowledge which the shipper had which was not contained in the bill of lading, because the indorsee of a bill of lading only has the contract contained in the bill of lading, and has not any contract contained in an agreement with the shipper outside the bill of lading. In this case, the plaintiff is not an indorsee, but he is the original shipper. That alone is sufficient to make the case inapplicable ; but further, it was not a case where there was any proof as to the ordinary route, neither the Paulina nor the Maria had anything to do with the MacAndrews Line, and there was no evidence of the ordinary route from Tarragona or of the ordinary route from Tarragona when there was trans-shipment at Valencia ; and in those circumstances it is not necessary for us to express any opinion on the validity of the judgment of Mr. Justice Hill in T. M. Duché and Sons v. Owners of Steamship Maria (supra), because the facts are entirely different from the facts of this case.

This case is a case where the shipper, when he puts goods on board, knows that he is shipping by a line which from Malaga has two ordinary routes. He may be shipping on a vessel which is going to England "via Levante," or he may be shipping on a vessel which is going from Malaga direct, and he is told before he ships, by advertisements and by shipping cards left at his office, that the vessel is going "via Levante," and she goes "via Levante," and a loss occurs while she is on her voyage "via Levante." That appears to me to be the simplest case of a vessel with a bill of lading destination going by one of the ordinary routes by which that line goes to that destination, and going when the shipper has been told before he ships that she is going by that one of the ordinary routes.

It does not seem to me to be a question of deviation at all, but a case of evidence of the ordinary routes of the well-known line by which the shipper ships with full knowledge of the ordinary routes and the method in which this particular contract is to be performed.

For these reasons I think that the learned Judge, who had not such full information as to Mr. Justice Hill's judgment in T. M. Duché and Sons v. Owners of Steamship Maria (supra) as we have, was in error in thinking that he was bound by the decision of Mr. Justice Hill. He did not address his mind to what the result would be if he was not bound by the decision of Mr. Justice Hill in that case. We, addressing our mind to the evidence, come to the conclusion that the plaintiff fails in this case, the defendants being protected by the exception of perils of the sea. Therefore, the appeal will be allowed with costs.

LORD JUSTICE GREER.—I agree. The plaintiff's claim in this action was for damages for loss of a parcel of oil shipped at Malaga under a bill of lading which describes the shipment as a shipment in the ss. Cervantes with the destination Liverpool, with liberty to touch at any ports whatsoever, though it may be outside the route, without its being considered a deviation. The defendants, the shipowners, contended, and successfully contended, that if the bills of lading applied they were protected by the exception in the bills of lading. The plaintiff said: "No, you are not protected by the exception in the bills of lading, because when the loss occurred you were not carrying goods on the bills of lading voyage, but were carrying them by means of an unauthorized deviation ; and what the learned Judge had to decide was whether that contention was right on the facts of this case.

Now the material facts appear to me to be these:—For a considerable time—some years—the defendants have been adopting from Malaga to Liverpool or other ports of this country, or to Hamburg, two distinct routes for the vessels of their line—one "via Levante," which means going north-east up the coast of Spain, calling at various ports, and then coming back from the furthermost port down the Mediterranean and through the Straits to this country, and the other coming from Malaga, after calling at the higher ports, direct to ports in this country. Both these routes were well-known to the representatives of the plaintiff at Malaga. They knew that sometimes the route of the vessel would be "via Levante," and sometimes it would be "Directo" ; and I think one is entitled to conclude that in this particular case, when they delivered their goods to the ship to be carried under these bills of lading, they knew that the route of that ship, the route for that particular ship, would be "via Levante." Yet it is said that because of the technical interpretation of the words of the bills of lading, the vessel was deviating, and was not on the agreed route.

We are not here concerned with an action by a holder of a bill of lading, whose rights are to be determined solely by looking at the bill of lading ; we are only dealing with a case where a claim is made by the shipper who had the knowledge, through his agents, that I have mentioned. It seems to me that it is possible, certainly as between these parties, to read these bills of lading as meaning that the goods were destined for Liverpool by one or other of the usual routes, and even if the plaintiff had not known which way the vessel was going on this occasion, still, inasmuch as the vessel was taking one of those known and usual routes towards Liverpool, it was not deviating at the time of the loss. We have not got to consider the effect of the deviation clause until we have found out, first, what the route was. Then you may have to ask yourself the question whether from that agreed route there was a deviation. But I am satisfied here that the question of deviation never arose, because at the time of the loss the vessel was on the agreed route as between the plaintiff and the defendants, and I think that that is supported by the decision in the case of Evans, Sons and Co. v. Cunard Steamship Co., Limited (18 The Times L.R., 374), which has been referred to in the course of the argument. I should like only to add that I congratulate myself and my brothers sitting here upon the fact that we have not had to investigate that large library of authorities which the industry of counsel has prepared for our assistance.

LORD JUSTICE SANKEY.—I agree. The plaintiff was at all material times the owner of 134 barrels of olive oil which he shipped on the defendants' steamship Cervantes at Malaga under two bills of lading dated April 11, 1927, one for 110 barrels, with the destination Bradford via Liverpool, and the other for 24 barrels, with the destination Liverpool.

Now the vessel left Malaga and proceeded in an easterly direction on a voyage during which she encountered very severe weather, with the result that the barrels of oil were broached and the oil was spilt and lost. In those circumstances the plaintiff brings an action against the defendants for the loss which he has sustained. The defendants refer to the bills of lading and say: "We are excused. We are not liable to compensate you, because of the perils of the sea referred to in the exceptions in the bills of lading." To that defence the plaintiff puts in a special plea: "After loading the plaintiff's cargo, the Cervantes, without justification, deviated from the bills of lading voyage and the defendants are therefore not entitled to rely on the terms and exceptions in the bills of lading," and the plaintiff says that the best particulars that he can give are, that after leaving Malaga the Cervantes did not go towards Liverpool, but proceeded in an easterly direction; she proceeded past Sabinal Point and towards Almeria Bay. In other words, what the plaintiff is saying is this: "You are not excused because your vessel did not proceed upon the agreed voyage."

Finally, the defendants put in a plea of rejoinder, in which they say that by proceeding, after leaving Malaga, towards Cartagena the said vessel was carrying out the voyage agreed upon in the bills of lading in a business sense, and/or was carrying out the said voyage by a natural and usual or customary route by which the same always has been and still is carried out by the said vessel at all material times, and these matters were well known and understood by the plaintiff.

The real question as presented before us, therefore, has nothing to do with the terms of the deviation clause, but is whether the vessel was proceeding upon the agreed voyage. Looking at the bills of lading —and I will take the Liverpool one, which was the first one put before us — the words are these: "Shipped by Leon Frenkel"—that is the plaintiff—"in the steamship Cervantes with destination to Liverpool"—now what is the true meaning of that? In my view the meaning of it is this, that it is "With destination to Liverpool by one or other of the usual routes."

In this case there was abundant evidence that the vessel proceeding in a northerly direction towards Cartagena was proceeding upon one of the usual routes. There was the evidence first of all of Mr. Owen, who was the defendants' manager at Malaga. There was also the evidence of Mr. Thomas Bartlett, who was the superintendent of the defendants' line, and he stated the fact that for 50 years this particular route had been one of the usual routes of the line. On the other hand, there was weak evidence given by the plaintiff, Mr. Frenkel, nobody being called from the Malaga office, and he was asked: "You spend most of your time in London?" and his answer was: "With the exception of that period last year when I was away in Malaga. (Q.) At this time, April, 1927, you were in London?—(A.) Yes, that is right." So on the first point there was really evidence all one way with regard to the route taken by the vessel being one of the usual routes, and therefore, in my view she was proceeding upon the agreed voyage. But the matter does not stop there, because there was evidence not only that this vessel was proceeding upon her usual route to Liverpool, but the plaintiff well knew that she was going "via Levante." Why do I say that? Again I point out that no evidence from the plaintiff's Malaga office on the spot was called, but we have evidence showing that this vessel was advertised in the local papers as going "via Levante." There was further evidence that the defendants' agents in Malaga called on the plaintiff's agents at Malaga and showed them voyage cards, explaining to them that the vessel was going "via Levante." Therefore there was evidence that it was the usual route, or a usual route, and that the plaintiff well knew it.

The learned Judge apparently did not exercise his own view upon the matter, but followed a rather imperfectly reported decision of Mr. Justice Hill to which our attention has been drawn, in the case of T. M. Duché and Sons v. Owners of Steamship Maria (3 Ll.L., 184). But with the fuller light that we have had shed upon the decision it appears to me to have nothing at all to do with the present facts. To begin with, there, it was an indorsee of the bill of lading who was the plaintiff and not the shipper, and the principles of Leduc and Co. v. Ward (4 The Times L.R., 313; 20 Q.B.D., 475), would apply. But over and above that, the facts there were of an entirely different character; the goods in question were transshipped, I think it was said, at Valencia, and when they had been trans-shipped and packed upon another boat, instead of the voyage being continued, the goods were sent out on a voyage in the reverse direction towards the port of Burriana, if I remember rightly, which would be in a northerly direction, the reverse direction from the homeward voyage upon which they had already started. Therefore, it appears to me that both in law and in fact, T. M. Duché and Sons v. Owners of Steamship Maria (supra) is entirely distinguishable, and really, with all deference, has nothing at all to do either in fact or in law with the present case.

I am of opinion that this appeal should be allowed.

FIRST RUSSIAN INSURANCE COMPANY (IN LIQUIDATION) v. LONDON AND LANCASHIRE INSURANCE COMPANY, LIMITED.*

Contract—Company—Russian insurance company—Decree of Soviet Government—Confiscation—Effect on reinsurance treaties with English reinsurance company—Frustration.

By virtue of a Decree of the Soviet Government, which came into operation on December 1, 1918, and of certain subsequent decrees, insurance business in Russia was declared to be the monopoly of the State and financial transactions in Russia were regulated.

An action was commenced for the determination of the effect of the above decrees on certain treaties of reinsurance entered into between a Russian reinsurance company, having a branch office in London, and an English reinsurance company.

Held, that the above decrees did not prevent the Russian company from discharging their liabilities to the English company under one of the treaties by a payment in London out of their assets outside Russia or by means of a set off against the liabilities of the English company to them under the treaties.

His Lordship delivered a considered judgment in this action, which was begun by the plaintiffs, the First Russian Insurance Company, an insurance company incorporated in 1827 in accordance with the law of Russia, against the defendants, an English company, the London and Lancashire Insurance Company, Limited. The principal office of the plaintiffs was at Leningrad, and they had an important branch office in London.

The question to be determined was the effect of the confiscatory legislation of the Soviet Government of Russia on certain treaties of reinsurance entered into between the two companies. By one set of treaties, referred to in the proceedings as the Outward Treaties, the defendants reinsured with the plaintiffs fire risks undertaken by the defendants in Great Britain, Australia, and elsewhere outside the Russian Empire. By another of the treaties, referred to as the Inward Treaty, the plaintiffs reinsured with the defendants fire risks undertaken by the plaintiffs inside the Russian Empire. In the present action the plaintiffs sued on the Outward Treaties alone. The Inward Treaty was the subject matter of a counterclaim by the defendants.

Two wholly distinct questions arose in the action: (1) Whether the plaintiffs could recover in the English Courts debts due from the defendants on the balance of account in respect of reinsurance under the Outward Treaties, a considerable sum of money being alleged to be due from the defendants to the London branch of the plaintiff company; and (2) Whether the defendants could set off against that alleged liability debts which they said were due to them in Russia under the Inward Treaty.

On May 18, 1926, the plaintiff company was ordered to be wound up under the Companies (Consolidation) Act, 1908, and a liquidator was appointed. The plaintiffs through the liquidator demanded payment of the balance in question, but were met by a refusal based on the contention that, by virtue of a Soviet decree dated November 18, 1918, the plaintiff company ceased to function on December 1, 1918, and that accordingly its treaties ceased to be operative.

In consequence of that refusal the plaintiffs issued the writ in this action. They based their claim on the ground that these Outward Treaties continued down to December 31, 1919, the date from which they had given notice to determine them. The defendants, on the other hand, contended that the accounts between the parties under those treaties ought to be taken on the footing that the treaties came to an end on December 1, 1918, and that, in any case, they were entitled to set off against any sum due to the plaintiffs under the Outward Treaties the balance that was due from the plaintiffs to the defendants on that date under the Inward Treaty.

Mr. Maugham, K.C., Mr. Archer, K.C., and Mr. W. F. Waite appeared for the plaintiffs; Mr. Wilfrid Greene, K.C., Mr. S. L. Porter, K.C., Mr. A. Andrewes-Uthwatt, and Mr. T. W. C. Carthew for the defendants.

Mr. Justice Romer.—The plaintiffs in this action are an insurance company incorporated in accordance with the laws of Russia in the year 1827. The defendants are an English company. The question that I have to determine is as to the effect of the confiscatory legislation of the Soviet Government of Russia upon certain treaties of reinsurance entered into between the two companies. By one set of treaties, referred to in the proceedings as the Outward Treaties, the defendants reinsured with the plaintiffs fire risks undertaken by the defendants. By another of the treaties, referred to as the Inward Treaty, the plaintiffs reinsured with the defendants fire risks undertaken by the plaintiffs. In the action the plaintiffs are suing upon the Outward Treaties alone. The Inward Treaty is the subject-matter of a counterclaim by the defendants. For the present, therefore, I will confine my attention to the Outward Treaties. These treaties are three in number, all dated February 5, 1907, and made between the defendants of the one part and the plaintiffs of the other part. They are known as "The Home Treaty," "The General Foreign Treaty," and "The Australian Treaty" respectively, according to the locality of the risks that were being thereby reinsured. But they are substantially in the same terms, and it is sufficient for the present purpose to refer to the Home Treaty alone. By that treaty the defendants agreed to reinsure with the plaintiffs, and the plaintiffs agreed obligatorily to accept, a specified proportion of the risks undertaken by the defendants within the limits of the United Kingdom, including the Isle of Man and the Channel Islands. Bordereaux were to be forwarded by the defendants to the plaintiffs showing the risks from time to time ceded under the treaty, together with the amount of the premiums due to the plaintiffs, which were to be a pro rata share of the net premiums received by the defendants from the insured. It was also provided that the defendants should give to the plaintiffs early intimation of any losses occurring under any policies, and that, after the defendants should have made any payment in respect of any loss, the plaintiffs should reimburse the proper proportion to the defendants without delay and at latest within 10 days after application, unless such reimbursement amounted to less than £100, when the same should be carried into the current account between the parties. It was further provided that the plaintiffs should allow to the defendants a specified commission upon the net premiums payable to them by the defendants and upon the net profits accruing to the plaintiffs under the treaty, such profits to be ascertained in manner set forth in the treaty. Quarterly accounts were to be furnished by the defendants to the plaintiffs within four months after the respective quarter days, and the balance by whomsoever due was to be paid within two weeks after the rendering of the account. Finally it was provided that a firm then bearing the name of Hollitscher and Middleton (but subsequently known as and referred to throughout these proceedings as Middleton and Cater), of No. 15, George-street, in the City of London, were the attorneys or agents appointed by the plaintiffs to act for and represent them in respect of all communications, despatch of documents, and all formalities accruing thereunder, and that their acts and signatures to all documents relating thereto or to the treaty should be binding upon the plaintiffs. The treaty was expressed to be determinable by six months' previous notice in writing on either side. Messrs. Middleton and Cater had, in fact, already been appointed the attorneys of the plaintiffs under a power of attorney dated June 16, 1906. For the plaintiffs did not confine their reinsurance business to the defendants. They entered into Outward Treaties with at least six other British insurance companies; and Middleton and Cater, on behalf of the plaintiffs, conducted the business in connexion with all these treaties. The power of attorney which was in English form, though executed by the plaintiffs in Petrograd, began by stating that the plaintiffs, carrying on a branch business at their office, 15, George-street, Mansion House, London, having appointed Middleton and Cater managers of their said branch business, did thereby appoint the members of that firm the company's attorneys, and it then proceeded to give such attorneys power to effect such reinsurances as they might think proper with any companies carrying on the business of fire insurance in the United Kingdom of any risks insured by such companies and other consequential powers.

The business relations between the plaintiffs and the defendants thus constituted under the Outward Treaties pursued their normal course down to the outbreak of War, though I shall have to consider later the method in which the business was so conducted. The difficulty of communicating with Russia occasioned by the War necessitated, however, an alteration in the course of business, by virtue of which alteration losses for which the plaintiffs were liable were debited to them in account and the defendants temporarily retained the balance due to the plaintiffs. This arrangement continued until March, 1916, when the defendants resumed payments to Middleton and Cater on behalf of the plaintiffs, Middleton and Cater undertaking to hold the balances so paid to them upon trust to pay any losses for which the plaintiffs might become liable under the treaties. In March, 1918, however, the practice of retaining the balances due to the plaintiffs was resumed by the defendants. With these exceptions the business under the treaties followed its normal course from the beginning of the War down to December 31, 1919, as from which day the Outward Treaties were determined by the defendants in the circumstances now to be stated.

On February 22, 1918, the defendants had given to Middleton and Cater formal six months' notices for the termination of the Outward Treaties. Their reasons for giving these notices are stated in a covering letter which was in these terms: "It is with profound regret that in consequence of the grave situation created in Russia by recent events we are compelled to give notice for the termination of all our Russian treaties. It is possible that circumstances may so alter as to warrant our extending the notices required by the treaties, and we sincerely hope that it may not be necessary to completely terminate relations. In this eventuality we shall, of course, advise you. Formal notices enclosed herewith. You will doubtless take the necessary steps to ensure that the company learns of this notification at the earliest possible moment." The grave events referred to in this letter were no doubt the overthrow of the Kerensky Government in the month of November, 1917, and the accession to power of the Soviet Government. Little appears to have been known by the defendants at this time as to what that Government was doing. The notices were merely given as a precautionary measure. From that time down to August, 1918, various rumours came to the knowledge of the defendants as to the acts done or threatened by the Soviet Government in connexion with insurance companies, but such rumours seemed to point to nothing worse than Government control of the companies, the defendants being advised that the Russian companies would be able to continue their work and maintain their relations with foreign companies, and that their capital would "probably" remain untouched. In these circumstances the defendants informed Middleton and Cater on August 16 that they were willing to allow the Outward Treaties to run along for the time being and pending further advices from Russia when they could "see the situation more clearly in order to come to a definite and final decision." This proposal was accepted by Middleton and Cater on behalf of the plaintiffs on August 19, and the treaties remained on foot notwithstanding the expiration a few days later of the six months' notice of February 22. It is agreed that thenceforward the treaties were determinable at will. It is clear that the defendants were anxious to maintain business relations with the plaintiffs, and were willing to continue making cessions to the plaintiffs notwithstanding the uncertainty that must have existed in their minds as to what was really being done in Russia. They no doubt considered themselves sufficiently protected by their ability to put an end to those relations at any time. On November 4, 1918, the defendants received a copy of a long letter that the Russian Insurance Company had received from Mr. Kaz, their assistant general manager in Copenhagen, dealing with the position of insurance companies in Russia. This letter clearly indicated that their position was precarious, though Mr. Kaz stated that there was "no reason to lose all hope and confidence in the Russian business because of the revolution." This was not very encouraging. The general manager of the defendants, indeed, could only find one welcome feature in it, which was that "so far as one can tell the insurance companies have suffered less than many others." On December 30 the defendants were informed by Messrs. Fester Fothergill and Company, who were acting on behalf of other Russian reinsurance companies with whom the defendants had relations, that all Russian insurance companies (with an immaterial exception) were to liquidate by April 1 as from which date fire insurance would "apparently" be carried on by the State under Bolshevist influence. In reply to this information the defendants' general manager stated that he was not at all surprised, as he feared things would be much worse before they were better, and that the defendants would consider the question of terminating the treaties with Messrs. Fester's principals. "It is too early yet, however," he added, "for us to formulate any definite decision, and on the whole the business is so good that we can afford to deliberate so that we may get full advantage from the placing of these treaties in such directions as may be to our reciprocal benefit." Notwithstanding this information, described by Messrs. Fester and Company as "disturbing," the defendants refrained from terminating the Outward Treaties. Nor did they take any steps in that direction when on January 1, 1919, they received what was a substantially accurate copy of the decree of December 1, 1918, hereinafter referred to, a decree that the defendants now allege finally frustrated those treaties. On the contrary, the defendants negotiated with Middleton and Cater, and ultimately concluded an addendum to the Home Treaty dated May 12, 1919, extending the nature of the risks to be conceded. It is true that at this time the defendants had seen a letter from Mr. Dobrynin, managing director of the plaintiff company, which, after setting out fairly accurately the effect of the decree of December 1, stated that the financial position of the private insurance concerns, notwithstanding the disastrous results of the Bolshevist rule, was not at all shaken. The reason he gave for this optimistic view was "that all the assets of the private insurance concerns are placed either in real property or in gilt-edged securities guaranteed by the State, which assets will not only resume their former value, but, as is the case with all real property and sound securities, they will in all probability increase in value as soon as order is re-established in Russia." Looking at his letter as a whole, it would appear that his optimism was solely due to his belief that the Bolshevist rule would not last for long. For in an earlier part of the letter he had referred to the fact that the Bolshevists had nationalized land, factories, and ships, which had become Government property. The truth is, I think, that the defendants were willing to run the risk of what the Soviet Government might do to the Russian insurance companies. If things improved little harm would result from a continuation of the Outward Treaties. If things did not improve, the defendants would protect themselves by bringing those treaties to an end, as they were enabled to do at any time. Things, in fact, did not improve. The defendants accordingly on December 19, 1919, addressed the following letter to Middleton and Cater : "Dear Sirs,—Referring to the correspondence we had with you in February, 1918, when formal notice for the termination of the treaties was given by us, and which was subsequently extended in the hope that the Russian situation would improve, I beg to advise you that we propose to cease ceding business to the above company under the Home, General, Foreign and Australian Treaties, after the close of the present year. That is to say, cessions on all business taking effect up to midnight of December 31 will be for account of the company, but after that date no further business will be ceded. Nearly two years have now elapsed, and in view of the impossibility of communicating with our reinsurers or gauging the financial situation, either present or future, we feel that we can no longer leave the matter in suspense. We feel sure that, when the situation as regards Russian affairs is clearer, our friends will appreciate we have been patient and that we have done all in our power to maintain the connexion up to the last moment. Please acknowledge this communicaion on behalf of your company." As from December 31, 1919, therefore, cessions under the Outward Treaties ceased to be made. In respect of the cessions made up to that date the accounts rendered by the defendants show a balance of £42,421 19s. 11d. due to the plaintiffs, subject to some relatively small outstanding losses which have not yet been agreed. By an order dated May 18, 1926, it was ordered that the plaintiff company should be wound up under the provisions of the Companies (Consolidation) Act, 1908, Mr. James Tait being subsequently appointed liquidator. The plaintiffs through such liquidator thereupon demanded payment of the balance in question, but were met by a refusal based upon the contention that by virtue of the Soviet action and legislation the plaintiff company ceased to function on December 1, 1918, and that accordingly its treaties ceased to be operative from that date. In consequence of this refusal the plaintiffs issued the writ in this action on March 1, 1927. As already stated the plaintiffs are suing under the Outward Treaties only, claiming on the footing that these treaties continued down to December 31, 1919. The defendants, on the other hand, contend that the accounts between the parties under these treaties ought to be taken on the footing that the treaties came to an end on December 1, 1918, and that in any case they are entitled to set off against any sum due to the plaintiffs under the Outward Treaties the balance that was due from the plaintiffs to the defendants on that date under the Inward Treaty. The defendants do not now contend that the plaintiffs ceased to function on December 1, 1918, by reason of their having ceased to exist. Such a contention could not be maintained since the decision of the House of Lords in Employers' Liability Assurance Corporation v. Sedgwick, Collins and Co. (42 The Times L.R., 749 ; [1927] A.C., 95). They do, however, contend (1) that by virtue of the decree of the Soviet Government of December 1, 1918, the plaintiff company was disabled from carrying on any reinsurance business as from that date ; (2) that the authority of Middleton and Cater was determined at that date by the same decree, or, alternatively, had been determined in October, 1917, being the expiration of a period of three years from the last power of attorney given to them by the plaintiff company ; (3) that, by reason of the said decree and of the confiscatory acts or legislation of the Soviet Government that preceded it, the Outward Treaties came to an end on December 1, 1918, in accordance with the principles relating to "frustration of contracts." I will deal with these defences in the order in which I have stated them, postponing for the moment the defence of set-off based upon the Inward Treaty.

The first of these defences is based upon the decree of December 1, 1918, alone. That decree is in these words : "Decree of the Council of People's Commissaries. Article 904. On the organization of Insurance Business in the Russian Republic. 1. Insurance of all kinds and forms, such as insurance against fire, insurance of transport, life, against accidents, hail, epizooty, bad crops, &c., is declared to be the monopoly of the State. Note : Mutual insurance of movable property and goods by cooperative organizations is carried out on a special basis. 2. All private insurance companies and organizations (joint stock share and mutual) are subject to liquidation on the publication of the present decree ; former Zemstvo (Popular Soviets') and mutual-municipal insurance organizations, operating within the boundaries of the Russian Republic, are declared to be the property of the Russian Socialist Federative Soviet Republic. 3. For the immediate organization of the insurance business and for the liquidation of the parts of the insurance establishments which have become the property of the State a Commission is created at the Supreme Council of People's Economy consisting of representatives of the Supreme Council of People's Economy, People's Commissariats of Trade and Industry of Interior, Commissariat for Insurance and Combating Fire, of Finance, Labour and State Control and of Soviet Insurance organizations (Popular Soviets' and mutual-municipal). Note : The same Commission is also entrusted with liquidating private insurance organizations all the property whereof, which will appear to be there after their liquidation, becomes the property of the Russian Socialist Federative Republic. 4. The reorganization and liquidation mentioned in the foregoing articles of the existing insurance organizations and establishments must be completed not later than April 1, 1919. 5. The Commissariat for Insurance Business and Combating Fire together with the establishments existing thereat is reorganized into the Insurance Department of the Supreme Council of People's Economy. The task of combating fire is handed over to the Supreme Council of People's Economy. 6. All Soviet properties and enterprises are not liable to insurance. 7. Life insurance by the State Savings Banks is carried out on the former basis. 8. The present decree is carried into effect from the day of its promulgation." Experts in Russian law gave evidence before me as to the meaning and effect of this decree. On one thing they are unanimous. As from December 1, 1918, no insurance company could carry on insurance business in any part of Russia that was then subject to the jurisdiction of the Government that promulgated the decree. But Mr. Krougliakoff who gave evidence for the defendants went further than this. He said that the decree deprived Russian companies of the power of carrying on insurance business in any part of the world. I am unable to accept this view. A company incorporated under Russian law has, of course, such powers only as that law may give to it. But it is not doubted that, apart from the decree, the plaintiff company had, according to Russian law, power to carry on insurance business both in Russia and abroad. Now the decree provides, in effect, that as from December 1, 1918, insurance of all kinds within the jurisdiction of the Soviet Government is the monopoly of the State. For the decree has no extra-territorial effect : see The Jupiter (43 The Times L.R., 741 ; [1927] P., 250). It is indeed headed with these words : "On the organization of insurance business in the Russian Republic." It does not purport to, nor, of course, could it, affect the power of foreign companies to carry on insurance business outside the Soviet territory, though it does prevent such companies from carrying on such business inside that territory. The decree, moreover, draws no distinction between Russian companies and foreign companies, and I fail to see why it should affect them differently in this respect. The truth is that the decree was not concerning itself with the powers of Russian corporations, but with the activities within the Soviet territory of insurance companies whether Russian or foreign. I come therefore to the conclusion that the effect of the decree was to deprive the plaintiffs of the power of carrying on an insurance business within Soviet territory, but that it did not affect their power of carrying on that business abroad.

In these circumstances it becomes necessary to consider whether the plaintiffs were carrying on the reinsurance business under the Outward Treaties in England or in Petrograd. For, with all respect to Dr. Idelson who holds a contrary view, the decree does, in my opinion, prohibit the plaintiffs from effecting in Russia policies of insurance on property situated outside. This, as pointed out by Mr. Krougliakoff, would involve issuing a policy in Petrograd, and would be a breach of the provisions of the decree, and this opinion of his would seem to be in accordance with the English law upon the subject : see In re United General Commercial Insurance Corporation ([1927] 2 Ch., 51). The question whether the plaintiffs carried on their reinsurance business in this country is not free from difficulty, but in my opinion the answer to it must be in the affirmative. When the business was first started it would certainly seem to have been the intention of the plaintiffs to institute a branch business at 15, George-street, which was Middleton and Cater's office, and to appoint that firm managers of such branch. That appears from the power of attorney to which I have already referred. Furthermore, the reinsurance business under the Outward Treaties with the defendants and similar treaties with other ceding companies was treated in practice as a branch business. Mr. Cater stated in evidence as follows : "We carried it on independently. We ourselves were entirely responsible for the management of this business, the negotiation of the contracts, the supervision of the business and all the work incidental to the carrying out of the reinsurance business." He also stated that they never consulted the head office in Petrograd as to whether they should undertake a particular risk or deal with the business in a particular way, though they would from time to time consult the head office upon any point of great importance as any branch manager would. The bordereaux provided for by the treaties were sent to Middleton and Cater and were checked by them. So too were the quarterly accounts. Balances due to the plaintiffs and losses payable by the plaintiffs were respectively received and paid by Middleton and Cater. The Outward Treaties were no doubt executed by the plaintiffs in Petrograd, as were the addenda subsequently made to these treaties, with the exception of the one of May, 1919. But a reinsurance business does not consist in executing reinsurance treaties. It consists in the performance of the manifold acts for which the treaties provide, the passing to and fro of the bordereaux and the accounts, the intimation, agreement and payment of losses, the correspondence and interviews which such matters demand. All this took place in London. In Forsikringsaktieselskabet National (of Copenhagen) v. Attorney-General (41 The Times L.R., 473 ; [1925] A.C.,639) Lord Cave observed in relation to a treaty similar to the Outward Treaties in this case : "It appears to me that there is much to be said for the view that a reinsurance treaty of the nature which I have described, when supplemented by a bordereau, is in effect a policy of insurance against loss by or incidental to fire." So far, therefore, as any policies of insurance in the present case may be deemed to have existed, they would seem to have been brought into effect in London where the bordereaux were from time to time issued. For these reasons I am of opinion that the decree of December 1, 1918, did not render illegal the continuance of the plaintiff's business under the Outward Treaties.

The next question that has to be considered is whether Middleton and Cater had any authority to continue that business, having regard to the decree of December 1, or, alternatively, to the Russian law applicable to powers of attorney. As to the decree, it is clear that it put the plaintiff company into liquidation. But there is a conflict of views among the experts in Russian law as to the effect that this liquidation had upon the authority of the company's agents. According to Dr. Idelson, the authority of the agents continued until revoked by the liquidators. Mr. Krougliakoff, on the other hand, considered that the liquidation put an end to the authority of every agent. But he seemed to base this opinion upon the principle that an agent's authority is determined by the death of his principal, or by such a change in circumstances as renders the further performance of the agent's duties impossible. Quoting apparently from a Russian text book, he instanced the case of an agent for the management of a house or an estate, and said that the agent's authority came to an end when the house was burned down or the estate was sold. He then added this : "If a company doing insurance business undergoes a fate which is really equivalent to death—that is the effect of what the Soviet Government did—no doubt that general principle would apply. The authority of every agent would come to an end." But the fate of the plaintiff company was not equivalent to death. All that happened was that so far as Soviet territory was concerned its affairs were liquidated. I cannot help thinking that Mr. Krougliakoff's evidence is really based upon the opinion which he still holds, and is of course entitled to hold, that notwithstanding the decision of the House of Lords in the Sedgwick, Collins case (supra) the plaintiff company has according to Russian law ceased to exist. I shall have occasion to refer to that case presently in connexion with the alternative defence based upon the power of attorney. I may, however, point out that if in the present case the authority of Middleton and Cater was determined by the decree of December 1, so must have been the authority of Collins in the case before the House of Lords. In the circumstances I propose to act upon the opinion of Dr. Idelson, and I hold that the authority of Middleton and Cater was not revoked by the decree, and, never having been revoked by the Russian liquidators, continued for all times material to the present case.

The alternative defence based upon the power of attorney is this. According to Russian law a commercial power of attorney given in Russia for the purpose of being acted upon there is only operative for three years from its date. Mr. Krougliakoff says that the same rule applies to a power of attorney given in Russia for the purpose of being acted upon abroad. Dr. Idelson, however, maintains that according to the law of Russia such a document is to be construed and takes effect according to the law of the country in which it is to be acted upon. Dr. Halpern was of the same opinion. "We have here," he said, "a contract which is given with reference to some English business which has to be performed entirely in the United Kingdom and of which no part has to be performed in Russia. In my opinion, if one applies the Russian rules of conflict of laws, the lex loci solutionis would be the proper law for the construction." Mr. Krougliakoff could find no authority in the old Russian law for such a principle. There were, he said, on the contrary numerous authorities for the opposite statement, namely, that the lex loci contractus applied in such cases. He agreed, however, that if the parties to a contract indicated an intention that it should be governed by another law, such as the law of England, such intention would be given effect to in Russian law, and that such an intention might be implied. He was then asked whether, in view of the fact that the document in question was given to an English firm to be acted on in England for the purposes of satisfying people in England that the firm had authority to act, the parties had not sufficiently indicated their intention that the English law should apply. His answer was : "It is very difficult for me to say. At any rate I would not take upon myself to say that this possibility is ruled out." This being so, there does not seem to be any serious conflict between the experts in relation to the power of attorney in the present case. Neither according to Russian law nor English law was the duration of the power limited to three years. In the Sedgwick, Collins case (supra) Lord Sumner, in referring to a similar power of attorney given by another Russian insurance company to one Collins, said : "I do not think it is proved that by Russian law, whether pre-revolutionary or post-revolutionary, he had no authority all this time to do on the company's behalf all that he ostensibly did for it, nor do I see any reason why the question of his authority to carry on in London the business established here by the company should not be determined by English law." I desire respectfully to make a similar observation with reference to the present case.

I must now consider the contention of the defendants that the Outward Treaties determined on December 1, 1918, on the principle of what is called frustration of contract. It will be convenient to see, first of all, what that principle is and then to ascertain whether it is applicable to the present case. The principle in its simplest form was enunciated by Mr. Justice Blackburn in Taylor v. Caldwell (3 B. and S., 826) in these words : "Where, from the nature of the contract, it appears that the parties must from the beginning have known that it could not be fulfilled unless when the time for the fulfilment of the contract arrived some particular specified thing continued to exist, so that, when entering into the contract, they must have contemplated such continuing existence as the foundation of what was to be done ; there, in the absence of any express or implied warranty that the thing shall exist, the contract is not to be construed as a positive contract, but as subject to an implied condition that the parties shall be excused in case, before breach, performance becomes impossible from the perishing of the thing without default of the contractor." But as pointed out by Lord Justice Vaughan Williams in Krell v. Henry (19 The Times L.R., 711 ; [1903] 2 K.B., 740), the principle applies not only to cases where the performance of the contract becomes impossible by the cessation of existence of the thing which is the subject-matter of the contract, but also to cases where the event which renders the contract incapable of performance is the cessation or non-existence of an express condition or state of things going to the root of the contract and essential to its performance. In Horlock v. Beal (32 The Times L.R., 251 ; [1916] 1 A.C., 486) the principle was stated by Lord Atkinson to apply not only to contracts in their executory stage, but when they have been in part performed. It will be observed, however, that the principle so stated only applies when the performance or further performance of a contract becomes impossible, which, as pointed out by Lord Loreburn in the case last mentioned, means "impracticable in a commercial sense." In the Tamplin Steamship case (32 The Times L.R., 677 ; [1916] 2 A.C., 397), the principle was stated by Lord Loreburn, at page 403, as follows : "A Court can and ought to examine the contract and the circumstances in which it was made, not, of course, to vary, but only to explain it, in order to see whether or not from the nature of it the parties must have made their bargain on the footing that a particular thing or state of things would continue to exist. And if they must have done so, then a term to that effect will be implied, though it be not expressed in the contract." But he added that in applying the rule it is manifest that such a term can rarely be implied except where the discontinuance is such as to upset altogether the purpose of the contract. Lord Parker in the same case referred to the principle as being that which underlies the cases in which a contract has been held to determine upon the happening of some event which renders its performance impossible or otherwise frustrates the objects which the parties to the contract have in view. In the case of Bank Line, Limited v. Arthur Capel and Co. (35 The Times L.R., 150 ; [1919] A.C., 435) Lord Sumner referred to the principle as the theory of dissolution of a contract by the frustration of its commercial object, and with reference to the application of the principle to a case of delay, he said : "For the time being the performance of the contract must have become altogether impossible." A little later he said : "I think also that the doctrine is one which ought not to be extended, though to cases that really fall within the decided rule it must be applied as a matter of course even under novel circumstances."

Such being the principle I must now turn to the facts in order to see whether it is applicable to the present case.

Before entering into the Outward Treaties the defendants, as was their invariable custom in similar cases, made a careful analysis of the balance-sheet of the plaintiff company. Before making a contract of insurance it is, of course, important for the insured to be satisfied that the insurers will be able to meet their engagements. In ordinary circumstances the premium income of a fire insurance company will be more than sufficient to meet the losses. It may not, however, be sufficient to meet them in exceptional cases such as a conflagration. In those cases the company will have to fall back upon its capital reserves. For this reason it was of importance to the defendants to satisfy themselves as to the value of the plaintiffs' capital assets ; and this they did. Now it appears that, by reason of the confiscatory legislation and proceedings of the Soviet Government, practically every investment of the plaintiff company within the jurisdiction of that Government had by December 1, 1918, been annulled, destroyed, or confiscated. I have no means of ascertaining what proportion of the plaintiffs' assets in Russia was affected by these confiscatory measures, but I may, I think, assume that it was a large one. That being so, a state of affairs had arisen by December 1, 1918, that could not have been within the contemplation of the parties in 1907. They would not, of course, be justified in assuming that the financial position of the plaintiffs would continue at all times to be as sound as it then was. The possibility of a change for the worse, even a change resulting in insolvency, cannot be deemed to have been outside their contemplation. But it ought, I think, to be presumed that they contracted in 1907 on the footing that the financial position of the company would continue unaffected by any such confiscatory proceedings as those of the Soviet Government. But did the events of 1918, culminating in the decree of December 1, 1918, render the further performance of the contract commercially impracticable ? Now it is a feature of this case, not present in any other to which my attention has been called, that the contract in fact continued after the date of its alleged frustration and the commercial object of the contract was in fact attained. Risks continued to be ceded down to December 31, 1919, and all the losses under these risks payable by the plaintiffs have in fact been paid. The defendants are in no worse a position than they would have been had the Revolution in Russia of November, 1917, never taken place. But, say the defendants, it is immaterial to consider what took place after December 1, 1918. By that time events had happened putting an end to a state of affairs which both parties contemplated would continue to exist. You must therefore imply a condition bringing the contract to an end on that day. If the principle of frustration be that, whenever an event happens which could not have been in the contemplation of the parties at the date of the contract and which may or may not result in the frustration of the commercial purpose of the contract, the contract is determined, there is much to be said for the defendants' contention. But this is not the principle as I understand it. The event that determines the contract must be one that frustrates it in fact. If this be not so, I cannot understand why in Horlock v. Beal (supra) the House of Lords should have troubled to consider whether the contract of service in that case determined on the detention of the ship or on the imprisonment of the crew—nor, for the matter of that, why every commercial contract was not determined upon the outbreak of the Great War. Furthermore, if it be a material subject for consideration, I do not see why I am to assume that if the parties had foreseen the state of affairs that existed on December 1, 1918, they would have inserted a condition determining the treaties on that day. The plaintiff company's power of continuing the business of the Outward Treaties was unaffected. Its assets outside the jurisdiction of the Soviet Government were untouched. There were considerable assets belonging to it in the United States of America, and its premium income for 1918 under the Outward Treaties was £75,000. The position might, of course, take a turn for the worse at any time. But the defendants might, in these circumstances, well choose to continue what, with reasonably good fortune, would be profitable business for them, merely safeguarding themselves by a power to determine the contract at a moment's notice in preference to providing for its determination automatically on December 1, 1918. It will have been observed that this is precisely what they did in point of fact in August, 1918, and thereafter down to December, 1919. They did not know all that we know now. But they knew a good deal, as is shown by the correspondence, and I cannot help thinking that they must have suspected a good deal more. I did not, however, have the opportunity of seeing any of their directors in the witness box, though their assistant manager spoke as to his own state of knowledge. However this may be, I am not prepared to hold that the Outward Treaties were determined on December 1, 1918. In my opinion, they continued operative down to December 31, 1919. The plaintiffs are accordingly entitled to recover the balance shown due to them on taking the accounts upon that footing, subject only to the defendants' claim of set-off under the Inward Treaty. With that claim I must now deal. By the Inward Treaty which was entered into in the year 1892, it was agreed that the defendant company should reinsure a specified proportion of the risks undertaken by the plaintiffs in the parts of the Russian Empire therein mentioned in consideration of a proportionate amount of the premiums. Clause 7 provided for delivery from time to time of bordereaux to the defendants' representative, meaning no doubt the defendants' representative in Petrograd. Clause 12 provided that as soon as the amount of a loss had been established the share falling to the defendants should be notified to them as requiring payment. The same clause also provided that settlement of accounts between the two contracting parties should take place monthly in the following manner. During the first days of each month the premiums due to the defendants under the bordereaux for the past month were to be added together and the agreed commission of the plaintiffs was to be deducted from the total and the balance paid after the lapse of five months.

The losses payable for each month by the defendants were to be paid in silver roubles to the plaintiffs within the first 14 days of the following month at St. Petersburg. Clause 14 was in these terms : " The London and Lancashire " agrees through its appointed agents in St. Petersburg to settle all transactions having reference to this agreement such as the receipts of the bordereaux, notices of alterations, advices and settlement of losses, and acknowledgment of the monthly accounts, in fact all questions referring to this treaty. Clause 15 further emphasized the fact that the settlement of all matters under the treaty must be effected by the defendants in St. Petersburg so long as any reinsurance for which they might be liable remained in force. The treaty also contained an arbitration clause which provided that in all questions not specially mentioned in the agreement both companies declared themselves willing to submit to the principles and usages which are generally applied to reinsurance business, but that in case of any disputes arising under the agreement they were to be settled by arbitration consisting of two arbitrators and one umpire, all resident merchants of St. Petersburg. These arbitrators were charged to come to an amicable but final decision, and both parties renounced all ordinary and extraordinary legal remedies against such decision.

I cannot doubt that the proper law of this treaty, to use Professor Dicey's expression, is Russian and that it is that law by which the parties intended the contract to be governed.

It is agreed on both sides that this treaty came to an end on December 1, 1918, by reason of the decree of that date. For as from that date the plaintiffs could effect in Soviet Russia no further insurances. Now, if this treaty had determined on that day in a normal manner, the accounts between the parties would have had to be taken as at that time with any adjustments necessitated by claims subsequently accruing under policies then current, and the balance (if any) due to the defendants ascertained. That balance would, as it seems to me, have been payable in Petrograd in roubles. It is alleged by the defendants that there was in fact such a balance, and that they are entitled to set off what is due to them in respect of such balance against the plaintiffs' claim under the Outward Treaties. It is, however, contended by the plaintiffs that by virtue of the decrees and regulations of the Soviet Government any liability of the plaintiffs in respect of the balance has been long since extinguished. Alternatively they rely upon the Statute of Limitations.

The questions involved in the first of these contentions of the plaintiffs are difficult of solution. The experts in Russian law have given me all the assistance they can; but they are hopelessly at variance on some crucial points, and all of them look at the questions from angles of view that are unfamiliar to an English lawyer. And this is only natural. For Soviet law is a thing sui generis, bearing no sort of relation to Russian law of the pre-revolutionary period, which affords no assistance in the search for the meaning and effect of the various decrees and regulations which are thought to have a bearing upon the questions in issue. Indeed, so far as I can understand the matter, those decrees and regulations would receive in the Courts of Soviet Russia whatever construction would appear to be most in accordance with the dictates of the revolutionary conscience. In these circumstances it will, I think, be safe to proceed upon the assumption that the debts owing by the plaintiffs in Russia have not been destroyed, unless the decrees and regulations do so in express terms or by implication necessarily drawn from the language of the decrees and regulations themselves. For when once the assets in Russia of the capitalists had been nationalized or otherwise expropriated for the benefit of what are in some of the decrees called the toiling masses, there seems no reason for thinking that the revolutionary conscience would trouble itself to free the capitalists from their liabilities. Turning now to the relevant decrees and regulations, it is to be observed that the decree of December 1, 1918, does not purport in any way to deal with the liabilities of the insurance companies. It deprives them of their power of carrying on the business of insurance in Soviet Russia, and practically all their assets within the Soviet jurisdiction had been confiscated previously. What was left was put into liquidation and all their property which would "appear to be there" after their liquidation became the property of the Soviet Republic. Inasmuch as the payment of the companies debts would diminish the amount of the funds in the hands of the liquidators which was to be the property of the Republic, it may safely be assumed that the liquidators would refuse to pay any debt owing to a foreign company, such as the defendants. But there was no object to be gained in relieving the insurance companies of their obligation to pay their debts out of any assets they might possess outside the Soviet jurisdiction, and the decree in no way purports to do so. The next decree to which reference must be made is that of the Council of People's Commissaries of March 4, 1919. I need not read it at length. It is sufficient for the present purpose to read clause 2, which is in these terms: "State enterprises are relieved of the obligation to pay to private persons and enterprises any debt incurred prior to the nationalization of the said enterprises, including payments in respect of debentures but excluding wages to their workers and employees. Note: The former State works transferred to the Workers' and Peasants' Government as a result of the October revolution are relieved of payment only of those debts which were incurred prior to October 25, 1917." Dr. Idelson is of opinion that this decree in no way refers to insurance companies, but to manufacturing companies only. Mr. Justice Greer, as he then was, came, however, to the opposite conclusion in Sea Insurance Co. v. Rossia Insurance Company (17 Ll. L., 316), accepting the evidence of Mr. Krougliakoff in this respect in preference to that of Dr. Idelson. I am not sure whether Dr. Halpern regards the decree as referring to insurance companies, or merely as affording an useful analogy. But he certainly regards it as supporting in one way or another his view that the debt under the Inward Treaty has been extinguished. Mr. Krougliakoff, as I have already indicated, regards the decree as referring in one sense to insurance companies as well as manufacturing companies; but he does not agree that it relieves the insurance companies of their liabilities. He points out, and in my opinion truly, that private insurance companies are not "State enterprises," because private insurance companies were liquidated, and new State enterprises of insurance were set up "on the ruins of private insurance companies." But the State enterprises of insurance had no intention of taking upon themselves the obligation of meeting the liabilities incurred by the private insurance companies, and section 2 of the decree does not, in his opinion, do more than make this clear. With this opinion I agree. It is true that the section by using the word "relieved" seems to contemplate that the obligation had been previously undertaken by the State enterprises. I cannot, however, find that in the case of the insurance companies this was so in fact, though it was so apparently in certain other cases. And even if the State had taken over the obligation to discharge the debts of the insurance companies, the plaintiffs would not have been thereby discharged of their debts to the defendants in the absence of an express provision to that effect, or under some doctrine analogous to the English doctrine of novation. Assuming, therefore, that the decree of March 4, 1919, was intended to apply to insurance companies, as to which I need not express an opinion, it did not, in my judgment, destroy the debt of the plaintiffs under the Inward Treaty.

I must now refer to certain decrees relating to financial transactions in Russia that are relied upon by the plaintiffs as putting an end to their liability to the defendants. The first one which is dated June 16, 1917, prohibited the making of money transfers to foreign countries as well as payments of roubles to the accounts of persons or bodies abroad or to their representatives in Russia except with the consent of the Minister of Finance. By another one dated September 14, 1918, it is provided as follows: "There remains in force the prohibition for private persons, private firms and institutions and also for Government bodies to effect any settlements of accounts whatever with whomsoever abroad, even for obligations which have originated before the beginning of the War, without special permission of the credit Chancellery of the People's Commissariat of Finance." By the third one dated October 3, 1918, payment of roubles into accounts of persons and institutions situate abroad or their representatives in Russia were prohibited unless authorized by the same Chancellery. It is unnecessary to set out these three decrees at length. But if they be examined carefully it is clear that they were primarily intended for the purpose of supporting the rate of exchange and protecting Russian currency, and this was the view of Dr. Idelson. None of them purported to discharge persons in the position of the plaintiffs from their liability to other parties, and Mr. Krougliakoff said that they did not have the effect of doing so in Russian law. They merely prohibited the discharge of such liability in a particular way. There was nothing in them, so far as I can see, that in any way prevented the plaintiffs from discharging their liability to the defendants by a payment in London out of assets of the plaintiffs outside Russia, or by means of a set off against the defendants' liability to them under the Outward Treaties. In any case the prohibition was not an absolute one. A payment on or after December 1, 1918, could be made even in Petrograd if the consent of the Chancellery of the People's Commissariat of Finance were obtained. And if the plaintiffs are relying upon the prohibition as discharging them from all liability it is for them to show that they applied for such a consent and were refused, or that such an application would, if made, have necessarily been refused. This they have not done.

The plaintiffs next rely upon the Introductory Law relating to the Civil Code of the Soviet Republic. So far as material it is in these terms : "Par. 1. Civil Code is carried into effect from January 1, 1923. Par. 2. No disputes over civil legal relations which relations arose prior to November 7, 1917, are accepted for consideration by judicial or other institutions of the Republic. Par. 3. Disputes as to civil legal relations which relations have arisen between November 7, 1917, and the date when the Soviet Civil Code comes into force are determined by laws which were in force when such legal relations arose. Par. 4. As far as the legal relations which were allowed by laws in force at the moment when such relations arose are not sufficiently fully determined by the above mentioned laws, the provisions of the Soviet Civil Code are to be applied. Par. 5. Enlarging interpretation of the Civil Code of R.S.F.S.R. is permitted only in case if so required by the defence of the interests of the Workmen's and Peasants' State and of the toiling masses. Par. 6. Interpretation of provisions of the Code on the basis of laws of overthrown Governments and of practice of pre-revolutionary Courts is forbidden."

As to the meaning or effect of this Introductory Law in respect to the plaintiffs' debt under the Inward Treaty, the experts are by no means agreed. Shortly stated, the question upon which they are at issue is as to whether the law destroys merely the remedy or whether it also destroys the right. Dr. Idelson's view is that the right has been destroyed. But when his evidence is examined it appears that in his opinion it is only in some cases that the right is extinguished, and that in the others it is only the remedy that is taken away. When asked what the cases are in which the right is extinguished, he said : "The class of cases where the right is extinguished is the class of cases where the Soviet Government meant that the right should be abolished and the meaning or intention of the Soviet Government I have to get from other decrees." So far, therefore, as the Introductory Law is concerned, I may take it that the remedy alone is affected, and that if the right is abolished this must be due to some other decree, in which expression, as appears from other parts of his evidence, Dr. Idelson intended to include authoritative pronouncements as to the Soviet law. It is, indeed, extraordinarily difficult to understand, even in the case of such legislation as this, how the very same words can be construed as affecting the right in some cases and only the remedy in others. And prima facie, the law would seem to be dealing with the remedy only. Now I have already considered the decrees that are thought to have destroyed the right, and have given my reasons for thinking that they have not that effect. It remains, however, to consider the authoritative pronouncements as to the Soviet law that Dr. Idelson had in mind. These are two circulars issued by the People's Commissariat of Justice of August 28, 1923, and October 16, 1924, respectively, and are admittedly authoritative pronouncements. They are somewhat lengthy documents, and I need not occupy time by reading them. Dr. Idelson says that they show that in the view of Soviet jurists every insurance agreement died in Russia when the monopoly of insurance business was declared, but that all the agreements that could be enforced abroad remained in force. As a matter of construction, however, it would seem that the circulars are not directed to fire insurances at all. In any case I can find no indication in them that in the view of the Soviet jurists such a debt as that due from the plaintiffs under the Inward Treaty had been extinguished. Mr. Krougliakoff stated that the principle of the circulars would no doubt apply to fire insurances as well as life policies ; and by this I understand him to mean that the obligations of foreign fire offices outside the territory of the U.S.S.R. would be considered by Soviet jurists as remaining in force, even if their obligations within that territory should have been annulled. He pointed out, however, that although there was a specific decree annulling policies of life insurance, there never had been any specific decree annulling other contracts of insurance.

I think that I have now referred to all the decrees and regulations upon which the plaintiffs rely in support of their contention that their liability under the Inward Treaty has been extinguished, and have given my reasons for coming to the conclusion that this contention has not been made good. It only remains to deal with their defence of the Statute of Limitations.

The defendants' first answer to this is the Statute 4 and 5 Anne, chapter 3, section 19. The plaintiffs, they say, were at all material times "beyond the seas." I have already decided, however, that the plaintiffs were in December, 1918, carrying on business in London by their duly authorized agents. They were, as it seems to me at that time, and they continued thereafter to be, sufficiently resident here to enable them to be sued here by the defendants. But the defendants further contend that the letters from Mr. Dobrynin dated August 4, 1922, constitute acknowledgments of the debt sufficient to take the case out of the statute. I need not read them, as it is not denied by the plaintiffs that such letters are sufficient acknowledgments if Mr. Dobrynin had authority to make an acknowledgment of the plaintiffs' debt so as to bind them. Now Mr. Dobrynin had been the managing director and the general manager of the plaintiffs in Petrograd. As such, he would appear to have had ample authority to bind the plaintiffs unless his authority was determined by the decree of December 1, 1918. By Article 19 of the statutes of the plaintiff company the management of the company's affairs is declared to be the duty of the manager. By Article 27 the duties of the board of directors are defined as follows: "(1) To constantly control the Manager's actions, his precise execution of the Board's instructions and to watch over the safety of the Company's funds; (2) To appoint and dismiss, on the Manager's report, the Company's staff of officials and to fix their salaries and the remuneration for their services; (3) To establish general tables of premiums for the Manager's guidance; (4) To determine the limits of risks to be accepted by the Company; (5) To settle with what foreign insurance companies the Company is to enter into transactions of reinsurance, as well as to conclude obligatory contracts with other companies; (6) To authorize the payment of sums for losses insured; (7) To receive the interest on the Company's funds, as well as to buy, exchange or sell all kinds of stock belonging to the Company; and (8) To present to the Company the yearly reports and balances and to fix the amount of sums to be distributed as dividends and assigned to increase the reserve fund, conforming to the Statute." I conclude from this that though questions of general importance, such as the making of reinsurance treaties, were to be decided by the board, the general management of the plaintiffs' business, such as the adjustment of the quarterly accounts under a reinsurance treaty when made, was entrusted to the manager. That being so, Mr. Dobrynin had, in my opinion, authority to make on behalf of the plaintiffs a promise to pay the balance shown by the accounts to be due to the defendants under the Inward Treaty. But was this authority determined by the decree of December 1, 1918? In my opinion it was not. I have already given my reasons for coming to the conclusion that the authority of Middleton and Cater was not determined by that decree, and the same reasons lead me to the conclusion that the authority of Mr. Dobrynin also continued. Dr. Idelson was asked in cross-examination the question: Whether the decree by itself interfered with or took away the powers of the plaintiffs' agents, and he answered "No." The authority to act in matters relating to the affairs of the plaintiffs in Soviet Russia could no doubt have been determined by the liquidation, but there is no evidence that it was so determined. There was, indeed, no reason why it should have been. No insurances could be effected by the plaintiffs in Soviet territory after December 1, 1918, and practically all their assets in that territory had been confiscated. The business of the liquidators was merely to collect what assets remained and hand them over to the State. For it seems quite clear that they were never intended to pay any of the plaintiff company's liabilities. In such circumstances there would be no object in determining the authority of the company's various agents, who were powerless to do anything that could prejudicially affect the company's assets in Russia.

In my opinion the defendants' claim against the plaintiffs under the Inward Treaty is a valid and subsisting claim, and whatever is due to them in respect of such claim must be set off against the sum due to the plaintiffs under the Outward Treaties. It was suggested by the plaintiffs that having regard to the arbitration clause in the Inward Treaty there will be insuperable difficulties in attempting to ascertain in this country what is the amount so to be set off. I am not greatly impressed by this. It was stated in evidence by Dr. Idelson that the clause does not oust the jurisdiction of the Court, though for the purpose of deciding any question in dispute under the treaty it would be necessary to have expert evidence as to the principles and usages of insurance business in Russia. This is because the parties, to use the words of Dr. Idelson, "agreed not to settle their disputes in accordance with the strict law, but agreed to settle their disputes according to the principles and usages of the reinsurance business." It is, however, to be observed that these principles and usages are only brought into operation in regard to any question not specially mentioned in the treaty, and I see no reason for supposing that for the purpose of ascertaining the amount of the plaintiffs' indebtedness recourse will have to be made to such principles and usages. A difficulty might, it is true, have arisen from the fact that the books of the plaintiff company in Russia have in all probability been long since destroyed. The letter of Mr. Dobrynin, however, removes this difficulty if the defendants are willing to accept his figures. His account is not brought down to a later date than November, 1918; but it is highly improbable that any premiums would have been received after that time, or that any further losses would have been paid. Be this as it may, I cannot refuse the defendants the relief that they ask by their counterclaim merely by reason of the difficulty of ascertaining the amount due to them. It is alleged by the plaintiffs that at all material times the value of the rouble was so small that the sum due to the plaintiffs under the Outward Treaties will not be diminished appreciably by a set off. But the question as to the rate of exchange to be applied in ascertaining the defendants' claim in sterling was not argued before me, and must be left to be dealt with on the inquiry that I propose to direct. The amount found to be due in answer to that inquiry must be set off against the sum due to the plaintiffs under the Outward Treaties, and, if the parties are not able to agree, that sum must also be ascertained by taking an account.

The plaintiffs must have their costs of the action and the defendants their costs of the counterclaim, with the usual set off.

LONDON COUNTY COUNCIL v. HACKNEY BOROUGH COUNCIL.*

Replevin—Distress for non-payment of rates—No beneficial occupation of premises—Jurisdiction of justices to issue warrant—Maintainability of action.

Up to March 31, 1926, the plaintiffs, as education authority, had managed as an industrial school certain premises within the parish of which the defendants were the overseers of the poor. On that day the premises were closed and the plaintiffs' furniture, stores, documents, and other equipment were removed, with the exception of some furniture which was left in two rooms for a caretaker and of a few articles which were regarded as of so little value as scarcely to be worth removing. The caretaker remained on the premises with his family as a mere caretaker. Repairs to the premises were executed from time to time. The future use of the premises was in doubt until March, 1927, when plans were made which necessitated the erection of entirely new buildings, and work on them was started after April, 1927. The defendants rated the plaintiffs in respect of the premises for the half-years ending September 30, 1926, and March 31, 1927.

Held, that during the periods in question the plaintiffs were not in beneficial occupation of the premises in the sense that their occupation was of benefit or advantage to them in the performance of their public duties, and they were therefore not rateable.

When the plaintiffs refused to pay the rates the defendants seized a tramway-car belonging to the plaintiffs under a distress warrant issued by justices for the non-payment of the rates.

Held, that the plaintiffs could not recover damages for the seizure in an action of replevin because the jurisdiction of the justices to issue the distress warrant depended not on beneficial occupation of the premises by the plaintiffs, but simply on occupation within the parish.

Judgment was delivered in this action in which the London County Council claimed from the Mayor, Aldermen, and Councillors of the Metropolitan borough of Hackney damages in replevin for the seizure and detention of a tramway-car which, the plaintiffs alleged, the defendants had wrongfully seized and distrained in respect of certain rates by which the defendants had purported to rate and assess the plaintiffs, and which the plaintiffs alleged were not due and payable by them.

The defendants pleaded that the rates in question were due from the plaintiffs to the defendants and that their bailiff had seized and distrained the tramway-car in execution of a distress warrant issued by justices before whom the plaintiffs had appeared.

The facts and the arguments are fully stated in the judgment.

Mr. E. M. Konstam, K.C., and Mr. E. H. Tindal Atkinson appeared for the plaintiffs; Mr. Joshua Scholefield, K.C., and Mr. Hubert Hull for the defendants.

Mr. Justice Wright read the following considered judgment:—In this case the plaintiffs claim damages for the seizure by the defendants by their bailiff of a tramway-car, the plaintiffs' property, under a distress warrant issued by justices for non-payment of rates. The plaintiffs, having taken proceedings in replevin and given a replevin bond in the usual form, claim a declaration that the distress was illegal, and also damages and cancellation of the bond. The defendants claim that the rates were duly levied and were in arrear, that the distress warrant was issued on a determination by justices acting within their jurisdiction and that the question of the legality of the distress could not be raised in these proceedings.

The facts out of which the dispute arises are comparatively simple. The defendants are the overseers of the poor of the parish of St. John in the Hackney Union, in the County of London. Within their parish was a building called the Industrial School, Upton House, Urswick-road. Up to March 31, 1926, the plaintiffs, as the education authority, managed that building as an industrial school, the premises being vested in them in virtue of the Education (London) Act, 1903, and the Children Act, 1908. They had taken over the management of the industrial school from their predecessors, the London School Board. The Home Secretary, who is the central authority for industrial schools, had granted a certificate dated April 1, 1909, for the premises (the number of inmates being limited to 150) under the Children Act, 1908. Towards the end of 1925 the plaintiffs decided to close Upton House as an industrial school by reason of representations from the Home Secretary that, owing to the decrease in the number of committals to such schools, Upton House had become unnecessary. The Home Secretary had further declined to authorize a proposal by the plaintiffs to continue the building as a Central Industrial School. On November 21, 1925, the plaintiffs accordingly wrote to the Home Secretary resigning the certificate for the industrial school as from March 31, 1926, that being the close of their financial year. The Home Secretary, in reply, by a letter dated December 2, 1925, stated that six months' notice was necessary, and the school would accordingly cease to be a certified school on May 21, 1926, though it might be closed earlier. From the date of the Home Secretary's letter no further new boys could legally be received in the school, and from May 21, 1926, the premises could no longer be legally used as an industrial school. It was, in fact, closed as such on March 31, 1926.

The plaintiffs immediately proceeded to remove the furniture, stores, documents, and other equipment, the main removal being complete by April 10, 1926, and the residue by April 21, 1926. Some necessary furniture was, however, left in two rooms for a caretaker, and, in addition, two large wooden cupboards and an iron mangle were not taken away till the following September. The mangle was described as scrap iron and the cupboards could not be removed except by being broken up, when, as I infer from a minute, they were only fit for firewood. These articles were left in the building, not as valuable things needing a store place, but as things of so little value as scarcely to be worth removing. The caretaker, who was graded in the plaintiffs' service as a schoolkeeper, not because that truly described his functions, as there was no school to keep, but because the plaintiffs had no grade of caretaker, was a mere caretaker. He kept the place clean, answered the door, noted defects that needed repairs, and generally looked after the vacant premises. He lived at first in two rooms near the main door. Later, when joined by his family, he made a home with them in what had been the infirmary. The only persons who came were various workmen to repair defects in gas, plumbing, or roofing, and some architects and surveyors who came to take measurements and make plans with a view to the future use of the buildings. Gas, water, and electric light were left without being disconnected. Only the two former were used, and that only by the caretaker. The plaintiffs supplied the caretaker with coal.

After April, 1926, the future use to which the building might be put was in doubt. It was early suggested that it might be made into an elementary school; it necessitated large structural alterations to change a boarding school for 150 boys into a day school for 350. It was not till March 29, 1927, after many discussions, that it was finally decided to turn one part of the premises into an elementary school for 350 boys, and another part into offices for use by the plaintiffs as the education authority, and also to build an open-air school in the grounds. This last scheme involved entirely new buildings; the two former schemes involved very expensive structural alterations. The whole work, which commenced after April, 1927, and has only now, in May, 1928, been completed, cost about £12,000. The buildings are now ready for use for their new purposes. It was only after considerable doubt and discussion that this plan was decided on at the end of March, 1927. The plaintiffs were free to use the buildings for any of their purposes, or to sell them. Their valuer gave an estimate of value for the purposes of sale. There was some opposition in the educational committee to the idea of converting them in part into elementary school premises, since they would be less efficient, though less costly, than a newly-erected school building. They might have been pulled down and rebuilt as a school, or a housing scheme might have been carried out.

The rates in question duly appeared, as assessed on the premises, in the rate book, for the half-years ending September 30, 1926, and March 31, 1927. It is not disputed by the plaintiffs that the rate was, as regards form, duly made and confirmed. It is not disputed that the plaintiffs were in occupation of the premises during the material period. It is disputed that they were in beneficial occupation. It is accordingly disputed that they were duly assessed. The plaintiffs contend that there was no jurisdiction to rate them at all, as the only jurisdiction to rate is on the ground of beneficial occupation. The plaintiffs did not appeal against the rate, but they refused to pay. The defendants in due course lodged a complaint in respect of non-payment before the justices by a summons against the plaintiffs issued on May 14, 1927, which came on for hearing before the justices on June 16, 1927. The justices decided to issue a distress warrant. The plaintiffs did not ask for a special case for the opinion of the High Court. The distress was levied on a tramway car, the property of the plaintiffs, who did not appeal to quarter sessions but took proceedings in replevin, which have resulted in this action.

The main questions are, shortly, as follows:—(1) Was there beneficial occupation of the premises by the plaintiffs during the relevant period? (2) If not, are the plaintiffs entitled to take these proceedings? The defendants not only say that there was beneficial occupation, but they further say that if there was not the plaintiffs could only raise that issue by appeal from the rate in the first instance to quarter sessions, or, it may be, on the complaint before the justices, who were willing to state a case for the High Court, or by appeal to quarter sessions against the distress warrant. The plaintiffs reply that, as they had no beneficial occupation, there was no jurisdiction to rate them and any proceedings before justices or quarter sessions were coram non judice and of no effect, so that the seizure under the distress warrant was illegal. Both these issues have been fully argued before me, and I shall give judgment on each.

Mr. Konstam took, but not very strenuously, a further point, viz., that the rate was in any case bad on its face, because the assessment was made on "the Industrial School, Upton House, Urswick-road." The defendants' answer was that the description was a correct description of the actual premises, even if the use of the building as an industrial school had been discontinued. I think that answer is sound.

I shall deal first with the question whether the occupation of the premises by the plaintiffs was beneficial during the year of assessment. It is now clear law that "beneficial" in this connexion does not connote pecuniary profit. It is enough in the case of a public body, such as the plaintiffs, that the occupation is of benefit or advantage to them in the performance of their public duties. Nor, in these proceedings, can any question be raised of the quantum of benefit, if there be any benefit. Any question of quantum can only be raised on appeal against the rate. That the plaintiffs are in occupation is not disputed. They are owners of the premises and no one else is in occupation. By their caretaker they are in visible occupation. But occupation is not enough. The essentials to constitute rateability are thus stated by Lord Atkinson in Liverpool Corporation v. Chorley Union Assessment Committee (29 The Times L.R., 246; [1913] A.C., 197, at p. 208): "(1) Does the appellant occupy this cemetery"—that being the locus in question—"for which he is rated. (2) If he does, is his occupation a thing of value?" To make the plaintiffs rateable both these questions must be answered, mutatis mutandis, in the affirmative. It is the second question which is now being considered.

The main contention of Mr. Scholefield is that the plaintiffs had beneficial occupation because they were keeping the premises in reserve for the purposes of their undertaking, and holding them available for use for any of their purposes whenever they should require them, and had at no time abandoned the intention to use them for some educational purposes, even if not the same as those for which they had used them previously. It was contended that with regard to vacant buildings the issue of rateability must be determined by considering what the owner's intention was, and the relevant intention of the plaintiffs in this case in the rating period in question was, as the contention ran, to use the premises in the future for some purpose of their undertaking. To escape rateability, it was contended, the plaintiffs must show that in the material period they had decided completely to abandon any user of the premises, as, for instance, by definitely deciding to let or sell. It was also said that the plaintiffs were putting the premises to the only use which they had intended or contemplated in the relevant period, viz., to keep them in reserve and available for any purpose when required.

Apart from principle and authority to which I shall refer, I do not think that these contentions are in consonance with the facts. The premises were before April, 1926, used as an industrial school and not otherwise. They were only capable rebus sic stantibus of being so used, and no other user had been intended or contemplated. They could not any longer, legally, after April, 1926, be so used, nor had the plaintiffs any longer any intention of so using them. They could not be used for any other purpose, educational or other, without elaborate alterations incapable of being completed within the year. The original user having been finally abandoned, no fresh plan of employment of the premises was decided on till March 29, 1927, when a plan was formed which could only be put into service after elaborate structural changes. In the meantime the plaintiffs could well have sold or let the premises, or have decided to prepare to turn them to uses other than educational.

I think that the only conclusion on these facts is that the premises in the relevant period were neither being used nor capable of being used for any beneficial purpose of the plaintiffs but were simply vacant premises. They were not being kept in reserve in the same sense as a furnished house, ready for the owner's occupation at any time, is kept in reserve, or as a warehouse, empty indeed, but ready at any time to receive goods for storage, is kept in reserve, as in Rex v. Melladew (23 The Times L.R., 207 ; [1907] 1 K.B., 192), or as the empty warehouse kept by the owners "as a 'standby' for use at any moment when the exigencies of their business might make it desirable to so use it, and in readiness for such use," was kept in reserve in Borwick v. Southwark Corporation ([1909] 1 K.B., 78). These seem to be the strongest authorities relied on by the defendants, but they appear to be clearly distinguishable from this case. In those cases, the premises, without alteration, were kept ready for a definite employment, and this was what was contemplated and intended and was the reason why they were acquired. In the present case there was no employment for which the premises were suited. Their future employment was uncertain and under deliberation and they could not be made ready for any probable prospective employment without elaborate re-equipment.

The principles applicable to vacant buildings or houses have been discussed in certain cases, not always very clearly. Lord Atkinson, following Lord Halsbury, put the matter thus in the case of Liverpool Corporation v. Chorley Union Assessment Committee (supra, at p. 211), to which I have already referred : "When the statute, therefore, enacts that the occupier of a house should be rated, it must mean that the person to be rated shall occupy the house as a house ; that is, that he shall use the house for the purpose of living in it, or sojourning in it, or working in it, keeping animals in it, storing other chattels in it, or using it for some such other purpose as houses may reasonably be devoted to ; and that, as a vacant house is not used for any of these purposes, it is not occupied as a house within the meaning of the statute." It is, I think, clear that in this sense there was no user by the plaintiffs of their premises in the material period. In Rex v. Melladew (supra, at p. 203) Lord Justice Farwell puts the question thus : "The test, in a case like the present, of business premises, appears to me to be, Has the person to be rated such use of the tenement as the nature of the tenement and of the business connected with it renders it reasonable to infer was fairly within his contemplation in taking or retaining it ? " Lord Justice Buckley, in Liverpool Corporation v. Chorley Union Assessment Committee (28 The Times L.R., 177 ; [1912] 1 K.B., 270, at p. 288), thus states the problem : "Are the corporation using the land for the purpose of their business or adventure and deriving benefit from it ? " Such questions, I think, could only here be answered in a sense favourable to the plaintiffs' case.

Nor can the defendants, I think, derive any support for their contentions from cases of seasonal trades where in any year the profits can only be made during a short time and at the expense of a period of dormancy or vacancy, which, however, is a necessary condition of the fruitful or profitable period, such as the case of a shop in a seaside watering place (Southend Corporation v. White, 17 The Times L.R., 5) or a boarding-house in a seaside town with a short season (Gage v. Wren, 18 The Times L.R., 699), where the vacancy of the premises during the idle season, both of residents and furniture, did not afford a relief from rateability. In the present case the period of vacancy follows on a complete cessation of the original user and an absence at the relevant times of any intended or contemplated new employment.

The relevant intention must, I think, have regard to employment of the premises in the rating year, and to an employment for which they were suited or readily capable of being suited in their then actual condition. This was the ground of the decision in Bootle Overseers v. Liverpool Warehousing Company (17 The Times L.R., 550), which turned on a finding that in the rating year there was no intention to use the premises. This is quite different from keeping premises definitely and intentionally in reserve for purposes for which they are prepared. In such a case the contemplated and intended user is being enjoyed, just as the intended user was being enjoyed in different circumstances in Liverpool Corporation v. Chorley Union Assessment Committee (supra). Mr. Scholefield also relied on the case of Hackney Borough Council v. Metropolitan Asylums Board (40 The Times L.R., 645), but in that case beneficial occupation was held to be established from "an accumulation of facts," each of such facts being "one of small but not negligible moment." I cannot deduce from that case any guidance for the present case, which, as I regard the facts, is simply the case of an owner who has abandoned the user of certain premises in the way for which they had been acquired and equipped and has not decided as to their future disposal at any relevant time.

I shall consider next the contention that there is beneficial occupation (a) because of the presence of the caretaker, and (b) because of the cupboards and mangle left on the premises till September, 1926. In my judgment, neither of these facts constitutes any evidence of beneficial occupation in the circumstances of this case. The caretaker may be necessary to protect the premises from injury and damage and to facilitate the entry of the owners or of any persons calling on their behalf. But rating is on the occupier, that is on the beneficial occupier and not on the owner, and I do not think that the caretaker in this case fulfilled any functions towards the beneficial user or enjoyment of the premises during the year in question, however useful he may have been in safeguarding the interests of the plaintiffs as owners. It has been held that a mere caretaker does not render a house liable to be rated (North Dublin Union v. Scott, 1 Ir.C.L.R., 76). See also Rex v. Morgan (2 A. and E., 618). I may also refer to the observations of Lord Alverstone, C.J., in the case of Bertie v. Walthamstow Overseers (68 J.P., 545, at page 546). If a man is a mere caretaker put in to preserve and guard the house from depredation—in other words, to take care of it—the master is not liable to be rated, because the master has no beneficial occupation. In the case where it was held that the presence of the caretaker constituted beneficial occupation by the owner, since the caretaker himself could not be rated as occupier (Yates v. Chorlton-on-Medlock Union, 47 J.P., 630), either the caretaker was cultivating the ground and benefit was being derived therefrom (Hicks v. Dunstable Overseers, 48 J.P., 326) or the caretaker was rendering valuable services in other respects to the owner (Bertie v. Walthamstow Overseers, supra). In these cases it was held that there was beneficial occupation, but it has not been so held where the caretaker was merely a caretaker, as I find him to have been in this case.

Nor is the presence till September, 1926, of the two cupboards and the mangle on the premises any evidence, in my opinion, of beneficial occupation.

Leaving furniture in a house may render it rateable as stated by Mr. Justice Lush in Reg. v. St. Pancras Assessment Committee (2 Q.B.D., 581, at p. 588) : "The owner of a vacant house . . . is not rateable for it as an occupier. If, however, he furnishes it, and keeps it ready for habitation whenever he pleases to go to it, he is an occupier, though he may not reside in it one day in a year." The reason for this is not that it is simply a storehouse for the furniture, but that the owner is having such beneficial enjoyment of it as he desires. It is ready for him whenever he wants to reside in it. No doubt in such a case it might be also regarded as the subject of beneficial occupation as a storehouse for the furniture which must be stored and safeguarded somewhere. On these principles, in Staley v. Castleton Overseers (5 B. and S., 505) it was held in respect of a cotton mill, which owing to bad trade it did not pay to work : "Regarding the mill merely as a storehouse for valuable machinery which it is important to keep in a state fit for use, it is obviously property for which some persons would give a rent" ; and similarly, in Harter v. Salford Overseers (6 B. and S., 591), a mill not being worked was held rateable as a warehouse for the machinery necessary for its working when required. These cases, in my opinion, afford no analogy to the present case, where the chattels, as I find the facts, were kept on the premises simply because they were of no practical importance and, though they had to be removed before any valuable use could be had of the premises, were not worth the trouble of removing for their own sake. It seems to me to be fallacious to say that these buildings were beneficially occupied to any extent, merely because these unwieldy and obsolete articles were not taken away earlier.

I ought in passing to notice Mr. Scholefield's argument, not perhaps strenuously pressed, that there was some beneficial occupation because the premises were repaired from time to time and because the architects and surveyors of the plaintiffs visited them. The former is, I think, merely a matter of the preservation of the premises for the plaintiffs as owners and not any act of beneficial occupation. The latter is of the same character, and in any case has no reference to actual beneficial occupation, but only to future or prospective valuable user.

In my judgment, for the above reasons, the plaintiffs were not beneficial occupiers and were not rateable in the year in question, but that still leaves the further question whether they can succeed in this action. The action being an action of replevin, they have to show that the distress was unlawful, and this involves that the warrant issued by the justices was issued without jurisdiction. Such actions have been maintained where rates have been levied on premises which a person did not occupy, or which were outside the period, as in Milward v. Caffin (2 W. Bl., 1330) and Bristol Guardians v. Wait (1 A. and E., 264), or where the rate was bad on its face. A more modern instance where a claim in replevin succeeded, on the ground that the plaintiffs were not occupiers but licensees, is Rochdale Canal Company v. Brewster (10 The Times L.R., 595 ; [1894] 2 Q.B., 852). The reason is that in such a case both the allowance of the rate by the justices and its confirmation by Quarter Sessions on appeal, if appeal be taken, and the proceedings before the justices who grant the distress warrant are proceedings coram non judice and are void of legal effect.

Mr. Konstam has, however, contended that the basis of the justices' jurisdiction depends not on occupation, that is actual occupation, but on beneficial occupation, and hence that a distress warrant against an occupier who is not a beneficial occupier is without jurisdiction because the proceedings are coram non judice, and hence, the warrant being without jurisdiction and bad, the action in replevin will lie. He admits that no authority in terms justifies this contention and there are decisions and dicta to the contrary effect, but he prays in support of his argument the case of Mersey Docks and Harbour Board Trustees v. Cameron (11 H.L., 443), where, in an action for replevin, the House of Lords heard and determined the question whether the occupiers were beneficial occupiers, and he argues that, as jurisdiction cannot be given by consent, the House of Lords must have assumed that this issue of beneficial occupation was a relevant issue to be determined where the validity of a distress warrant was in question. I do not think that the latter contention is sound. What happened in that case was that the point was waived by the overseers in order to obtain the decision of the House of Lords on so vital a question of principle as that case raised. Their Lordships do not mention the question, but it is thus stated in the opinion of the majority of the Judges, read by Mr. Justice Blackburn, at page 461 : "The question whether replevin lies has been waived, and therefore it is not necessary farther to consider whether in such a case the more proper expression would be that the person in possession of the property was not an occupier at all within the meaning of the Statute of Elizabeth, so that the overseer had no jurisdiction to make the rate, and consequently that the levying of it might be resisted in replevin or trespass ; or whether, as seems to have been the opinion of the Court of Queen's Bench in Birmingham Overseers v. Shaw (10 Q.B., 868) and Reg. v. Bradshaw (29 L.J.M.C., 176), he is an occupier, whom, as such, the overseers have jurisdiction to tax, though on appeal the rate must be reduced to nothing. Whichever may be the true mode of enunciating the position, it is clear that there can be no valid rate unless the occupation be such as to be of value ; and if the words 'beneficial occupation' are to be understood as merely signifying that the occupation is of value (which is obviously the sense in which the phrase is used in many of the cases cited at the Bar), it is clear that a beneficial occupation is essential as the foundation of the rate." I confess I feel some doubt how Mr. Justice Blackburn would have answered the question he so propounds. But in the Court of Common Pleas (9 C.B.N.S., 812) judgment was given by the majority of the Court (Chief Justice Earle, Mr. Justice Williams, and Mr. Justice Keating—Mr. Justice Willes doubting) against the plaintiffs, not on the merits of the case, but simply on the ground that replevin did not lie, where the only question was whether the occupation was or was not beneficial. They held themselves bound by the principles enunciated in the earlier decisions of Birmingham Overseers v. Shaw (supra) and Reg. v. Bradshaw (supra), deferring to them as a matter of duty, and leaving all further consideration for the Court of Error.

The principle of these cases (which were cases of mandamus, not of replevin) was thus stated in Reg. v. Bradshaw (supra) : "Birmingham Overseers v. Shaw (supra) adopts and confirms the case of Marshall v. Pitman (9 Bing., 595), which establishes the principle that where there is visible occupation of property within the rating parish, and the party rated objects that, although he is in the visible occupation of the premises, his occupation is altogether devoid of benefit to himself—that is matter for which he must seek his remedy by appeal to the Quarter Sessions." I think that, as a Judge of first instance, I am bound by this decision. Mr. Konstam, however, contends that, though there has been no case of an action of replevin where, there being occupation, there was no beneficial occupation, yet I ought not to follow the case of Mersey Docks and Harbour Board v. Cameron in the Court of Common Pleas (supra), because by subsequent cases the jurisdiction of magistrates, in considering questions on proceedings for distress warrants, has been enlarged. In Reg. v. Bradshaw (supra) it was held that the duties of magistrates were ministerial, and that when called upon to enforce a rate good on the face of it they had no jurisdiction to go into the question of beneficial occupation. It is clear that that view is no longer accepted or acted upon. It was held in the case of Fourth City Mutual Building Society v. East Ham Churchwardens and Overseers ([1892] 1 Q.B., 661) that justices in proceedings for a distress warrant were authorized to inquire into objections and state a case for the opinion of the High Court, so that their duties were not simply ministerial. The power to state a case depended on the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1884. Cases have accordingly been thereafter from time to time stated by justices, and their jurisdiction was thus defined by Mr. Justice Atkin (giving the judgment of himself and Mr. Justice Bray) in the case of Whenman v. Clark ([1915] 1 K.B., 548, at p. 559): "In Reg. v. Hannam (2 The Times L.R., 234) Lord Esher and Lord Justice Cotton laid down a rule that where there can be an appeal to quarter sessions the justices have only to enforce the rate, and are bound to assume the rate to be good if the property is within the district. This was in the year 1886, and if this rule had been uniformly acted on since we should have been bound to follow it, but the cases which I have mentioned show that this is not so, and that other exceptions have been made, and it is open to this Court to lay down a general rule which will embrace these exceptions; and we think the rule to be laid down is that the justices have jurisdiction if the question is whether the defendant ought to have been rated at all, or, if at all, for the full rateable value." That was on the hearing of an application for a distress warrant for non-payment of rate. In the same case, in the Court of Appeal ([1916] 1 K.B., 94), that rule was adopted by Lord Justice Swinfen Eady and Lord Justice Pickford, with the qualification "where the material facts are not really in dispute." I gather that in such cases as the present there is seldom any real dispute on the material facts. Notwithstanding some doubts expressed obiter in Shillito v. Hinchliffe ([1922] 2 K.B., 236), the rule thus expressed has been acted upon, as for instance in the case of Hackney Borough Council v. Metropolitan Asylums Board (supra), to which I have already referred, where the case was stated by the justices on the question of beneficial occupation.

But though the practice, or, as I think, the law as to the scope of the justices' jurisdiction in such cases has been thus extended since Reg. v. Bradshaw (supra), I do not think that this extension affects the law established by the authorities cited as to the foundation or origin of their jurisdiction, which I feel bound to hold still depends simply on occupation within the parish, and not on beneficial occupation. What gives jurisdiction is a different matter from the scope of jurisdiction when once it is given. As I am deciding the matter simply on the basis of authority, I do not consider it necessary or desirable to consider it further, or to discuss further the difficult question of precisely defining the principles necessary to ascertain, in the case of inferior tribunals, what goes to absence of jurisdiction on the one hand and erroneous exercise of jurisdiction on the other, or to discuss the balance of expediency in procedure having regard to the complicated inter-relationship between justices, quarter sessions on appeal, and the High Court on mandamus and similar proceedings and case stated. It is enough that the defendants rely on the point which I have been considering and in my opinion it is covered by authority binding on me. I, therefore, hold that the claim in replevin is not maintainable.

There must be judgment for the defendants. I shall give them judgment with costs, subject to the condition that they will pay to the plaintiffs the costs of the issue which has been tried before me and on which the defendants have failed so far as I am concerned—namely, the issue of beneficial occupation.

THE PENELOPE.*

Ship — Charterparty — Coal cargoes — Strike clauses—Coal strike of 1926—Embargo on coal exports—Frustration of adventure—Termination of charterparty.

By a charterparty dated March 24, 1926, the plaintiffs chartered the defendants' steamship to run consecutive voyages with cargoes of coal from one of the South Wales ports to one or other of specified Italian or Sicilian ports for a period of "twelve months as and from date of notice of readiness to load for first voyage." The charter was on the printed form of the Chamber of Shipping Welsh Coal Charter, 1896, and contained the ordinary clauses as to strikes and lock-outs, with the addition of the following written clause: "Steamer not to be ordered to any loading port at which there is a strike in force. Steamer to be free to interpose a substantially similar voyage if charterers unable forthwith to order steamer to another loading port stipulated in charter, free of strike."

In May, 1926, the defendant shipowners, through their agents, and in accordance with the provisions of the charterparty, gave notice to the plaintiff charterers that the ship would be ready to load about the first week in June, and they asked for orders as to the port of loading. Meanwhile the coal strike had begun, resulting in a total prohibition of coal exports by the British Government, and on June 12 the charterers replied that they could not order the vessel to a port to load, and must leave the owners to make their own arrangements. Thereupon the owners, under the written clause in the charterparty, arranged to interpose two "similar" voyages, after which, as the strike was still proceeding, and as the charterers were still unable to order the ship to a loading port, the owners took independent action and chartered the vessel for voyages to America and back to Naples, Huelva, and Rouen. At the end of November, when the strike had become restricted in its operation (although the Government embargo upon the export of coal remained in force until December 17), the charterers notified the shipowners that the ship must be ready to carry out the charter within a reasonable time after the settlement of the strike. The shipowners replied that by reason of the prolonged strike and the Governmental embargo on coal exports the commercial venture had been frustrated, and the contract therefore became null and void. In these circumstances the charterers claimed damages for breach of contract.

* Reported by A. W. Grant, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Held, that the total impossibility of any export of coal from the South Wales ports for a period of upwards of six months was a circumstance not contemplated by the parties which had prevented the performance of the charter according to its true intent, and that, the charterers not having been "ready and willing" to perform their obligations under the charterparty at the material times, the shipowners were justified in treating the contract as at an end.

This was an action brought by Cleeves Western Valleys Anthracite Collieries, Limited, and Luigi Monge, an Italian coal importer, against the owners of the Greek steamship Penelope, for damages for breach of contract under a charterparty dated March 24, 1926. The case arose out of the prolonged cessation of work in the collieries of the United Kingdom during the coal strike of 1926, and the consequent embargo by the British Government upon coal exports.

The charterparty was in the form known as the Chamber of Shipping Welsh Coal Charter, 1896, and was stated "to be in force for twelve months as and from date of notice of readiness to load for first voyage, steamer to run consecutive voyages . . . . and to make as many voyages as she can over the said period." The ship was expected to be ready to load "between May 20 and June 20 next, steamer giving charterers 14 days' notice of vessel's expected readiness to load the first cargo." The charterparty contained the usual printed clauses as to strikes, &c., as follows: "In the event of any stoppage or stoppages arising from any of the above causes"—(strikes, lock-outs, or any dispute between masters and men)—"continuing for a period of six running days from the time of the vessel being ready to load, this charter shall, provided, however, that no cargo shall have been shipped on board the vessel previous to such stoppage or stoppages, become null and void. In the event of such stoppage or stoppages commencing after the vessel is ready to load, and continuing for six running days, then this charter shall, at the expiration of such period, provided that no cargo shall have been shipped on board the vessel previous to such stoppage or stoppages, become null and void. If at the commencement of such stoppage or stoppages the vessel is on demurrage, then, provided that no cargo has been shipped and the stoppage extends to not less than 75 per cent. of the collieries in South Wales and Monmouthshire working steam coal (including the colliery working the coal for which the vessel is stemmed), the charterers may at any time during such stoppage after the expiration of three days from the commencement thereof give three days' written notice that they are prepared to cancel this charter, and from and after the expiration of such notice no further demurrage shall be payable in respect of the time lost through such stoppage. . . . On receipt of such notice the vessel may either thereupon sail, or the owners may, within 24 hours of its receipt, give the charterers written notice of their intention that the vessel shall remain until the termination of the stoppage, and in such event the charterers shall, upon the termination of the stoppage, load the vessel under this charter. . . . In the event of the owners not giving such notice as above mentioned, then, upon payment of the demurrage due to the vessel, this charter shall become null and void."

Admittedly, at the time when the charterparty was entered into, serious labour difficulties were foreseen by the parties, and a clause in writing was added to the charter to the following effect: "(16) Steamer not to be ordered to any loading port at which there is a strike in force. Steamer to be free to interpose a substantially similar voyage if charterers unable forthwith to order steamer to another loading port stipulated in charter, free of strike."

In due course the shipowners, through their agents, gave notice to the charterers that the ship would be ready to load about the first week in June, and asked for orders as to her loading port. Meanwhile, the coal strike had commenced, and an embargo had been placed by the Government on exports of coal. Therefore on June 12 the charterers wrote that they could not order the vessel to a port to load, and must "leave the owners to make their own arrangements." The shipowners thereupon interposed two substituted voyages, which were agreed by the parties to be within the terms of the above clause 16. At the end of the second of these substituted voyages the shipowners again called upon the charterers for orders, and when on September 9 the charterers replied that they could not give any instructions, the shipowners chartered the ship for voyages from Holland to Montreal and from Montreal to Naples, Huelva, and Rouen. On November 29, by which time the strike had become restricted in its operation (although the embargo on coal exports continued), the charterers wrote threatening a claim for damages if the strike should end before the Montreal-Naples-Huelva-Rouen voyage was completed, and added: "The owners should be prepared to give us the steamship within a reasonable time after the settlement of the strike." The shipowners, in reply, set up the contention that the contract was put an end to by the prolonged strike and prohibition of coal exports, which had wholly destroyed or entirely altered the identity of the commercial venture provided for by the charterparty. On December 17 the embargo was removed, and after negotiations for a settlement had failed the charterers issued their writ. They denied by their pleadings that there had been a frustration of the contract; and they contended that the delay which had occurred had been contemplated by the parties when the contract was made, that the parties had treated the charterparty throughout as a subsisting and effective contract, and that the shipowners had waived their rights (if any) to treat the contract as at an end.

Mr. G. P. Langton, K.C., and Sir Robert Aske appeared for the plaintiffs ; Mr. C. R. Dunlop, K.C., and Mr. H. O. O'Hagan for the defendants.

LORD MERRIVALE read the following judgment:— The plaintiffs, a joint stock company having offices in South Wales, and an Italian coal importer, Signor Monge, are jointly interested in coal exports from the Bristol Channel ports to Italy. The defendants are sued as owners of a Greek steamship, the Penelope, and so far as appears from the evidence, Speridian Paramythiotis, who was a witness in the case, is the owner. In this judgment he is described as the defendant.

The plaintiffs bring their action to recover damages for breach of contract under a charter of the Penelope made in March, 1926. By the charterparty it was agreed that during twelve months from a date to be fixed between May 20, 1926, and June 20, 1926, the ship should be employed in carrying successive cargoes of coal from one of the South Wales ports to one or other of the specified Italian or Sicilian ports.

The differences between the parties arose by reason of the interruption of industry in May, 1926, known as the general strike, and the prolonged cessation of work in the collieries of the kingdom during 1926, known as the coal strike. The plaintiffs allege that in December, 1926, when performance of the agreement was practicable, it was wrongfully refused by the defendants, to the loss of the plaintiffs. The defendants, by their defence, allege that by reason of the coal strike "the commercial venture provided for by the charterparty was wholly destroyed and/or its identity wholly altered," and that this contract between the parties thereby became null and void.

By the pleadings a question is raised with regard to an accidental stranding of the Penelope in the course of a voyage from Huelva to Rouen. It was little discussed during the hearing, and I may dismiss it as a suggested material element in the case by stating, as I find to have been the fact, that the stranding took place without default of the defendant, and that the questions on which the plaintiffs' action and the defendant's answer depend do not, in my opinion, depend upon any matter connected with or arising from the stranding, or consequent detention at Rouen, of the vessel.

The main issue at the hearing was whether the contract was put an end to by the coal strike, and counsel dealt with this matter on the footing of the principles of law which are illustrated in numerous cases in the House of Lords, mostly brought about by events of the Great War, in which there was discussed the frustration of contracts by unforeseen causes preventing their performance. This case is, however, complicated by the admitted fact that serious labour difficulties were foreseen when the charter was made, and that it contains a clause relating to possible strikes. Moreover, for a considerable time after performance of the charter was due and the coal strike prevented it, each party anticipated that the Penelope might sooner or later carry coal for the plaintiffs on the terms of the charter and acted on this supposition. There is a further complication by reason of disputes as to the authority by which the brokers who negotiated the charter gave information and made representations of various kinds during a period of many months after the charterparty had been signed and while it was impossible of fulfilment. The brokers had interests of their own in the matter, inasmuch as their remuneration for the negotiation of the contract was a commission on profits earned thereunder. The plaintiffs instructed Messrs. Petters and Co., of Cardiff, from time to time, as to the steps which they should take with regard to the matter in dispute. The defendant was not shown to have given to any one any general authority to act for him and, except where his own letters show it, I think he did not.

Before attempting to apply to the case the legal principles which are invoked by the parties, it is essential to appreciate the terms of the contract, the situation which supervened upon it and is said to have caused frustration, and the effect from time to time of the conduct of the parties, not only upon their original rights and duties, but upon their obligations as changed, if they were changed, by the various occurrences in the course of their mutual dealings. Under the charterparty the owners were to take the first step. They were to give to the charterers 14 days' notice of expected readiness to load a cargo at one of the specified ports. Next the charterers were to specify a port. Then the vessel was to be brought to roads. Mr. Petters, of Swansea, took upon himself, without authority, to write into the contract a word which was to require the bringing of this ship into Mumbles Roads, but that does not affect the respective obligations of the parties, and has not added, as it might have done, to the necessary complications of the case. To the vessel on or before her arrival in the roads the charterers were to specify a dock at the specified Bristol Channel port to which they required the vessel to proceed. There the charterers were to produce, and the vessel was to receive, cargo of the agreed quantity and character. Such cargo the vessel was to convey to the specified Mediterranean port and there deliver it to the consignees. Liability of the charterers for demurrage is prescribed and limited by the charter, and there are protective exceptions in favour of the charterers in special events arising in normal cases. A strike of workmen during loading is one of the contemplated possibilities, and there are provisions that if a stoppage from a specified cause shall continue for six running days after the vessel is ready to load, or commences then and continues for that period, then, provided that no cargo shall have been shipped, the charter shall become null and void. There is an option to the charterers also in some cases of the same class to give to the owners the option of cancelling the charter, and if the owners do not exercise their option the contract leaves the charterers free to determine the charter upon payment of accrued demurrage. The charter was not a mere time charter. It was expressed "to be in force for twelve months as and from notice of readiness to load for the first voyage, the steamer to run consecutive voyages, that is, out with cargo returning in ballast, and to make as many voyages as she can over the said period." Added to the common form of clauses and the provisions contained in the clause last cited were terms—now of special importance—inserted by the parties to meet labour difficulties. These are worded as follows: "Steamer not to be ordered to any loading port at which there is a strike in force. Steamer to be free to interpose a substantially similar voyage if charterers unable forthwith to order steamer to another loading port stipulated in charter, free of strike." It is necessary to observe and bear in mind which of the parties had the veto and the initiative under the two parts of this clause. On the question of urgency which arose at the hearing, I have come to the conclusion that Messrs. Petters and Co. were not the defendant's agents to alter the charter by inserting the word

"Mumbles," and that the defendant did not ratify the alteration; that they had no authority at any time to vary the terms of the charter, that they had no authority at any time after it had been executed to vary the terms of the charter, and that in the instance where they and the London brokers, Messrs. Stavroudis, differ to some extent in their version of the transaction in question, the account of Messrs. Stavroudis should be accepted. Messrs. Stavroudis, as the defendant's brokers, kept him informed of facts material to be known by him, and had authority to inform the plaintiffs through Messrs. Petters or directly of the various matters of which they from time to time informed them, and on the defendant's behalf to require a specified action under the charterparty which they from time to time required, but no authority to agree upon any variation of the terms of the charterparty. Such variation as in fact occurred is that resulting from conduct, and not from express bargain. The charters for the steamer made after the conclusion of the contract between the parties in March, 1926, were made on the direct instructions of the defendant, and he gave no general authority to a broker to conclude contracts. Having disposed of some preliminaries, I proceed to state the course of events under the contract.

The charter having been signed on March 24, 1926, the outlook as to labour troubles became progressively worse. On May 1 the coal strike began and involved a universal stoppage of work in the mines from which coal for the loading of the Penelope was to be obtained. On May 1 Stavroudis wrote to Messrs. Petters and Co. for the information of the plaintiffs that the ship would proceed to the Mediterranean, and would return to Swansea in ballast, "provided, of course, the strike is settled," that the notice of readiness stipulated for in the charterparty would be formally handed to the charterers in due course, and that the vessel would be ready in Swansea, "assuming the strike is ended," about the first week in June. After later correspondence to the same effect they, at the end of May, directed Petters to inquire of the charterers to what port they wished the Penelope to proceed, impressing upon them at the same time the owners' rights under the special clauses of the charter. They directed notice of readiness to load to be given to the charterers, and emphasized as strongly as possible the fact that the charter required of them action which would bind them to load in due course, or to take the agreed consequences. They were entitled to expect an equally definite answer, but they did not get it. The substance of what was said was that "until the strike is settled we cannot give you any information or orders." The plaintiff company, however, wrote to Signor Monge in Italy: "We fear they can insist upon our making a declaration." They apparently entertained at the same time an unwarranted notion that the charterers would be entitled to treat the charter as running for 12 months, not from her first notified readiness to load, but "from the date when the charterers are first able to load." Stavroudis insisted on the owners' right, and on June 12 the plaintiffs wrote that they could not order the vessel to a port to load, and must "leave the owners to make their own arrangements." No orders being given, a substituted charter was arranged. In course of the substituted voyage, Tunis-London-Swansea, the defendant arrived in Swansea—he had by this time taken command of the Penelope, and he then saw the representatives of the plaintiff company. Stavroudis had suggested through Petters, that instead of voyages which the defendant could make of right there should be, without prejudice to the charterers, an agreement for interposing a voyage to the United States. That substituted voyages such as the defendant was entitled at his choice to make could only be made with difficulty appears clearly on the evidence. Paramythiotis discussed the situation with the plaintiffs. They declared their inability to order the ship to a dock for loading. They rejected the suggestion of agreement upon a United States voyage; they dissented from a suggested chartering from Rotterdam. The defendant, left to his own resources, chartered the vessel for a voyage from Stettin to Manchester. This was a second voyage treated by consent of the parties as an interposed voyage under the special clause in this charter. During the discussions at Swansea a suggestion was made that the charter should be converted into a forward contract for voyages to be made during a period of 12 months, to date from a time at which the defendant should be able to tender the ship for loading after the termination of the strike. The correspondence and the oral testimony create uncertainties as to the origin of this idea, and as to the extent to which the parties respectively then appreciated their relative positions. This is immaterial, however, as Signor Monge informed the plaintiffs that he preferred to leave "things as they are," and nothing of the kind was agreed.

A critical period in the case was reached when the Penelope arrived at Manchester on the second substituted voyage. The defendant, with apparent appreciation of his rights, called for orders from the plaintiffs. They replied on September 9, through Petters: "We cannot give any instructions." Nearly three months had now elapsed since the defendant originally tendered the vessel to the plaintiffs. According to the evidence on both sides one-fourth of the series of voyages by which the defendant was to earn freights from the plaintiffs had been forgone. The coal strike showed no signs of probable early settlement. In this condition of affairs the defendant resolved upon independent action. Stavroudis wrote him on September 9 that he was entirely free to "interpolate another voyage as stipulated in your charter." He elected not to do so. Disregarding the objection of the plaintiffs in their conversation with him at Swansea, he accepted an offer received by him from Stavroudis of a charter from a Dutch port to Montreal and thence to Naples. Petters knew of this in due course. The plaintiffs were only directly informed later. The defendant's account of his reasons for accepting a charter in breach of the plaintiffs' charterparty was this: "Till I was at Manchester I had my mind for the strike to finish and then to deliver the ship to Cleeves. After Manchester, as the strike was going on so long, I thought the charter was void and chartered the ship for America. I avoided short voyages and chartered for America." The case would have been free of some of its perplexities if the defendant had explicitly told the plaintiffs what he was doing and intending to do. He made personally no communication to them. I do not find that he directed that any express statement as to the future should be made to them. He took his independent course, and left the plaintiffs to learn of it through the brokers or the published lists of ships' movements. Stavroudis kept the plaintiffs informed through Petters. They notified the making by the defendant of a new charter for a voyage of the Penelope from Montreal to Huelva, and thence to Rouen, and they wrote on the subject of this voyage from Rouen to this effect: "If the strike is over she will, of course, proceed to Swansea." I see no reason for believing that the defendant authorized any promise to this effect, though he no doubt intended to make some offer to the plaintiffs at a convenient time if circumstances should admit of it. When the plaintiffs became aware of the intended Montreal voyage they complained to Stavroudis. When they were informed through Petters of the Naples-Huelva-Rouen voyage they stated their position, threatened a claim for damages if the strike should end before this voyage was complete, and said: "The owners should be prepared to give us the steamship within a reasonable time after the settlement of the strike." On what footing it was supposed that the Penelope must be, or could be, kept at all for the plaintiffs in this way I do not understand.

The claim provisionally notified by the plaintiffs to the brokers was put forward by Petters to the defendant by a letter of November 29, 1926, which reached him at the beginning of December, and he thereupon set up, to and through Stavroudis, his contention that the charter of March was at an end.

It is material to realize the state of things which existed in December, when the parties respectively took conclusive action. The coal strike had become restricted in its operation during November. After it was at an end the Governmental embargo upon coal export remained operative. It had been in force while the strike was in progress, and it was a means of frustration probably identifiable under clause 3 of the charterparty and certainly effectual to prevent any utilization of the charter. The embargo continued until December 17. A week earlier the plaintiffs purport, by a letter written by them to Petters and Co., to have arranged for another ship for loading on December 10. The plaintiffs' manager, however, said in the witness-box that Messrs. Cleeves had no loading instructions, and at the end of the month when they directed Petters and Co. to "order (the Penelope) to the Mumbles for orders" they added, "we cannot yet give you a dock or port as we are awaiting instructions." On the day of their so writing Signor Monge had telegraphed to them, "Impossible to load her for my account. Charter her elsewhere." It was while this singular state of affairs existed that on December 31 Messrs. Stavroudis wrote to the plaintiffs that "owing to the strike the commercial object of this charter, which contemplated loading approximately in the month of May, was frustrated." Laborious efforts made by the brokers in January and February to bring matters to some amicable settlement were without success, and on March 4—after the period of accidental disablement due to the grounding of the Penelope was at an end—the plaintiffs issued their writ.

The difficulty of the case seems to me to arise rather from uncertainty due to the action of the parties—and of the respective brokers—at the successive stages of their relationship, than from any ambiguity in the law. The discussions in the House of Lords upon the variety of contests which arose during the Great War out of contracts frustrated by the incidents of the war did not, as I think, create new law. They illustrated and emphasized familiar principles of the common law.

The judgment delivered in Taylor v. Caldwell (3 B. and S., 826, at p. 833) by Lord Blackburn—then Mr. Justice Blackburn—formulates them: "Where there is a positive contract to do a thing, not in itself unlawful, the contractor must perform it or pay damages for not doing it, although in consequence of unforeseen accidents the performance of his contract has become unexpectedly burthensome or even impossible. . . . But . . . where from the nature of the contract it appears that the parties must from the beginning have known that it could not be fulfilled unless when the time for the fulfilment of the contract arrived some particular specified thing continued to exist, so that, when entering into the contract, they must have contemplated such continuing existence as the foundation of what was to be done; there, in the absence of any express or implied warranty that the thing shall exist, the contract is not to be construed as a positive contract, but as subject to an implied condition that the parties shall be excused in case, before breach, performance becomes impossible from the perishing of the thing without default of the contractor."

At an intermediate period between the decision of Taylor v. Caldwell (supra) and the litigation which arose from the frustration of contracts by the War, the principles stated by Lord Blackburn in Taylor v. Caldwell (supra) had been considered and applied in a series of cases which arose from the postponement of the Coronation of King Edward VII.: Krell v. Henry (19 The Times L.R., 711; [1903] 2 K.B., 740), Herne Bay Steamboat Company v. Hutton (19 The Times L.R., 680; [1903] 2 K.B., 683), and Elliott v. Crutchley (22 The Times L.R., 83; [1906] A.C., 7).

In the course of this litigation it was made clear that the principle which applies where there is "cessation of the existence of the thing which is the subject-matter of the contract," applies also where there is "cessation or non-existence of an express condition or state of things going to the root of the contract." This was reaffirmed in the House of Lords in Horlock v. Beal (32 The Times L.R., 251; [1916] 1 A.C., 486, at p. 513), one of the frustration cases during the Great War which were principally discussed in the argument in the present case.

Whether the "doctrine of frustration" is applicable to a time charter, or to the charter here in question, and whether the presence in this charter of express terms, with regard to strikes or a strike, operates to prevent the application of any implied conditions, were outstanding topics in the discussion. For my own part I find it difficult to conceive a contract which shall be free from implications, but it may be that by the use of apt words in the document the contracting parties could make the agreement proof against implication. Moreover, the charter is not a time charter within the common meaning of the term. It is a charter for a series of voyages with limits of time as to commencement and continuance. I may add that F. A. Tamplin Steamship Company, Limited v. Anglo-Mexican Petroleum Products Company, Limited (32 The Times L.R., 677; [1916] 2 A.C., 397), was a case of a time charter, and a condition in respect of frustration was implied.

The presence of an express provision in favour of the owners, giving them an option to accept substituted employment in certain specified circumstances, though it is an important fact, does not of itself determine that the contract may not be frustrated by the inability of the charterers to employ the ship. Suppose, for example, that on the first failure of the charterers to nominate a port and dock, at which they would undertake to load, no employment was obtainable by the owners. It could hardly be suggested that in that event the owners had bound themselves to have the ship ready for the charterers at some undetermined and indeterminable time when they might be ready. In the charterparty case of Bank Line, Limited v. Arthur Capel and Co. (35 The Times L.R., 150; [1919] A.C., 435) there was a provision as to requisitioning, but it was held not to exclude implication as to frustration when the vessel was requisitioned. Some implication must certainly be made in the present case. Otherwise the plaintiffs, by their default of ordering the Penelope to a dock, were liable in damages for breach of contract in June, 1926, and again on each subsequent occasion when the ship was tendered, and they declared that they could not load her. The real difficulty in the case seems to me to be to find the implied condition or conditions by which the express terms of the charter are controlled. To adapt some words from the opinion of Lord Parker of Waddington in the case of the Tamplin Steamship Company (supra), what condition is to be implied? Can you frame such a condition as the implied condition to be relied upon "without contradicting the express provisions of the contract and defeating the intention of the parties as disclosed by those provisions"?

It was argued for the plaintiffs that, inasmuch as strikes are not only repeatedly mentioned in the charterparty but are matter of common occurrence, a strike of any nature or extent must be taken to be within the contemplation of the parties. I do not find myself able, however, to say that the coal strike of 1926 might not be an unforeseen event in the sense which involves frustration. Sickness is an everyday affair; but a contract for personal service may become null and void by reason of a physical or mental disability of the obligee which frustrates the object of the engagement: Robinson v. Davison (L.R., 6 Ex., 269), Storey v. Fulham Steel Works Company (24 The Times L.R., 89), and Poussard v. Spiers and Pond (1 Q.B.D., 410).

The facts must be examined to determine whether apart from the agreement of the parties after the occurrence the coal strike was an event which frustrated the object of this contract. This being ascertained, it will be proper to see what arrangements, if any, were made during the strike, and how they affect this contract, and the rights of the parties thereunder. The defendant agreed to employ his ship for twelve months in carrying coal to the Italian ports for the charterers. Of such voyages, conducted on the terms of the charterparty, he could reckon upon completing eight (about six weeks per voyage), and eight voyages at most was the estimation of the plaintiffs' witness, Mr. Ellis. Overhead expenses, running expenses, whatever return was to be had from the use of the vessel, are included in the earnings of this series of voyages. They were to extend from June to June. A series occupying six or eight months would be quite another affair. So would a series of six voyages running from December to June. So far as I can see, neither party was entitled, without agreement on the part of the other, to require substitution for the agreed series of any other series, or any less series. Cancellation of voyages, except by agreement would, in my opinion, wholly and fundamentally change the conditions of the contract, and, to quote the opinion of Viscount Finlay in Metropolitan Water Board v. Dick, Kerr and Co., Ltd. (34 The Times L.R., 113; [1918] A.C., 119), adapting a phrase from the judgment of Viscount Dunedin in the same case, would make the contract when resumed a really different contract from the contract when broken off. It was persuasively argued before me that as the coal strike was not unforeseen, the principles expressed in the cases on frustration could not apply. What was unforeseen, however, was the total impossibility of any export of coal from the South Wales ports for a period of half a year and upwards. Was this a delay contemplated by the parties? I take into consideration what was said by Viscount Sumner in Bank Line, Ltd. v. Arthur Capel and Co. (35 The Times L.R., at p. 155; [1919] A.C., at p. 458): "Delay even of considerable length and of wholly uncertain duration is an incident of maritime adventure which is clearly within the contemplation of the parties, such as delay caused by ice or neaping. . . . Delays such as these may very seriously affect the commercial object of the adventure. . . . None the less this is not frustration; the delay is ordinary in character." The kind of interference which the parties in this case contemplated is that dealt with in the printed provisions of the charterparty and in the added clauses—an interruption of work by a local withdrawal of labour. Such an interruption is a trivial occurrence compared with the events in question. As to this actual event, the plaintiffs' witness, Mr. Ellis, said: "No prudent man could have foreseen the state of things which arose." On the whole I come to this conclusion, that there was an unforeseen compulsory change of circumstances not contemplated by the parties, and that as soon as it manifestly prevented performance of the charter according to its true intent, to quote from the opinion of Earl Loreburn in F. A. Tamplin Steamship Company v. Anglo-Mexican Petroleum Products Co., Ltd. (supra), the time had arrived at which the facts of the contract ought to be determined.

What then was the effect upon the contract contained in this charterparty of the conduct of the parties? After considering the correspondence and the evidence of the witnesses, I find that the parties impliedly agreed that the voyage Tunis-London-Swansea, and later the Stettin-Manchester voyage, should be made as though they were voyages within the provisions of clause 16 of the charterparty. They made no subsequent agreement. When the defendant was at Swansea in August the plaintiffs declared themselves unable to fulfil their obligations to name a port for loading, and he took his own course by accepting the Montreal charter. Afterwards he determined without any consent of the charterers to make his Huelva-Rouen voyage. Probably he reckoned upon the plaintiffs' knowledge of these fixtures. In due course he learned that they did not consent to them. He did not ask their consent or make any bargain about it. He intended, as he stated in the witness-box, to offer them the vessel at a reasonable period after the end of the strike. No doubt he thought that he and the plaintiffs might agree upon some voyages on the terms on which the Penelope was to have been employed under the charterparty. There was, however, no bargain made to this effect. Each party from time to time made suggestions which the other would not accept. I find that the charterparty, as varied by the understanding which was arrived at, first as to one, and then as to another, substituted voyage, was not further varied or prolonged; that when the defendant refused to satisfy the demands of the plaintiffs in and after November, 1926, they were rightfully refused; that the plaintiffs made in this later period no demand with which the defendant was bound to comply, and that when he declared through Messrs. Stavroudis that the contract was at an end he was entitled so to do. If one uses the words "ready and willing" in the sense in which they are properly used in matters of contract, the plaintiffs were not ready and willing to perform the obligations of the charterparty at the material times to which the dispute relates.

The action fails, and must be dismissed with costs.

Court of Appeal.
(Lord Hanworth, M.R., Lawrence and Russell, L.JJ.)
1928. June 7.

IN RE PETITION OF RIGHT OF MASON AND OTHERS.*

Limitations, Statute of — Lunatic — Funds in Court—Administration — Escheat—Payment out — Indemnity — Mistake of fact—Petition of right to recover — Lapse of time — Droits of the Crown — Limitation Act, 1623 (21 Jac. I., c. 16).

In 1799 and 1801 the Crown made an ex gratia grant of certain funds in Court, which were claimed as bona vacantia, and took an indemnity in respect of the funds so granted. These funds represented the residuary estate of the father of a female lunatic, and she was entitled to them at the date of her death in 1798. In 1794 the Master had reported that she had no heir-at-law or next-of-kin. In July, 1926, a petition of right was presented by persons alleging that it had recently been established that the lunatic did in fact leave next-of-kin surviving her, and that they represented the next-of-kin, and they sought to recover from the Crown the personal estate of the lunatic.

Held, that as the Crown had not created a trust in favour of any person the claim of the suppliants was barred by the Limitation Act, 1623.

Decision of Romer, J. (44 The Times L.R., 225 ; [1928] 1 Ch., 385), affirmed.

This was an appeal by the suppliants, other than Viscount Bangor, against the decision of Mr. Justice Romer (44 The Times L.R., 225 ; [1928] 1 Ch., 385) dismissing their petition of right, the object of which was to obtain the replacement and distribution among the suppliants of £45,000, representing the personal estate and effects of Maria L'Epine, a lunatic, who died intestate on April 30, 1798. There was also a cross-appeal by the Crown.

The suppliants alleged that the property had erroneously vested in the Crown at the death of Maria L'Epine and they claimed to be entitled to the property as her next-of-kin.

The facts were as follows :—Maria L'Epine, at the date of her death, was entitled to certain funds in Court representing the residuary estate of her late father, but subject to the payment of two annuities. In 1791 she had been found to be a lunatic and in the course of proceedings in Chancery, instituted for the administration of her father's estate, the Master had, in July, 1794, reported that she had no heir-at-law or next-of-kin. That report was confirmed by the Court.

In those circumstances the Earl and Countess Howe obtained letters of administration of the estate of Maria L'Epine for the use and benefit of King George III., and then petitioned the Court for payment out to them as such administrators of the funds in Court, after appropriation of a sufficient sum to answer the annuities. On July 22, 1799, an order was made directing the appropriation of securities to meet the annuities and payment of the balance in Court to Lord and Lady Howe.

Lord and Lady Howe then presented a memorial to the Lords Commissioners of the Treasury seeking to obtain a grant for their use and benefit. After their deaths a further memorial was presented by their two surviving children—Sophia, Baroness Howe, and Catherine, Marchioness of Sligo—who were their personal representatives. The King's assent having been obtained, the two daughters appeared to have paid over 10 per cent. on the value to his Majesty and thereupon, by Royal Warrant dated June 8, 1801, his Majesty granted to them in equal moieties the personal estate and effects of Maria L'Epine, including £15,000, still in Court at that time, appropriated to answer the annuities.

Two bonds were entered into in penal sums for the purpose of securing repayment of the estate to his Majesty, his heirs, and successors if any person or persons whosoever should at any time thereafter by due course of law prove himself or themselves to be the next-of-kin of Maria L'Epine ; and for the purposes of indemnifying the King, his successors, or assigns, against all claims and demands which might at any time be made on him or them for or in respect of the personal estate and effects of Maria L'Epine.

The two annuitants having died in 1818 and 1830 respectively, the £15,000 was duly paid out of Court to persons claiming under the two daughters of Lord and Lady Howe.

On July 1, 1926, the petition of right was presented by the suppliants—Miss Amy Knight Mason, Miss Jessie Margaret Mason, Miss Ethel Marion Mason, Mr. Alfred William Mason, Mrs. Emily Eliza Harrison (formerly a Miss Mason), Mr. Herbert Frederick Mason, Mr. Arthur Charles Mason, Mr. William Henry Knight, Miss Lucy Isabella Coldwell Knight, and Lord Bangor. They alleged that they had recently established that Maria L'Epine did in fact leave next-of-kin surviving her, whom they represented. They accordingly sought to recover from the Crown, with interest, the whole of the personal estate of Maria L'Epine, or, alternatively, the 10 per cent. of such estate paid over to the Crown.

The petition came before Mr. Justice Romer with an agreement between the parties to confine themselves for the time being to the determination of the following questions :—(1) Whether the petition was maintainable on the assumption that no part of the funds in question ever came into the hands of, or was dealt with by, his present Majesty, or his nominees or grantees, or was carried to the Consolidated Fund. (2) Whether the petition was barred by any statute of limitations. (3) Whether, in view of section 5 of the Petitions of Right Act, 1860, the suppliants could proceed, without serving the petition on the successors in title of Lord and

* Reported by H. C. Garsia, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Lady Howe and Sophia, Baroness Howe, or Catherine, Marchioness of Sligo.

MR. JUSTICE ROMER held that the first question must be answered in favour of the suppliants, but that the petition was barred by the Limitation Act, 1623, and, therefore, failed. He also held that section 5 of the Petitions of Right Act, 1860, had no application to the present case.

The suppliants, other than Lord Bangor, appealed, and there was a cross-appeal by the Crown.

Miss Amy Knight Mason appeared in person; Mr. J. M. Symmons for the remaining appellants; and the Attorney-General (Sir Thomas Inskip, K.C.) and Mr. Stafford Crossman for the Crown. Mr. Montgomery White held a watching brief for persons interested.

Miss Mason contended that a trust had been created by the Royal Warrant and the bonds of indemnity in favour of the next-of-kin, if any, and that, there being a trust, no statute of limitation applied to bar a claim by the next-of-kin. Rustomjee v. The Queen (1 Q.B.D., 487, at p. 491) showed that the Crown was not bound by the statutes of limitation, which had no application to proceedings by petition of right.

Mr. SYMMONS said that the suppliants for whom he appeared desired to adopt, and he was instructed to adopt, that argument.

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL said that as regarded the point taken that the statutes of limitation did not apply to petitions of right, no such question arose here, because they were in time made applicable to such a petition of right as the present by section 3 of the Intestates Estates Act, 1884, now repealed and reproduced by section 30 (2) of the Administration of Estates Act, 1925.

On the second contention, that the forms of the Royal Warrant and bonds had made the Crown a constructive trustee, there was really no ground for it. The Crown did not take the property by virtue of any trust or confidence reposed in it but because it was entitled to the property by virtue of a finding of the Master, confirmed by the order of the Court, that there were no next-of-kin. The only right of the Crown was by virtue of the assertion that nobody else was entitled to the property. The fact that, on making ex gratia grants, the Crown required an indemnity could make no difference. That was the regular practice of the Crown in making such grants.

It had been contended in the Court below that time under the Statute of Limitations, 1623 (21 Jac. I., c. 16), did not begin to run until the discovery of the mistake, and Brooksbank v. Smith (2 Y. and C. Ex., 58) had been relied on. But that case was explained in Baker v. Courage and Co. ([1910] 1 K.B., 56). It was impossible here to imply a trust: see Soar v. Ashwell ([1893] 2 Q.B., 390), which was considered in In re Robinson ([1911] 1 Ch., 502).

The MASTER of the ROLLS said that the Court felt difficulty in asking for further argument on the footing that there was a trust, for they had formed the opinion that there was none. As regarded the cross-appeal, the best course would be to make no order on it. That would keep open the points sought to be raised by it.

Miss Mason replied.

The MASTER of the ROLLS (Lord Hanworth), in giving judgment, said that in his view the appeal failed. It had been contended that the Crown had created a trust in favour of the next-of-kin. He found himself quite unable to accept that argument. After the finding of the Master, which was confirmed by the Court, the title of the Crown was immediate to the funds in question as bona vacantia. The Crown took and held as of right and not in trust for any person, and, if and so far as the Crown made ex gratia payments, it did so out of its own money.

It was said that the form in which the ex gratia payments were made and indemnities taken from the recipients operated to create a trust. He (his Lordship) did not so read the bonds, and he desired to adopt the view expressed by Mr. Justice Romer. It was impossible, therefore, to hold that any trust had been created.

Mr. Justice Romer had held that the present claim was barred by the Statute of Limitations, 1623. It had been argued that the statute did not apply to petitions of right but the effect of section 3 of the Intestates Estates Act, 1884, was to prevent this petition of right filed in respect of the estate of Maria L'Epine from being brought except within the same time and subject to the same rules of law and equity as if it had been an action. The Crown was, therefore, entitled to rely on the statute of 1623.

The only answer that it had been sought to make was that the six years under the statute only ran from the time when the suppliants became aware of their claim. The petition was, however, in respect of a claim which had arisen either at the death of Maria L'Epine or when the funds were paid over—that was, more than 100 years ago. The claim was, therefore, barred.

There would be no order on the cross-appeal. The Attorney-General had felt compelled to bring it, as the judgment of Mr. Justice Romer dealt with two other points. They had not formed part of the order as drawn up, but it was right to take note that they had been decided and that the right to raise them by way of appeal would be open to the Attorney-General if the case went higher.

LORD JUSTICE LAWRENCE said that the appeal was proceeding on the single question whether the claim in the petition of right was barred by the Statute of Limitations and on this point he agreed with Mr. Justice Romer. By the Intestates Estates Act, 1884, section 3, a petition of right was not to be presented "in respect of the personal estate of any deceased person or any part or share thereof, or any claim thereon, except within the same time and subject to the same rules of law and equity in and subject to which an action for the like purpose might be brought . . . against a subject." This petition of right was in respect of the estate of Maria L'Epine and fell within those words. That Act had been repealed by the Administration of Estates Act, 1925, but by section 56 it was only repealed so far as it applied "to deaths occurring after the commencement of this Act." By reason of the Act of 1884 the Crown was therefore entitled to rely on the defence of the Statute of Limitations. The statute said to apply was 21 Jac. I., chapter 16, and Mr. Justice Romer had held that the claim in the present case was of the nature of a claim for money had or received and had come to the conclusion, as he (his Lordship) thought rightly, that the cause of action was complete as soon, at all events, as the money in question was received by the Crown. It was at that date that the cause of action was complete and it was then that Maria L'Epine's maternal aunt, who it was claimed was then alive, could have claimed the estate. It followed that the action was barred after six years from that date.

The only way of escaping from that conclusion was to say that the Crown held the money as a constructive trustee. He (his Lordship) was not able to follow the argument that a constructive trust was created by the Crown's obtaining an indemnity from the person to whom it paid the money over. The learned Judge in the Court below was quite right in negativing a trust either express or constructive. The Crown received the money on the footing that there were no next-of-kin in existence. The Crown was justified in making this assumption, for a Master in Chancery had reported that there were no next-of-kin and the Court had confirmed this report. Therefore the Crown took possession of this estate as being entitled to retain it and make ex gratia payments out of it. The mere fact that an indemnity was taken from the recipients of the ex gratia payments could not create a trust. It followed that there being no trust created the remedy of the suppliants was barred by the statute. The appeal must therefore be dismissed.

LORD JUSTICE RUSSELL said that the only point argued before them had been fully discussed by Mr. Justice Romer in the first part of his judgment. He was quite content to adopt that judgment and the reasons there stated and desired to add nothing to them.

BRANCH AND OTHERS v. BENNETT'S DAIRIES, LIMITED, AND OTHERS.*

Landlord and Tenant—Restrictions—Covenant—Breach—Action for possession—Counterclaim for renewal of lease—House within Rent Restriction Acts—Costs—Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920 (10 and 11 Geo. V., c. 17), s. 17 (2).

His LORDSHIP, in giving judgment for the plaintiffs in this case, referred to the effect of the Rent Restriction Acts on costs in cases relating to dwelling-houses subject to those Acts, but involving questions outside the provisions of the Acts.

The action arose out of a dispute between the parties in regard to the renewal of a lease which was provided for by the terms of an existing lease. The plaintiffs claimed possession of the premises and the defendants counterclaimed for a renewal of the lease, contending that if there had been any breach in the covenants of the existing lease such breaches were of a character that entitled them to relief.

Mr. Conway, K.C., and Mr. H. S. G. Buckmaster appeared for the plaintiffs ; Mr. Hilbery, K.C., and Mr. R. Fortune for the defendants.

His LORDSHIP had held that the breaches had been sufficient to enable the plaintiffs to refuse a renewal of the lease and to have possession of the premises.

Mr. HILBERY, K.C., thereupon contended that, since this was an action relating to the possession of a house subject to the Rent Restriction Acts, it was an action that could have been brought in the county court, and that, as it had been tried in the High Court, no costs would be awarded the plaintiffs. He relied on Gunter v. Davis ([1925] 1 K.B., 124) and Russoff v. Lipovitch (41 The Times L.R., 278 ; [1925] 1 K.B., 628).

Mr. CONWAY argued that the fact that the dwelling-house was of a rental which enabled the Rent Restriction Acts to apply did not necessitate the provisions of those Acts being applicable to a dispute such as arose in this action.

His LORDSHIP said that the position was very unsatisfactory. The whole dispute between the parties was about the rights of an occupier to have a renewal of a lease in accordance with the terms of his existing lease. No mention of the Rent Restriction Acts was made until there appeared a few words with regard to them in the pleadings. Nevertheless, on the authority of the cases cited, he was bound to say, strange though it might seem, that this was a claim in respect of a house affected by the Rent Restriction Acts, and, in consequence, the plaintiffs were not entitled to costs. It was most repugnant to him not to grant costs to the plaintiffs because the dispute was purely on a commercial question and not on a point arising under those Acts.

Strangely enough, he was entitled to give costs in respect of the counterclaim, and that right was not contested.

G. AND T. EARLE, LIMITED v. HEMSWORTH R.D.C.*

Contract — Building contract — Retention moneys—Specific fund—Assignment—Debentures — Floating charge — Appointment of receiver—Priorities.

By a lump sum building contract entered into in 1922 between S. and Co., Ltd. ("the contractors") and the defendants, provision was made for interim payments on the architect's certificates, to be given monthly at the rate of 90 per cent. of the value of all work executed. The remaining 10 per cent. ("the retention moneys") was to be retained and deposited in a bank until the final adjustment of accounts. The contract was varied by consent, and in the events which happened the retention moneys amounted to £1,000 at the beginning of 1924 ; this was never deposited in a bank and remained a merely notional fund, but both parties treated it as a separate sum capable of being earmarked. It was included, without distinction, in the architect's final certificate for £1,848 10s. 2d. on January 28, 1927.

Meanwhile, the plaintiffs, who were supplying cement to the contractors, found that the latter were getting into arrears with their payments, and to obtain further credit the contractors, being then indebted to the plaintiffs in the sum of £671 on April 7, 1924, assigned to them the retention moneys by a document in these terms : "In reduction of the amount now or to be owing from us to you for goods supplied by you, we hereby assign to you all moneys now or hereafter to become due to us from the Hemsworth R.D.C. for retention moneys in respect of the G. Housing Scheme, and for which your receipt shall be a sufficient discharge . . ." Of that assignment due notice was given by the plaintiffs to the defendants next day.

The contractors had at various dates between 1900 and February 2, 1924, issued to the Manchester and County Bank, Ltd., a number of debentures charging the undertaking of the contractors and all their property, both present and future, the charge being a specific charge on the contractors' freehold and leasehold property, machinery, goodwill, and uncalled capital, and a floating charge on all the company's other assets, subject to a proviso that the contractors were not to be at liberty to create any mortgage or charge for any of their assets in priority to the debentures. On October 13, 1924, a receiver for the debenture holders was appointed, who duly entered into possession. On October 20, 1924, a resolution was passed for the voluntary winding-up of the company. The receiver refused to recognize the right of the plaintiffs to payment under their assignment in priority to the debentures holders, and on the architect's final certificate being given, in January, 1927, the defendants declined to interplead and paid the retention moneys to the receiver for the debenture holders, and the plaintiffs thereupon brought their action upon their assignment.

Held, (1) that the debentures only created a floating charge on the retention moneys, which the contractors could therefore assign or charge in spite of the clause in the debentures prohibiting the creation of charges in priority to the debentures ;

(2) that the plaintiffs had no express notice of that clause in the debentures ;

(3) that, though the registration of the debentures affected the plaintiffs with constructive notice that debentures existed, it did not affect them with notice of the terms (including the limitation on prior charges) of those debentures ;

(4) that on the facts of this case the retention moneys constituted a specific fund capable of assignment, and represented moneys actually earned at the date of the architect's several certificates, and were future only in the sense that they were not payable till the final certificate was issued ;

(5) that therefore the retention moneys were capable of being the subject of a valid legal assignment ;

(6) that the letter of assignment to the plaintiffs was in terms a good legal assignment, though partly intended to cover future credit ;

(7) that the assignment, being of the whole of a specific fund, could not be treated as an assignment of part of a debt merely because the architect included other sums with it in his final certificate ;

(8) that the plaintiffs were entitled to recover on the assignment.

This was an action tried by Mr. Justice Wright without a jury. The facts are fully stated in his Lordship's considered judgment.

Mr. Alexander Neilson, K.C., and Mr. W. H. Owen appeared on behalf of the plaintiffs ; Mr. W. N. Raeburn, K.C., and Mr. N. L. Macaskie appeared on behalf of the defendants.

MR. JUSTICE WRIGHT.—The plaintiffs in this case are claiming from the defendants a sum of £1,000 which they claim as being retention moneys due from the defendants to certain contractors, Messrs. Smith Brothers (Burnley), Limited, and the plaintiffs are claiming under an assignment of those moneys to them dated April 7, 1924. The defendants deny that they are liable to pay those moneys, and they raise a number of points which I shall have to deal with in detail. In effect they say that the assignment, if any, was a merely equitable assignment, and that the rights of the plaintiffs as assignees are postponed, in the events which have happened and which I shall describe in detail later, to the rights of the receiver on behalf of the debenture holders of the contractors.

The facts which I shall first have to state are these. On November 21, 1922, the defendants entered into a building contract with Messrs. Smith Brothers (Burnley), Limited (whom I shall hereafter refer to as the contractors), for the construction of a number of cottages, the contract providing for the payment, which is the material question in this case, with some elaboration. It was a lump sum contract, but provision was made in clause 29 for interim payments. No money was to become payable to the contractors except on the architect's certificate in writing, and certificates were to be issued when work to the value of £1,000 had been executed and thereafter at monthly intervals as certified by the architect in writing: he was to certify the amount from time to time payable to the contractors under the contract. Provision, however, was made for retention moneys. The amount to be certified by the architect on his first and monthly certificates as due to the contractors was to be at the rate of 90 per cent. of the value of all work, including all authorized extras and so forth. The balance of 10 per cent. of the value of the work was to be retained until the sum so retained, called a retention fund, should amount to £2,472, after which the contractors were to be entitled to be paid monthly to the full value of all work executed and materials supplied. One-half of the retention fund was to be paid at a certain period, namely, at the completion and occupation of the works, and the other half, together with any further sum found due to the contractors at the final adjustment of the accounts by the quantity surveyor, was to be paid six months after completion or occupation of the works ; provided that all defects for which the contractors should be liable were made good and their liabilities were otherwise discharged. The contract provided for the retention fund to be deposited in a bank in the names of the defendants, and any interest on such sums was to be the property of the contractors and paid to them by the defendants as employers at the time of the final payment. It was finally provided that no certificate of the architect, except for the final balance, was to be considered conclusive evidence of any works or materials to which it related, nor of the value thereof; nor was it to relieve the contractors of their liability to make good any defects as provided by the conditions of the contract nor to prejudice the defendants as employers in the final settlement of the accounts. The contract, as I have said, was a lump sum contract, the amount being £46,589 8s. 4d., but subject to variation having regard to changes in the cost of labour and other matters. There was provision in the contract that the contractors were to complete by a certain date and were to be liable in damages if they failed to do so, and there was a provision also that they were to be liable for improper work or other breaches of contract. In arriving at a final adjustment, the defendants were to be entitled to set off against any sums otherwise due on the final adjustment any liability of the contractors in those respects. That being the building contract, matters proceeded, but in working out the contract variation was made in the course of procedure as regards the retention fund. The retention fund was duly created in accordance with the agreement until it amounted to £2,472, but it was and remained merely a notional fund: it was never created by special deposit, as the contract stipulated for, in an agreed bank. At a certain date, by correspondence which has been put in, the position of the fund was further varied as to amount. It was agreed in January, 1923, that the retention money should be reduced to £1,500; that is to say, that the contractors should be paid the balance of £972, which was done under an architect's certificate, which has been produced, and it was further provided that that should be further reduced to a sum of £1,000 in certain events, which duly happened; and by the beginning of 1924 the retention fund had been so reduced and stood as between both the defendants and the contractors at the sum of £1,000. As I say, it was never in the form of a sum of money kept in a separate earmarked account, but it is constantly referred to in the documents before me as the "retention fund," and both parties, as I find, that is to say, both the contractors and the defendants, treated these moneys as a definite sum capable of being earmarked, though not kept apart in the defendants' accounts. That being the state of things, the plaintiffs, who had been supplying cement to the contractors, found, in the early part of 1924, that the contractors were getting into arrears in their payment. By April, 1924, the debt of the contractors to the plaintiffs amounted to £671 10s. 5d., and, that being so, a transaction was entered into between the plaintiffs and the contractors which I imagine is very common in the building trade. The contractors, having standing to their credit this retention money, and being desirous of obtaining financial assistance for the purpose of completing their contract and obtaining payment of that retention money and the other sums due to them under the contract, could only do so by obtaining some financial assistance, and they obtained assistance by getting further credit from the plaintiffs by agreeing to assign to them these retention moneys. No doubt in doing so they were doing so by way of security or mortgage. Accordingly, a document was executed which is the assignment relied upon; that is dated April 7, 1924. It is signed by the contractors, it is addressed to the plaintiffs, and it is in these terms: "In part reduction of the amount now or to be owing from us to you for goods supplied by you, we hereby assign to you all moneys now or hereafter to become due to us from the Hemsworth Rural District Council for retention moneys in respect of the Grimethorpe Housing Scheme"—that was the part of the contract in question—"and for which your receipt shall be a sufficient discharge. It is understood that we are only to be credited with the amount actually paid to you under this assignment as and when the same is received by you." Of that assignment due notice was given on April 8, 1924, by the plaintiffs to the defendant Council in these terms: "We beg to give you notice that by a Memorandum in writing dated April 7, 1924, Messrs. Smith Brothers (Burnley), Limited, assign to us all moneys now or hereafter to become due to them from your Council for retention moneys in respect of the Grimethorpe Housing Scheme and for which our receipt shall be sufficient discharge." There was some little delay before that document was acknowledged by the defendants, but eventually the defendants wrote to the plaintiffs' solicitors in these terms on May 26, 1924: "I am in receipt of your letter of the 23rd instant enclosing a copy of the assignment of Messrs. Smith Brothers (Burnley), Limited, of all moneys now or hereafter to become due to them from the Hemsworth Rural District Council for retention moneys in respect of the Grimethorpe Housing Scheme. The matter shall receive attention. I am unable to inform you how much will be due to Messrs. Smith Brothers at the end of the contract." By this time the contractors had issued a number of debentures. The particulars of these debentures are set out in paragraph 1 of the defence. The debentures were issued to the Manchester and County Bank, Limited, and were dated at various periods between February 1, 1900, and February 2, 1924, and they were debentures charging the undertaking of the contractors and all their property, both present and future, the charge being a specific charge on the contractors' freehold and leasehold property, machinery, goodwill, and uncalled capital, and a floating security as regarded all the company's other assets, but subject to a proviso that the contractors were not to be at liberty to create any mortgage or charge for any of their assets in priority to these debentures. The moneys so lent were to be paid on demand to the debenture holders, and it was further provided that if at any time when the moneys became payable, that is to say, for example, on demand (as it was further provided they should immediately become payable if an order was made, or an effective resolution was passed for the winding-up of the contractors' company), then the debenture holders might appoint a receiver who should have power to take possession of the property and to sell, or concur in selling, the same and to apply the proceeds towards the satisfaction of the debenture holders. The building went on; the plaintiffs delivered cement to the contractors on the credit of the assignment, and so matters proceeded until October. On October 13, 1924, the debenture holders, default having been made by the contractors in not repaying on demand the moneys lent, appointed a receiver on their behalf under the debentures, and he duly entered into possession. On October 20, 1924, a resolution was passed for the voluntary winding-up of the company. From then matters proceeded; the receiver's solicitors refused to recognize the assignment which the plaintiffs notified to them, claiming that they had a prior claim. Messrs. Southern, Fullalove and Ritchie were the receiver's solicitors, I think. These solicitors wrote to the plaintiffs on December 6, 1924: "We are now informed that the retention moneys held by the Hemsworth Council in respect of the Grimethorpe Scheme were at the date of the alleged assignment (and still are) £1,000." There was some considerable delay in closing up the affairs of the contract, and it was not till January 28, 1927, that the architect issued his final certificate, which has been put in, showing a balance due on the entire contract of £1,848 10s. 2d. That was accompanied by a final statement of account. The architect in issuing that certificate has not distinguished between the retention moneys and the other moneys which were due to the contractors. It is perfectly clear, however, on that certificate that there was a balance due to the contractors over and above the £1,000 retention moneys after all adjustments and cross-claims had been brought into account, and I do not think that the position or existence of the retention moneys as a separate fund capable of being earmarked and identified can be affected by the fact that the architect has not thought fit in his final certificate to say that the sum he certifies for does include the retention moneys. I am perfectly satisfied that that £1,848 included, and was meant to include, and indeed must have included, the retention moneys.

A considerable number of points were raised by the learned counsel who appeared on both sides, and they referred to a great number of authorities. Some of those matters I can deal with quite shortly, because on some points I imagine there is no serious dispute either of fact or of law. In the first place, it is perfectly clear that so far as the moneys due from the Council to the contractors under this contract are concerned the debentures constituted merely a floating charge. The nature of a floating charge has been so often discussed that it is almost unnecessary for me to say any more about it, except this, that the effect of a floating charge is not enough in itself, and apart from specific terms, to prevent the debtors from specifically charging any of the assets subject to the floating charge for purposes of the legitimate and proper carrying on of their business. A floating charge, which has been described as ambulatory or dormant, has not that effect. The whole intention is that the company which gives the floating charge should be free to conduct its business and free for that purpose to deal with those assets subject to the floating charge in the ordinary course of its business, selling, pledging, charging or otherwise disposing of them so far as may be necessary. It is not till some event occurs which, as it is called, crystallizes (another of those picturesque metaphors) the floating charge and causes it to cease to be dormant or ambulatory or floating, that this power of disposing of the assets on the part of the company comes to an end. I need only refer to one of the many cases in which that principle has been recognized, Evans v. Rival Granite Quarries, Limited (26 The Times L.R., 509 ; [1910] 2 K.B., 979), a case in which there is found again cited the description of a floating charge given by Lord Macnaghten in Governments Stock and Other Securities Investment Company, Limited v. Manila Railway Company, Limited (13 The Times L.R., 109 ; [1897] A.C., 81, at p. 86). A floating security is there described by Lord Macnaghten as "an equitable charge on the assets for the time being of a going concern." That being so, there would so far be no hindrance to the contractors charging or transferring the retention moneys by means of the assignment to which I have referred. It is said, however, that this floating charge is subject to a specific limitation—namely, that it prohibits the contractors from creating any mortgage or charge over any of their assets in priority to the charge created by the debentures. If the plaintiffs had notice of that limitation on the powers of the company to charge their assets, that notice would affect them even though they obtained a legal assignment and a legal mortgage : it would affect them, and they would not be able to rely upon the legal mortgage or charge as against the debentures. It is not, however, suggested that the plaintiffs had any notice in fact of the terms of the debentures. It is not proved that they had actual notice that there were debentures. That fact in itself, however, would not be material because the debentures having been duly registered under the Companies (Consolidation) Act, 1908, the plaintiffs, like all the world, are deemed to have constructive notice of the fact that there are debentures. But it has never been held that the mere fact that persons in the position of the plaintiffs have constructive notice of the existence of debentures also affects them with constructive notice of the actual terms of the debentures or that the debentures are subject to the restrictive condition to which these debentures were subject. No doubt it is quite common for debentures to be subject to this limiting condition as to further charges, but that fact is not enough in itself to operate as constructive notice of the actual terms of any particular set of debentures. That again has been recognized in a great many cases, and it is enough for me now to refer to one only. There are many others, but it is enough for me to refer to Wilson v. Kelland (26 The Times L.R., 485 ; [1910] 2 Ch., 306). There is, therefore, nothing to affect the rights of the plaintiffs so far by reason of the existence of those debentures or by the terms in those debentures.

The next question I have to determine is whether there was an assignment here which fulfilled the conditions of section 136 of the Law of Property Act of 1925; that is to say, whether there was a good legal assignment of a specific and identifiable fund. Mr. Raeburn, in his able argument for the defendants, has contended on a number of grounds that there is here no legal assignment. His argument is that at most there was only an equitable assignment of a future debt, an assignment which, assuming the retention moneys to have constituted a specific fund, would only become a legal assignment and enforceable as such when the moneys became earned and due, which, according to his argument, only occurred when the final certificate was granted in January, 1927, before which time the rights of the debenture holders had crystallized by the appointment and possession of the receiver. He further contended that in any event the assignment was never more than an equitable assignment and therefore the action could not be maintained by the plaintiffs without the joining of the assignors—namely, the contractors. Mr. Neilson has contended, on the contrary, that the conditions of section 136 are one and all complied with and that he is entitled to recover here on behalf of the plaintiffs on that ground. I think that his very able argument is successful and is justified by the facts of the case and the law which is applicable. In the first place, I have to determine whether the retention moneys constituted a specific fund so as to be capable of assignment, whether it constituted a debt or legal chose in action. I have referred to the terms of the building contract, and it is on those terms and on what was done in pursuance, with some variation, perhaps, of those terms, that I must decide. It really is a question of fact, the question of the position in this special case, whether the retention moneys constituted such a fund. I think that they did. The retention moneys according to the express terms of the contract were clearly intended to constitute a specific fund, they were to be actually deposited in a bank by the council as they accrued due, and they were so to remain until the final payment after completion, when they were to be paid over. That agreement was varied in the sense which I have indicated, but the retention moneys still remained according to the contract, notwithstanding the variation, retention moneys in the proper sense of the term, that is to say a specific fund notionally set aside and appropriated, and a specific fund which, subject to the conditions of the contract, the contractors remained entitled to claim eo nomine. I find, therefore, that there was a specific fund. Secondly, I have to determine whether the retention moneys were merely a future debt—future in the full sense of the term ; that is to say, that they were not merely not payable but were not earned at the date of the assignment, that is to say in April, 1924. Mr. Raeburn further contended that they were not earned and were not payable, and, more than that, that they were only payable on a contingency—namely, the entire satisfactory completion of the work under the building contract, and he further relied on the fact that the contract was a lump sum contract and therefore on well-known principles no money could be due and payable under a lump sum contract until the whole work for which the money was payable had been completed. I do not think that that is a correct statement of the position in this case. I have referred to the terms of the building contract in some detail a little time ago, and I am satisfied, on considering that contract and hearing the evidence of the architect, that the amounts for which month by month the architect was to certify and for which thereupon the contractors had a vested right of action under the certificate were not mere arbitrary amounts but were amounts which were to be certified for and were certified for on a calculation of the value of the work actually done. Though it may be that when the final settlement came some adjustment had to be made, I am satisfied that the intention and meaning of this contract was that the architect was only to certify for work in an amount which in his judgment represented the value actually executed. That is the precise language of clause 29, and when reference is made to the creation of the retention fund it is expressly said "The amount to be certified by the architect on his first and monthly certificates as due to the contractor shall be at the rate of 90 per cent. of the value of all work executed and materials delivered" and so on. Then the remaining balance of 10 per cent. of the value of the work is to be retained. In my judgment the retention moneys represented moneys actually earned at the date of the certificate, though in fact these retention moneys, as their name indicates, were to be held as a sort of security and in any case subject to having set off against them any cross-claims, which would reduce the amount when the final settlement came and the final certificate was issued. The retention moneys, therefore, were only future in the sense that they were not payable until some future date, and such moneys in my judgment are capable of being the subject of a good and valid legal assignment. Walker v. Bradford Old Bank, Limited (12 Q.B.D., 511), is a well-known authority for the principle that there may be a good legal assignment of future debts. Nor is this conclusion affected by the circumstance that the £1,000, the retention moneys for this purpose, as events have turned out, are not only not payable till the final settlement, but when the final settlement comes may not become payable either in whole or in part by reason of the building owners, the defendants, having cross-claims or rights of set-off in connexion with the execution of the work or delay in completion under the various terms of the contract. That, I think, does not affect the question at all, because every legal assignment is, according to the express terms of section 136 of the Law of Property Act, 1925, subject to equities having priority over the right of the assignee, and it has long been established that a legal assignee is liable to have his rights affected and reduced, or even destroyed, by the fact that the debtor has cross-claims arising out of the same transaction which he could have set off against the creditor and which he can equally set off against the creditor's assignee. It is true that these rights of set-off are strictly limited in character : they must have their origin in the same contract and in the same transaction, and they must be inseparably connected with that transaction. But if that condition is fulfilled, then they may be set off. That is well illustrated in a case of Government of Newfoundland v. Newfoundland Railway Company (13 App. Cas., 199). There were, as it turned out in this case, no cross-claims or rights of set-off affecting the £1,000 retention moneys in question, but the point was raised by Mr. Raeburn, and it has to be considered as meeting his argument that the retention moneys were only payable on a contingency and therefore were not either earned or payable at the date at which the assignment took place. Then I further hold that this letter of assignment is a good legal assignment ; that is to say, is a mortgage and is not merely a charge or equitable assignment. I have read the terms of the document, and they are absolute in their character. It is perfectly true that at the date of the assignment the indebtedness of the contractors to the plaintiffs was less than £1,000 ; it afterwards became more, but it was less at the time ; and the whole intention was to give the plaintiffs some security for further credit, which they were willing to give on those terms to the contractors. But what is material in considering this question is the terms of the assignment. If the assignment is absolute in its terms, if it is in terms a full legal assignment, then it is a good, absolute assignment within the section of the Act, even though in fact it is a mortgage and even though the assignee, if he collects the debt, may have to account for some balance to the assignor. That principle (namely, that it is the terms of the document which have to be looked at) is now well established, and it is only a question of the view which the Court takes of the terms. I need only refer to Tancred v. Delagoa Bay and East Africa Railway Co. (5 The Times L.R., 587; 23 Q.B.D., 239) and the more recent case of Bank of Liverpool and Martins, Limited v. Holland (43 The Times L.R., 29).

Mr. Raeburn has further contended that in this case there was only an assignment of part of a debt and not an assignment of the whole debt, and in that connexion, as I follow, he in particular relies on the terms of the architect's final certificate, to which I have already referred. I should not hold that an assignment of part of a debt was a good legal assignment within the terms of the Judicature Act : I should follow the various decisions to the contrary. There is some conflict, no doubt, but I should follow the decisions to the contrary, as an example of which I might refer to In re Steel Wing Company, Limited ([1921] 1 Ch.D., 349). But for the reasons which I have already indicated I think and I hold that this assignment was both in terms and in fact an assignment of the whole of the retention moneys, a specific fund, and that being so, the position is in no way affected because the architect, for whatever reason, in his final certificate did not think fit to specify this specific fund, as I think he ought to have done, but simply included it in the total sum of £1,848 odd for which he certified. On those conclusions it follows that the plaintiffs are entitled to recover upon their assignment; the assignment being a good legal assignment, passed to the plaintiffs, as I hold, the full legal rights in the fund, and those legal rights were in no way affected by the fact that after the date of the assignment, though before the moneys became actually payable, the receiver in fact took possession.

Mr. Raeburn, basing on his argument that the assignment was merely future in effect and was merely equitable, has referred to cases where it was held that the rights of an equitable assignee, an assignee of merely future debts and therefore an equitable assignee, were postponed to the rights of a receiver for debenture holders or of a trustee in bankruptcy, and he says this is analogous. He has referred to cases like Wilmot v. Alton (13 The Times L.R., 58; [1897] 1 Q.B., 17) and Ex parte Nichols (22 Ch.D., 782). There is no doubt, of course, that where you have a purely legal assignment such as that in question in those cases, an assignment of future debts in the full sense of the term, a person like a trustee in bankruptcy, who takes the full legal title, takes precedence of a future assignee ; that is to say, if the debt is merely future and the money is not payable till a date subsequent to the trustee's rights attaching, and has not been earned at an earlier date, namely, at the date of the assignment. If, however, the money has been earned at the date of the assignment and before the trustee in bankruptcy's title has attached, then the assignee's rights remain unaffected. Such a case is well illustrated by the case of Ex parte Moss—In re Toward (14 Q.B.D., 310), a case of a building contract, where it was held that a charge on an instalment due on the building of a ship in favour of a creditor was good against the trustee in bankruptcy because the charge was upon money which had been already earned by the builder. That is a case which is parallel, so far as this argument is concerned, with this case, whereas those other cases, Wilmot v. Alton (supra) and Ex parte Nichols (supra) are different in an essential characteristic, and in those latter cases the money had not been earned before the rights of the trustee in bankruptcy accrued. But I have held that this is a legal assignment, and therefore these cases relied upon by Mr. Raeburn, cases of merely equitable assignment, have no application. I am far from saying, however, that even if this were merely an equitable assignment, though not of a strictly future debt, the rights of the receiver for the debenture holders when he entered into possession would take priority of the rights of the equitable assignees. No authority has been produced to me for an argument to that effect by Mr. Raeburn. I am not aware of any precise authority, and I express no view on the matter, because the matter does not, in my judgment, arise.

Under all those circumstances, I think the plaintiffs are entitled to succeed. I am told that the defendants have actually paid this amount to the receiver. That, I need not point out, would not be a good discharge as against the plaintiffs if I am right in holding that they, as assignees, have become legally entitled to receive and recover the debt in all the circumstances of the case. The defendants were invited to interplead and they might have interpleaded, but they have not thought fit to do so, and it may follow that if I am right in the conclusion at which I have arrived they will have to pay the money twice over. I know nothing about that, nor indeed is it material. All I have to do is to say that in this case, as between the plaintiffs and the defendants, I hold that the plaintiffs are entitled to succeed on their assignment, and there will be judgment for the amount claimed, with costs. That, I think, is £1,000.

BENYON v. THORPE.*

Revenue — Income-tax — Voluntary pension—Lump sum in lieu thereof—Whether recipient assessable—Income Tax Act, 1918 (8 and 9 Geo. V., c. 40), Sched. E.

The respondent had been the managing director of a company and after his retirement the directors paid him a voluntary pension and subsequently stopped the pension, and instead thereof gave him a lump sum as a personal gift. The respondent was assessed to income-tax on the amounts so paid to him.

Held, that as the payments were merely gifts moved by remembrance of past service already sufficiently remunerated, the respondent was not liable to be assessed upon them.

This was a case stated by the Commissioners for the Special Purposes of Income-tax, who had decided that certain sums paid by way of pension were not assessable, as being gifts of a personal nature only.

Mr. Thomas Wells Thorpe, the respondent, appealed to the Special Commissioners in respect of assessments made on him under Schedule E of the Income Tax Acts in respect of the following sums paid to him by Messrs. Mann, Crossman, and Paulin, Limited:—£1,736 for the year ending April 5, 1923 ; £6,451 12s. for the year ending April 5, 1924 ; £6,561 12s. for the year ending April 5, 1925 ; and £6,250 for the year ending April 5, 1926.

The respondent had been the managing director of the above company from its incorporation in the year 1901 to his retirement on December 31, 1922. It had been the custom of the company to give to members of its staff a voluntary pension or allowance on their retirement. In 1922 the respondent retired from the position of managing director, owing to ill-health. His resignation became effective from the end of the year, but he remained a director until the end of 1925, no salary or remuneration being voted to him as director.

By a resolution of the directors passed on January 11, 1923, a pension was awarded to the respondent in the following terms :—"It was unanimously resolved that Mr. Thorpe be paid during his retirement a pension of £5,000 per annum, free of income-tax, as from January 1, 1923." On August 6, 1925, the directors passed the following resolutions :—"The resolution of the board of

* Reported by T. R. F. Butler, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

January 11, 1923, re Mr. Thorpe's pension, was considered, and it was resolved to rescind the same, which was accordingly rescinded." "It was resolved to give Mr. Thorpe a sum of £5,000, to be paid to him as to half thereof forthwith, and as to the remainder in January, 1926, and the secretary was instructed to prepare a cheque in favour of Mr. Thorpe for £2,500. This sum is not voted to Mr. Thorpe as or because he is a director, but as a personal gift to him."

The voluntary pensions or allowances paid by the company had been deducted by it in its own accounts for the purpose of ascertaining the profits divisible among the shareholders, but for purposes of taxation under the Income Tax Acts, the company had rendered an adjustment account, in which the allowances had been shown as added back, and had thereby been included in the taxable profits on which income-tax had been paid for all the years in question and previous years.

On behalf of the respondent, it was contended that the allowances were entirely voluntary payments, or gifts, of a personal nature, and that he was not assessable on them.

The Crown contended, inter alia :—(1) That the allowances were not gifts of a personal nature ; and (2) that the assessments appealed against had been rightly made and should be confirmed.

The Special Commissioners held that the allowances paid to the respondent were gifts of a personal nature only, and that he was not assessable on them under the Income Tax Acts. They accordingly discharged the assessments.

The Crown appealed.

The Attorney-General (Sir Thomas Inskip, K.C.) and Mr. R. P. Hills appeared for the Crown ; Mr. Raymond Needham, K.C., and Mr. J. S. Scrimgeour for the respondent.

Mr. Justice Rowlatt, in giving judgment, said that it appeared that the company had been making payments of the kind in question for the last 20 years or more, that the Inland Revenue authorities had been fully aware of the fact, and that in every case they had refused to allow the deduction of those sums in the company's accounts because they were not expenses of the company's business—or, in other words, that the payments were mere gifts. They now reversed their position and said that such sums should have been allowed as part of the expenses of the company and the sums in question ought to be regarded as income in the hands of the respondent. If the Crown was entitled to succeed in this case it ought to be only on the terms of an undertaking to put right the assessments of the company by allowing it to deduct every payment of that kind that it had made.

In his judgment, however, the Crown was not entitled to succeed. The Special Commissioners must be taken to have found that the payments in question were made to the respondent not as a remuneration for acting as an ordinary director but as an allowance in the nature of a pension. The payments could not be regarded as a supplementary salary for services, as they were rendered. In Cowan v. Seymour (36 The Times L.R., 155 ; [1920] 1 K.B., 500) Lord Justice Atkin (as he then was) had pointed out that a sum might be paid after termination of services in respect of those services because the services themselves called for a supplement to a salary. That, however, was not the present case, because here the payments were clearly not payments by way of increment of salary for past labours but were payments, to a person whose services had ceased, in respect of the period during which he might live afterwards.

The question was whether the payments were "a profit or gain arising from an employment." To render them taxable at all they must be a "profit or gain" within the scope of the Acts. In his opinion the resolutions passed by the company were nothing more than the indication of an intention to make a series of gifts, and had no more effect than an ordinary banker's order given by a customer to his banker for the payment of a series of sums for charitable purposes.

It was true that a gift might become a "profit or gain" if it could be attached to an office, employment, or vocation, the best known instance being that of an offering made voluntarily to a minister of religion. The same principle applied to voluntary payments in the nature of gratuities to servants, such as waiters, which they obtained only because they were carrying on a particular employment. The question then arose whether a payment ceased to be a mere gift because what had led to it was a past employment, which had ceased.

It was abundantly clear that payments such as those arising in the present case could not be considered as receipts in respect of an office. The payments in question were, in reality, nothing more than gifts moved by remembrance of past service already sufficiently remunerated, and stood on the same footing as gifts to a child or any other person whom the donor thought ought to be provided with funds. The relation of employment which had generated the gifts was merely a matter of history.

For those reasons he was of opinion that the appeal failed, and must be dismissed with costs.

TINY TOWNSHIP ROMAN CATHOLIC SEPARATE SCHOOLS TRUSTEES v. THE KING.*

Canada — Ontario—Education—Roman Catholic separate schools—British North America Act, 1867 (30 and 31 Vict., c. 3), s. 93 (1).

By s. 20 of the Separate Schools Act, 1863, of the United Province, afterwards divided into the provinces of Ontario and Quebec,

"Every separate school shall be entitled to a share in the fund annually granted by the Legislature of this Province for the support of common schools, and shall be entitled also to a share in all other public grants, investments and allotments for common school purposes now made or hereafter to be made by the province or the municipal authorities. . . ."

By section 26 the Roman Catholic separate schools were to be subject to such inspection as might be directed from time to time by the Chief Superintendent and were to be "subject also to such regulations as might be imposed from time to time by the Council of Public Instruction for Upper Canada."

The above Act was in force at the passing of the British North America Act, 1867, which provided by s. 93 : "In and for each province the Legislature may exclusively make laws in relation to education, subject and according to the following provisions :—(1) Nothing in any such law shall prejudicially affect any right or privilege with respect to denominational schools which any class of persons have by law in the province at the union. . . ."

Held, that as the legislation in force in 1867, in what is now the province of Ontario, provided for the regulation of separate schools and did not entitle them to a fixed share in the fund granted for the support of common schools, the Legislature of the province of Ontario was not precluded by s. 93 (1) of the Act of 1867 from passing Acts for the regulation of separate schools and for the alteration of the amount of their share in the educational grant.

Judgment of the Supreme Court of Canada ([1927] S.C.R., 637) affirmed.

Their LORDSHIPS dismissed this appeal, which was brought by special leave, from a judgment of the Supreme Court of Canada ([1927] S.C.R., 637) affirming decisions of the First Divisional Court of the Appellate Division of the Supreme Court of Ontario (60 Ont. L.R., 15) and the Trial Judge (Mr. Justice Rose) (59 Ont. L.R., 96), relating to the education of Roman Catholic children in Ontario.

Mr. Hellmuth, K.C., and Mr. T. F. Battle (both of the Canadian Bar) appeared for the appellants ; Mr. W. N. Tilley, K.C., and Mr. McGregor Young, K.C. (both of the Canadian Bar), for the respondent.

VISCOUNT HALDANE delivered their Lordships' judgment as follows :—

Their Lordships are fully aware that this appeal is among the most important that have come before them from Canada in recent years. It relates to the interpretation of the Constitution of Canada in regard to the separate schools of a large part of her Roman Catholic population, and to the character of the rights conferred on them by the legislative settlement made at the time of Confederation under the British North America Act, 1867. So far as concerns the question brought before the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, it will be found to be a question of pure law, turning on the interpretation and application of words in that Act. But it is none the less a question of far-reaching importance to Canada as a whole, and it has given rise to great differences of opinion among the Judges of the Canadian Courts. The tribunals of Ontario, indeed, before whom the question came in the first instance, decided unanimously against the appellants' claim. But the learned Judges of the Supreme Court, to which it was taken on appeal, were evenly divided.

Their Lordships have now to determine the point in issue as one of pure legal interpretation, disregarding every other consideration. This was the principle adopted by the Canadian Judges, and it is one which their Lordships have to apply anew, seeking to decide the appeal on the footing of an examination of the provisions of the Constitution of Canada.

It will be necessary in the course of this judgment to refer in outline, later on, to the history of education in Canada, and particularly to the phase of that history which is concerned with the development of the provisions made in regard to religious education. But before entering on this it is desirable to formulate distinctly the real point in this appeal and the nature of the proceedings by which it has been raised. These proceedings took the form of a petition of right presented by the appellants to the Supreme Court of Ontario. The petition claimed that certain Acts of the Legislature of that Province, and certain regulations purporting to have been passed under these Acts, prejudicially affected the rights conferred by the British North America Act, 1867, on the appellants and were ultra vires. The appellants asked for a declaration that the Acts of the Legislature, which had sought to alter the basis of distribution of legislative grants which existed at the date of Confederation, were ultra vires so far as concerned separate schools, and for judgment for a sum equal to the difference between the amount paid to the trustees of the Roman Catholic School for school section No. 2 in the township of Tiny, out of the legislative grant of the Province for 1922, and the amount that would have come to it if effect had been given to the Separate Schools Act, 1863, which was in force at the Confederation, and created (it was claimed) a right which the Legislature of the Province had no power after Confederation to affect prejudicially. The appellants also claimed that they had the right to establish and conduct in their own schools courses of study and grades of education such as were being conducted in continuation schools, collegiate institutes, and high schools, and that all regulations purporting to affect that right were invalid. They asked for a further declaration that the supporters of Roman Catholic separate schools were exempt from the rates imposed for the support of the former kind of school, unless established or conducted by boards of trustees of Roman Catholic separate schools.

All of these claims were traversed by the Attorney-General for Ontario on behalf of the Government of Ontario.

The question which has to be decided is one of far-reaching magnitude. To understand its scope it is necessary to have in mind the history of education in Canada, including that of section 93 of the British North America Act, 1867. This section embodies a compromise. The language proposed by the conferences of delegates from the various parts of Canada, which passed resolutions at Quebec on October 10, 1864, was not adopted, so far as the final arrangement was concerned, in the form in which the resolutions were passed (see Carter's Cases on the B.N.A. Act, Vol. II., Quebec Resolution No. 43). Resolution 43 proposed to give power to the local Legislatures to make laws as to education, saving the rights and privileges which the Protestant and Catholic minority in both Canadas might possess as to their denominational schools at the time when the union came into operation. In the British North America Act, 1867, as passed by the Imperial Parliament, the substance of this resolution is not included in section 92, but is embodied in a separate section, 93. The separate section enacts that in and for each Province the Legislature may exclusively make laws in relation to education, subject and according to certain provisions. These were (subsection 1), that nothing in such law should prejudicially affect any right or privilege with respect to denominational schools which any class of person had by law in the Province at the union. By subsection 2 all the powers, privileges, and duties at the union, conferred and imposed in Upper Canada on the separate schools and school trustees of the Queen's Roman Catholic subjects are extended to the dissentient schools of the Queen's Protestant and Roman Catholic subjects in Quebec ; (on this subsection no question arises in the present appeal).

By subsection 3 :—

"Where in any province a system of separate or dissentient schools exists by law at the union, or is thereafter established by the Legislature of the province, an appeal shall lie to the Governor-General in Council from any Act or decision of any provincial authority affecting any right or privilege of the Protestant or Roman Catholic minority of the Queen's subjects in relation to education."

The fourth subsection enacts that if a provincial law which seems to the Governor-General in Council requisite to give effect to his decision is not made or the decision is not executed, then the Parliament of Canada may make the necessary remedial law.

It will be observed that subsection 3 goes further than subsection 1 in material respects. In the first place, it applies not merely to what exists at the time of Confederation, but also to separate or dissentient schools established afterwards by provincial Legislatures. In the second place, the word "prejudicially," in subsection 1, is dropped out from before the expression "affecting," in subsection 3. In the third place, the right or privilege is not confined to one in respect of denominational schools, but is given in respect of education. Their Lordships think that these changes in language are significant. They show that the protection given by subsection 1 was deemed, if taken by itself, to be insufficient. It was not considered to be enough protection for the denominational schools to apply to them a restriction which only rendered ultra vires of the provinces a law which took away what was an existing legal right or privilege at the time of Confederation in respect of denominational schools. Subsection 3 contemplates that within the powers of the provincial Legislature Acts might be passed which did affect rights and privileges of religious minorities in relation to education, and gives a different kind of remedy, which appears, as has already been pointed out, to have been devised subsequently to the Quebec resolutions of 1864, and before the bill of 1867 was agreed on. Whenever an Act or decision of a provincial authority affecting any right or privilege of the minority, Protestant or Roman Catholic, in relation to education is challenged, an appeal is to lie to the Governor-General in Council, as distinguished from the Courts of law. No doubt if what is challenged is challenged on the ground of its being ultra vires, the right of appeal to a Court of law remains for both parties unimpaired. But there is a further right not based on the principle of ultra vires. That this is so is shown by the extension of the power of challenge to any system of separate or dissentient schools established by law after Confederation, and accordingly this could not be confined to rights or privileges at the time of Confederation. The omission of the word "prejudicially" in subsection 3 tends to bear out the view that something wider than a mere question of legality was intended, and the language of subsection 4, enabling the Dominion Parliament to legislate remedially for giving effect, "so far only as the circumstances of each case require," to the decision of the Governor-General in Council, points to a similar interpretation. What is to be dealt with is a right or privilege in relation to education.

Their Lordships are of opinion that where the Head of the Executive in Council in Canada is satisfied that injustice has been done by taking away a right or privilege which is other than a legal one, from the Protestant or Roman Catholic minority in relation to education, he may interfere. The step is one from mere legality to administrative propriety, a totally different matter. But it may be that those who had to find a new constitution for Canada when the British North America Act was passed in 1867, came to the conclusion that a very difficult situation could be met in no other way than by transferring the question from the region of legality to that of administrative fairness.

There is no question before their Lordships in this case concerning any appeal to the Governor-General in Council, and they abstain from saying anything as to the principles on which, if invoked, he may think fit to proceed. But the view that the rights of the appellants are not necessarily confined to rights under subsection 1 has an important bearing on the construction of that subsection, inasmuch as it no longer takes away all remedy in cases to which the principle of ultra vires does not apply. It may even be that the power conferred on the Governor-General in Council enables him to take into account the considerations arising out of what had been done in the course of de facto administration which Lord Justice James excluded in delivering the judgment of the Judicial Committee in 1874, in Maher v. Town Council of Portland, reported in Wheeler's "Confederation Law of Canada," and quoted by the late Lord Chancellor in delivering his recent judgment of the Committee in Hirsch v. Montreal Protestant School Commissioners (44 The Times L.R., 287; [1928] A.C., 200) on February 2 last. The question is one of administrative policy, and it is not before their Lordships. They desire, however, to observe that the view now expressed as to the relations of subsection 1 and subsection 3 of section 93 is substantially the same as that taken in Brophy v. Attorney-General for Manitoba (11 The Times L.R., 198 ; [1895] A.C., 202). In that case, the question arose under the Constitution Act of Manitoba, 1870, a Dominion Act under which, as subsequently confirmed by Imperial statute, Manitoba became one of the provinces of the Dominion of Canada. The Act contains in section 22 provisions which, for present purposes, are identical with those of subsections 1, 3 and 4 of section 93 of the British North America Act, 1867. It is true that in the second and corresponding subsection of section 22 of the Manitoba Act the appeal is expressly stated to lie against any Act or decision of the Legislature of the province as well as of any provincial authority, thus in words saying more than in subsection 3 of section 93 of the Act of 1867. But Lord Herschell in Brophy's case (supra) expressed his dissent from the argument that the insertion of the additional words in the Manitoba Act showed that in the Act of 1867 it could not have been intended to comprehend the Legislatures under the words "any provincial authority." Their Lordships agree with his view, and they are of opinion that the Legislatures are so comprehended. The point may prove to be one of great importance if there is hereafter an appeal to the Governor-General in Council. In Brophy's case (supra) the Roman Catholic minority in Manitoba appealed to the Governor-General in Council under subsection 2 of section 22 of their Constitutional Act on the ground that rights and privileges of theirs in relation to education had been affected by two statutes of the Legislature of Manitoba passed in 1890, which set up a general system of non-sectarian education. The schools of the Roman Catholic minority were deprived of their previously existing proportionate share of the money contributed for school purposes out of the taxes, while for the new non-sectarian schools they were both taxed and assessed for rates. It had been held, in City of Winnipeg v. Barrett (8 The Times L.R., 745 ; [1892] A.C., 445) that the statutes of 1890 did not affect any right or privilege with respect to their schools which the Roman Catholics of Manitoba had by law or practice in their province at the Union in 1870. The only right or privilege which they then possessed was to establish and maintain for the use of members of their own Church such schools, at their own expense, as they pleased. In Barrett's case (supra) this was the only question before the Judicial Committee, and it was held that the Acts of 1890 were not ultra vires.

But in Brophy's case (supra) the question was the wholly different one whether the rights and privileges of Roman Catholics in relation to education had not been so affected by the Act of 1890 as to enable an appeal to the Governor-General in Council in a quasi-administrative capacity. It was held that there was such affection, in fact although not in law, inasmuch as Roman Catholics were to be taxed and rated for the upkeep of schools which were obnoxious to their religious opinions in regard to education. It was no point of illegality. What was decided was that the Governor-General in Council had power to entertain such an appeal under subsection 2 of section 22 of the Constitutional Act, corresponding as their Lordships have already stated to subsection 3 of section 93 of the British North America Act, 1867.

Their Lordships have dwelt on what was decided in Brophy's case (supra) in reference to the scope of the appeal against the affection of rights or privileges within the meaning of subsection 3 of section 93 of the British North America Act, 1867, with a view to bringing out the limitation which has to be placed on the expressions used in subsection 1. The rights and privileges there referred to must be such as are given by law, and the redress which may be given in respect of prejudice to them, caused by laws made by the provincial Legislatures which, in other respects, have the exclusive power of legislation in relation to education, is a redress based on the principle of ultra vires. Such redress can, therefore, for the reasons given in Brophy's case (supra), be sought from the Courts of Law alone. The other remedy which subsections 3 and 4 afford not only supplements the former but affords cogent reason why subsection 1 should be construed as being confined strictly to questions of ultra vires. Were the Acts and Regulations complained of in the petition of right assailable under this principle ? In order to answer this question it is necessary to understand clearly what was their nature and to understand this it is essential to see what has been the development of the system of education in Upper Canada.

Before 1867 there were in Canada schools of three principal classes, common schools, grammar schools, and separate schools. Since Confederation there have come into existence continuation schools, collegiate institutes, and high schools, which have developed out of the three kinds of school last mentioned. The claim of the appellants is that, in 1867, Roman Catholics in Upper Canada enjoyed by law the right to establish denominational schools, to be conducted by boards of trustees chosen by themselves ; that, as regards selection of text books and courses of study, the control of these belonged to the boards of trustees, who could sanction in their schools courses of study co-extensive in scope with those, since Confederation, pursued in high schools, collegiate institutions and continuation schools. The case made was that the trustees could do this in the separate schools, inasmuch as these, although common schools, were not, under the old order of things, restricted in their scope as regards education of pupils up to 21 years of age. It is argued for the appellants that under section 93 (1) the Roman Catholics of Ontario continued to enjoy these autonomous rights, coupled with a consequential right of exemption from taxation for the purposes of the high schools, collegiate institutes, and continuation schools, which, it is said, are mere forms of what fall within the scope of existing separate schools, and are, therefore, of a kind for which the Roman Catholics were exempt from taxation.

Their Lordships may say at once that if such a right was really conferred on the boards of separate schools, the right and the title to grants dependent on it were not interrupted by the Act of 1867. It was held by Mr. Justice Rose, who tried the case, and by the Appellate Court of Ontario, that the newly created province of Ontario was not affected by any obligation in regard to this, and that the separate school trustees had consequently, after Confederation, no legal right to share in any appropriation or grants to be made by the new province of Ontario for common school purposes. For this conclusion reliance was placed on section 20 of the Separate Schools Act of the United Province of 1863, which enacts that "every separate school shall be entitled to a share in the fund annually granted by the Legislature of this Province for the support of common schools, and shall be entitled also to a share in all other public grants, investments, and allotments for common school purposes, now made or hereafter to be made by the province or the municipal authorities, according," &c. The learned Judges of the Appellate Court, who did not differ from the judgment of the first Judge in the case, have held that the right granted by the Act of 1863 was confined to a right to a share of the grants made by the old United Province of Canada, and had no application to the new Ontario established at Confederation. It was true, they said, that under section 129 of the British North America Act, 1867, all laws in force in Canada at the union were continued in Ontario as if the union had not been made, but subject to repeal or alteration by Parliament or by the legislature of Ontario. They thought, however, that to enact that a law shall continue in force after the union is not to declare that the meaning of that law shall be changed by the union, and there was nothing to indicate that a law relating to distribution of moneys voted by the Legislature of the old province of Canada should govern legislation after the union. The Act of 1863 might not be repealed, but the fund with which it dealt was no longer in existence.

The Supreme Court of Canada did not adopt this view. The Chief Justice of Canada emphatically dissented from it, and none of the other learned Judges who sat with him, not even those who were in favour of approving the judgment, expressed themselves as differing from his dissent. The Chief Justice of Canada thought the conclusion reached below on this question to be at variance with the spirit and intent of section 93 (1) of the Act of 1867. Unless the Legislatures of Ontario and Quebec were debarred from prejudicially affecting the rights and privileges which the religious minorities possessed in regard to their denominational schools in regard to maintenance and support, the protection given by the section would be illusory. On this point their Lordships are in full agreement with the Chief Justice of Canada. Section 93 was, in their view, obviously meant to apply to the future as well as to the past, and to the new province of Ontario.

This consideration leads up to the crucial point in this appeal. Did the trustees of the separate Roman Catholic schools secure at Confederation a right to maintain, free from control or regulation by the legislature of Ontario, as respects the scope of instruction, denominational schools which could embrace the subjects formerly taught in the separate schools on their higher sides, and afterwards taught in the undenominational high schools, collegiate institutes, and continuation schools, as developed after Confederation, or analogous subjects taught in the Roman Catholic separate schools before Confederation, and to exemption from taxation for the support of such undenominational educative organizations? And did the trustees secure a title to receive a share of every grant by the Legislature for common school purposes, construed as extending to the maintenance of education of the type given in post-Confederation secondary schools, as well as in those that were merely elementary, based on the number of pupils attending the separate schools, and independent of the subjects taught, or the text-books used, every separate school being entitled to its share, calculated according to a statutory rate, however advanced, however rudimentary, the education and books might be? If these questions are answered in the affirmative then it was ultra vircs of Ontario to take away the right either to regulate the schools in a manner inconsistent with this freedom, or to diminish the grants or to tax for the support of the undenominational schools, by legislation, or administratively, so far as control was concerned, by State regulation.

The question is a very serious one. Before Confederation the common schools and with them the separate schools were left free, by statute (see Upper Canada Common Schools Act, 1859, section 16), to educate pupils up to the age of 21, and some of them were in the habit of giving to the older pupils advanced teaching such as would fit them to enter the University. But Roman Catholics find a great difficulty in sending their sons and daughters to the higher schools which have now been established for the purposes of this advanced teaching. As the Chief Justice of Canada has said, undenominational education is based on the idea that the separation of secular from religious education may be advantageous. But Roman Catholics, at least, hold that religious instruction and influence should always accompany secular training.

What, then, were the rights of the supporters of the separate schools at the time of Confederation? To answer this, and the question of ultra vires which arises out of it, it is necessary to look at the history of the development of education in Canada.

In the end of the eighteenth century there had been grants made for the establishment and support of schools for the children of the inhabitants of the Province of Upper Canada. These grants were at first grants of land, and the schools to be established were to be such as appear then to have been somewhat loosely called grammar schools. The schools were put on a statutory basis by an Act of the Legislative Council and Assembly of Upper Canada, passed in 1807, and were in that Act called "public schools," which were to be managed by trustees nominated for each school district. In 1816, under another Act, grants of money were made by the Legislature for the benefit of the schools, which were in that Act and the subsequent Acts renamed common schools, and local Boards of Education were set up. The trustees were to manage the schools and make regulations for them, but they were to report every three months to the proper Board as to the regulations and the books used in the schools, and the Board was to control the regulations and the books.

By an Act of the Province in 1820 further moneys were granted from the taxes for the use of common schools, and by a later Act of 1824 still more money for the extension of moral and religious instruction, and for the development of the common schools, was directed to be applied. Yet further grants were made by a statute of 1833. By a later statute of 1839 provision was made for the assistance of a university college, as well as for the grammar schools which had grown up in the Province, and for the appropriation of the proceeds of land granted for their maintenance.

In 1840 an Imperial Act was passed uniting Upper and Lower Canada into a single Province of Canada, with one Legislative Council and Assembly. Up to this date what had been established were common and grammar schools. They appear to have been undenominational, although provision was made for moral and religious instruction. In 1841 a change in policy was made, for in that year an Act was passed which not only provided for the further organization and endowment from provincial funds of the common schools, but enabled a Superintendent of Education to be appointed who was, among other things, to promote uniformity in the conduct of common schools throughout the Provinces. There were to be Commissioners elected for each township and parish, who were to regulate the courses of study to be followed and the books to be used. The chief change in policy made by this Act was that where a body of the inhabitants of a township or parish dissented from the regulations of the Commissioners, they could appoint trustees to take over the powers of common school Commissioners and to establish and maintain common schools "in the manner and subject to the visitation, conditions, rules, and obligations" provided for other common schools, and to receive a due proportion, according to their number, of the moneys coming from taxes and rates for the support of common schools. By a later section the Governor was to appoint a Board of Examiners for each city and town corporate, one-half of them to be Roman Catholics and the other half Protestants, each half to perform the duties in respect of the schools attended by children of its own religion.

Although the term "separate" is not in this Act applied to any school, it is plain that the Act initiated the principle of separate schools. And it is also plain that, so far as control by the State was concerned, the new separate schools were in all material respects under the same control as the ordinary common schools.

In 1843 the policy described was further extended. The supervision of education by the Government of the United Province was developed. The establishment of Protestant and Roman Catholic schools, with teachers of their respective persuasions, was again provided for, and such schools were in this Act described as "separate" schools. But all such "separate schools" were to be subject, by section 56, to the visitation, conditions, rules, and obligations of common schools. Normal schools for the training of teachers, and model schools in which the principal teachers were to be certified by a normal school, were also provided for. In 1846 this Act was superseded by a new Common Schools Act. A Superintendent of Schools for Upper Canada was to be appointed, whose powers extended, among other things, to the provision and recommendation of uniform and approved text-books in all the schools. There was to be also a Board of Education for the Province. The limits of age for children attending the common schools were to be from four to 16. The principle of separate schools, with a right to receive a share of appropriations proportionate to the number of children attending the respective separate schools, was continued, and the separate schools were declared to be subject to the regulations obtaining with regard to other common schools.

Their Lordships do not think that the statutes which were subsequently passed down to 1855 bear materially on the question before them. It is plain that the policy laid down from the commencement of the nineteenth century up to 1855 was to place all the common schools, including the separate schools, which were merely a special form of these, under ultimate State regulation. By the Grammar Schools Act of 1853 the instruction in a grammar school was to extend to the higher branches of practical English and commercial education, including the elements of natural philosophy and mechanics, and also to Latin, Greek, and mathematics, so as to prepare students for University education. There was also provision for uniting some of the common schools with grammar schools, a provision which indicates that, subject to regulation, there was no very definite limitation imposed on what might be taught in a common school. The tendency of the Legislature up to this point was to bring education in Upper Canada, subject to minor variations, into a single system.

By 1855 the Roman Catholic population in Upper Canada had apparently increased in numbers and importance. For an Act was passed in that year, known as the Taché Act, which put the separate schools for Roman Catholics on a new footing. Meetings could be convened of persons desiring to establish separate schools, and they could select trustees, who became bodies corporate, and might become boards for the united separate schools of a city or town. The trustees were to have all the powers of rating and collection from persons sending children to their schools that the trustees of common schools had in respect of their schools. They were to be bound to perform all duties required of the latter, and their teachers were to be subject to similar regulations. The supporters of the separate schools were exempted from rates for future common schools and common school libraries. Each of the new separate schools was to be entitled to a share in the fund annually granted by the Legislature for the support of the pupils attending it, proportionate to the average numbers attending it. The trustees were to report to the Chief Superintendent of Education as to the average attendance, and he was to determine the share of grants to be received.

Meantime, statutory grants were made for improving the position of the grammar, normal, and model schools. In 1859 a Consolidating Act was passed by what had become the Legislative Council and Assembly for the now United Province of Canada. This Act related to common schools. It did not make any important changes in the law, but aimed, for the most part, at bringing together the existing statutory provisions relating to common schools. Many of the provisions of this Act were embodied by reference in the Act respecting separate schools passed in the same year as stated below. The office of Chief Superintendent of Education was reconstituted. He was to be under the direction of the Governor. The duty of the Chief Superintendent under the General Consolidating Act now cited was, among other things, under section 106, to apportion in each year

"all moneys granted or provided by the Legislature for the support of common schools in Upper Canada, and not otherwise appropriated by law, to the several counties, townships, cities, &c.," according to ratio of population.

There was also to be a Council of Public Instruction of nine persons, appointed by the Governor. Among other things it was to make regulations for the organization, government and discipline of common schools, for the classification of schools and teachers, and for school libraries, and to examine and at its discretion to recommend or disapprove of text-books for the use of schools or school libraries. By section 120 the Governor could authorize the expenditure, in Upper Canada, out of the share of the legislative school grant and the additional monies granted in aid of common and grammar schools "and not otherwise expressly appropriated by law," of certain sums for purposes which were not connected with the separate schools. By section 121, the whole of the remainder of the grants mentioned in section 120 and not exclusively appropriated in its subsections, were to be expended in aid of the common schools according to the provisions of the Act. There was a Conscience Section (129) in the Act.

In the same year (1859) the Separate Schools Act, already referred to, was passed. The main provisions of the Common Schools Act of 1859 were thereby made applicable to the separate schools, but the new Act was designed in sections 18 to 36 to make clear what was the position in particular of Roman Catholic separate schools. The existing provisions for these were repeated with variations, and it was enacted that the trustees of each separate school should perform the same duties and be subject to the same penalties as trustees of common schools. By section 33 every separate school was again to be entitled to a proportionate share in the annual grant for common schools. The trustees were to report the names and attendance of the children attending these schools to the Chief Superintendent, who was thereupon to determine what they were entitled to receive out of the legislative grant.

It is now necessary to refer to the final Separate Schools Act, passed in 1863, which substituted a new set of provisions in the Act of 1859, in place of subsections 18 to 36 which were by this Act repealed. Amongst those new provisions were section 20, a reenactment, with additions, of the old section 33 of the Act of 1859, and a section which their Lordships set out later in this judgment.

The appellants contend that the words in section 106 of the Common Schools Act of 1859 "not otherwise appropriated by law" include the share of the apportioned fund to which they are entitled under section 20 of the Act of 1863, and show that they are not excluded from sharing in all the moneys appropriated outside those "granted or provided by the Legislature for the support of common schools." But their Lordships think that this is erroneous and that the learned Judges were right who thought that the separate schools are only entitled to share in the moneys "granted by the Legislature for the support of common schools, not otherwise appropriated by law," and also by the Act of 1863 in all other public grants made for common school purposes. The appropriations form, in short, a first debit item against the money grant. After that, after the appropriations have been made and the debit item has been satisfied, comes the second stage—namely, that of apportionment; and it is in this apportionment that the separate schools have their share. The apportionment mentioned in section 106 (2) is not that of the total fund, but only of that fund after the trustees of the separate schools had received their share. This their Lordships regard as the true meaning of the Act.

This statute of 1863 is an important one. Its declared purpose was to restore to Roman Catholics in Upper Canada certain rights in respect of separate schools, and to bring the law respecting separate schools more into harmony with the law respecting common schools. It was in force at Confederation, and it has been spoken of as the charter of the denominational schools. The chief points in it were that separate school sections, whether in the same or in adjoining municipalities (not only, as in the earlier Act, the schools in one ward of a city or town), might be joined in a separate school union section. The teachers of separate schools were to be subject to the same examinations, and to receive certificates of qualification in the same way as common school teachers generally. Supporters of separate schools were to be exempt from payment of municipal rates for common schools and libraries, while they continued to be supporters of separate schools, and not merely for the current year, as under the old legislation. The Roman Catholic separate schools were to be subject to such inspection as might be directed by the Chief Superintendent of Education, and were to be subject also to such regulations as might be imposed from time to time by the Council of Public Instruction for Upper Canada. All Judges, members of the Legislature, heads of local municipal bodies, the Chief Superintendent and the Local Superintendent of Common Schools, and clergymen of the Roman Church, were to be visitors of these separate schools. Section 20 is a section to which much of the argument at their Lordships' Bar was directed. It is in these terms :—

"Every separate school shall be entitled to a share in the fund annually granted by the Legislature of this province for the support of common schools, and shall be entitled also to a share in all other public grants, investments and allotments for common school purposes now made or hereafter to be made by the province or the municipal authorities, according to the average number of pupils attending such school during the twelve next preceding months, or during the number of months which may have elapsed from the establishment of a new separate school, as compared with the whole average number of pupils attending school in the same city, town, village or township."

By section 21 local assessments for common school purposes were excluded from the money to which the separate schools were to be entitled. By section 26 the Roman Catholic separate schools were to be subject to such inspection as might be directed from time to time by the Chief Superintendent and were to be "subject also to such regulations as might be imposed from time to time by the Council of Public Instruction for Upper Canada."

The questions which arise on this Act are, first of all, whether, having regard to the provisions quoted, laws have been enacted by the province which prejudicially affect any legal right or privilege with respect to denominational schools which the Roman Catholic community (a class of persons) had obtained under these statutes at the union. The second question is whether under these statutes the Roman Catholic schools had become entitled at the union to grants which were fixed and could not be taken away or interfered with by the authorities of the province. It has been to render the nature of these questions clear that their Lordships have considered it necessary to examine at some length the history and character of the legislation before Confederation.

The petition of right claims that the suppliants have a legal title to establish and conduct courses of study, with grades of education, such as are now conducted in what are designated as continuation schools, collegiate institutes, and high schools, and that any statutes and regulations purporting to limit or prejudicially affect this title are ultra vires. The petition further claims that the class of persons represented by the petitioners are exempt from payment of rates imposed for the support of these organizations when not established by trustees of Roman Catholic separate schools. Consequentially on their claim the petitioners ask that the trustees of the Roman Catholic separate schools for section 2, township of Tiny, may have paid to them certain monies to which it is said that they would have been entitled on the footing that the general claim as to validity is properly established.

The appellants say that the old common schools were allowed to give such education as was found suitable to pupils up to 21, who were thereby prepared for the University, and that the separate schools enjoyed the right thus permitted, and possessed it at Confederation. For this purpose the classes in the schools were in point of fact "graded." The Courts of Ontario have held in the present case that while this grading was de facto permitted it was always subject to the regulations by which the State authorities might from time to time alter and define the work in the common (including the separate) schools. Subject to this supervision, "grading" might take place either in the classes of a single school, or by distributing the teaching where there was a group of schools, as in urban municipalities. It is said for the appellants that the only rival of the common and separate schools as they were up to and after Confederation was the grammar school, which was not under the common school Acts, but was always organized under separate statutes. The appellants further argued that an Act passed after Confederation in Ontario in 1871 for the improvement of the common and grammar schools really transformed both the common and the grammar schools. They were re-arranged in two divisions, in one of which free education was to be given up to the age of 12, such division to be called a "public school." The other division was to be a "high school," and to give higher instruction with the aid of the old grammar school grant and of contributions from local revenues by the municipal authorities. The boards of grammar school trustees were to take over these high schools, and to administer them under regulation.

The appellants contend that the common school was at the union entitled to provide for the public, other than separate school supporters, education of every kind which in the judgment of its trustees it was desirable to give, and that some of the urban common schools were then known as high schools, in which the teaching extended as far as that in the grammar schools, and was substantially that prescribed for the new high schools after the Act of 1871. The new public and high schools were, it is argued, just divisions of pre-Confederation common schools, with compulsory taxation for the new high schools. From such taxation, it is said, the Roman Catholic separate school supporters must be exempt, and they cannot be affected by the combination brought about by the Act of 1871.

Of the post-Confederation continuation schools, which were established by statutes of 1896 and 1908, it is said that these began by being only continuation classes in public schools in municipalities in which no high school had been established, but were by the Act of 1908 made into continuation schools supported by grants and rates. In any view, as they cannot be given the form of separate schools, Roman Catholics should be free from taxation for them. Of collegiate institutes, it is said that they are only certain high schools to which a special name has been given.

The petition also claims that certain sections in various statutes which infringe the principles thus contended for are ultra vires.

The provincial Legislature is supreme in matters of education, excepting so far as section 93 of the British North America Act, 1867, restricts its authority. Subsection 1 preserves as they stood any rights and the privileges given in relation to denominational schools by law in 1867. The question, therefore, is whether the province could then, as the law stood, so control the courses of study and the general range and quality of the textbooks used, as to enable the educational authorities of the province to prescribe the gradation of the separate school and the stages in which instruction should be given in it. Examination of the statutes and of the history of the subject have satisfied their Lordships that, while a settlement was come to in 1863 with both Roman Catholics and Protestants, a settlement which, in so far as it remained unaltered at Confederation, must be strictly maintained, the province showed in the wording of the successive earlier statutes the intention to preserve for the rest the power to mould the educational system in the interests of the public at large, as distinguished from any section of it, however important. This consideration does not relieve a Court of law from the obligation to confine itself strictly to the meaning of the words which define the legal rights, but it must be borne in mind in the interpretation of the language relating to regulation.

The examination of the series of statutes relating to education from 1807 onwards has led their Lordships to the view that the province did provide for the regulation, in the full sense, of its common or public schools. It is not necessary to repeat the citations which have already been made. It is sufficient, for showing what regulation means, to refer to section 6 of the Act of 1816, which delegated to the trustees of the common schools the power to make rules and regulations for their good government, the condition of the schools to be reported to the Board of Education, with the branches taught, the state of education, the number of scholars, and things that might benefit the schools directed by the trustees. The Board was to have power to superintend these common schools and to make reports to the Governor, which should be laid before the Legislature. This policy was maintained through the Acts which followed. In 1841 a Superintendent of Education for the Province was appointed to visit the schools and apportion the moneys voted. Common School Commissioners were set up for the various districts, with instructions to regulate for each school the course of study to be followed in it, and to establish general rules for the conduct of the school, to be communicated to the teachers. There were also to be appointed by the Governor boards of examiners (half to be Protestant and half to be Roman Catholic) to examine persons recommended as teachers, and to regulate for each school separately the course of study to be followed, the books to be used, and the general rules for the conduct of the schools. The Act of 1841 enabled, indeed, dissentient inhabitants to call for separate common schools and to appoint their own trustees, but these schools were to be subject to the "visitation, conditions, rules, obligations and liabilities" of ordinary common schools. This provision was repeated in the Act relating to common schools of 1843 (section 56), and in the Act of 1846 (section 33). In the Act of 1850 it is expressly provided (section 19) that the separate schools are to be under the same regulations as to the persons for whom the school is permitted to be established as common schools generally, and by section 9 of the Separate Schools Act of 1863 it is provided that the trustees of separate schools are to perform the same duties and be subject to the same penalties as the trustees of common schools. Section 26 subjects these schools to such inspection as the Chief Superintendent may direct, and also to such regulation as the Council of Public Instruction may impose.

It is this principle and purpose which appear to their Lordships to be dominant through the statutes, and the language used in the sections just quoted has brought this Committee to the conclusion that the power of regulation must be interpreted in a wider sense than that given to it in the judgment of the Chief Justice of Canada. They are not at one with him in thinking that separate school trustees could give secondary education in their schools otherwise than by the permission, express or implied, of the Council of Public Instruction. The separate school was only a special form of common school, and the Council could in the case of each determine the courses to be pursued and the extent of the education to be imparted. A full power of regulation, such as the purpose of the statutes quoted renders appropriate, is what suggests itself, and this is the natural outcome of a scheme which never appears to have really varied. Such expressions as "organisation," "government," "discipline," and "classification," do, in their Lordships' interpretation of them, imply a real control of the separate schools. The duty of the Judicial Committee is simply to interpret the words used. It may be that even if the contention of the appellants as to the scope of subsection 1 is shut out, there will remain to them a remedy of a wholly different kind in the shape of an appeal under subsection 3 to the Governor-General in Council in an administrative capacity. That question does not arise in this appeal and is in no way prejudiced by the conclusion to which their Lordships have come.

What has been said on the subject of ultra vires in regard to regulation also applies to the title to fixed grants. The appellants rely on section 20 of the Separate Schools Act of 1863, a section which has been already quoted. It declares every separate school to be entitled to a share in the fund annually granted by the Legislature for the support of common schools, and also to a share in all other public grants, investments, and allotments for common school purposes, according to a defined proportion. It is argued that their share of these grants is being withheld from the appellants and from the Roman Catholic separate schools generally. But the question really turns on whether the authorities of the province had power to make apportionments and payments out of the funds granted before the balance was arrived at which should be available for common school purposes. In their Lordships' opinion it is clear that there was such power. Section 106 of the Common Schools Act of 1859 defined as the duty of the Chief Superintendent to apportion the moneys granted or provided by the Legislature "and not otherwise appropriated by law" in a manner analogous to that subsequently provided by section 20 of the Act of 1863. Section 120 of the 1859 Act enabled the Governor to make a number of appropriations out of the sums granted, and section 121 provides that the whole of the remainder of the grants mentioned and not exclusively appropriated in the earlier sections to be expended in aid of the common schools according to the provisions of the Act.

In their Lordships' view, in the face of the provisions referred to, it is impossible to contend successfully that it was ultra vires after Confederation to make new appropriations out of the grants which would diminish what would otherwise have come to the appellants. Whether the case is looked at from the point of view of regulation, or whether it is regarded from that of discretion in power of appropriation, the result is the same. It is indeed true that power to regulate merely does not imply a power to abolish. But the controversy with which this Board has to deal on the present occasion is a long way from abolition. It may be that the new laws will hamper the freedom of the Roman Catholics in their denominational schools. They may conceivably be or have been subjected to injustice of a kind that they can submit to the Governor-General in Council, and through him to the Parliament of Canada. But they are still left with separate schools, which are none the less actual because the liberty of giving secondary and higher education in them may be abridged by regulation. Such an abridgment may be in the usual course when a national system of education has attained a certain stage in its development, and it would be difficult to forgo this power if the grading which may be essential is also to be possible. Their Lordships do not think grading is in itself inconsistent with such rights to separation of schools as were reserved at Confederation.

Copious reference has been made in the argument to the reports, circulars, and instructions which were issued with reference to educational administration by the Chief Superintendent and other officials, from time to time, before Confederation. These documents are not relevant in construing section 93, but they do show what the administrative system was, and, as doing so, they have been legitimately referred to. In the report in 1846, Dr. Ryerson, who was then Assistant Superintendent and shortly afterwards became Chief Superintendent, gave his first account of the system which was being progressively built up. He laid stress on the control of textbooks and on the provision of normal schools in which to train teachers. His activities, and the work of those who were setting themselves to the same task of developing the administrative side of the educational problem, are fully summarized in the elaborate judgment of Mr. Justice Rose who tried the case. While their Lordships do not agree with that learned Judge in the view, taken by himself and the other Ontario Judges, that there was no Province of Canada after 1867 to which the principle of ultra vires applied, they observe the thoroughness of his judgment in other respects and the way in which he has covered in detail the field of controversy. He devoted much of his judgment to pointing out that the real question is whether the legislation subsequent to 1871 has prejudicially affected the appellants' rights, firstly, by depriving separate school supporters of the power to conduct such schools as were actually being conducted at Confederation by common school trustees in certain localities, and secondly, by making separate school supporters liable for rates for the support of schools which have been set up to do some of the work which separate schools had a legal right to do.

It is a satisfaction to have had the advantage, in a case so important and complicated as this, of judgments so thorough and exhaustive as these, both in the Supreme Court of Canada and in the Ontario Courts.

For reasons which now sufficiently appear, their Lordships will humbly advise His Majesty that this appeal should be dismissed. There will be no order as to costs.

HAYES v. CURTIS.*

Agriculture—Minimum wage—Deduction—Sale of milk by employer—Set-off price—Agricultural Wages (Regulation) Act, 1924 (14 and 15 Geo. V., c. 37), s. 8 and Orders thereunder.

By an Order of the Agricultural Wages Board minimum rates of wages were fixed for workers in agriculture in the county of Dorset, and by an Order of the Dorset Agricultural Wages Committee it was provided that no benefit or advantage, except a cottage or board and lodging, should be reckoned as payment of wages in lieu of payment in cash.

The respondent employed a cowman under a contract in pursuance of which the employer supplied one pint of new milk daily, which was to be purchased by the cowman. The purchase price, amounting to 1s. 5½d. per week, was deducted from the cowman's wages. The justices found that the arrangement was "in the nature of a sale," and that the cowman "in effect" paid the purchase price by the deduction, but as there was, apart from his allowance, a deficiency in the wages paid they convicted the respondent. On a case stated as to the deduction of the price of milk,

* Reported by J. W. Hall, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Held, that the respondent had done the very thing which the statute and Orders forbade. The set-off of the purchase price was simply reckoning the milk as payment in lieu of payment in cash.

This was a case stated by justices for the county of Dorset.

Two informations were preferred on June 28, 1927, by Courtenay Hayes (hereinafter called the appellant) against Bertram Curtis (hereinafter called the respondent) for that he on March 11 and 18, 1927, at Coombe Farm, Sherborne, in the said county, being a person who employed James Ellis Hunt, a worker in agriculture, did not pay wages to the said James Ellis Hunt at a rate not less than the minimum rate as fixed under the provisions of the Agricultural Wages (Regulation) Act, 1924 (14 and 15 Geo. V., c. 37) and the Order of the Agricultural Wages Board made thereunder, No. 216, dated February 21, 1927, and the Orders of the Agricultural Wages Committee for the said county of Dorset, dated April 30, 1926, and February 11, 1927, respectively. The justices convicted the respondent and fined him 10s. in respect of each offence and also ordered him to pay the said James Ellis Hunt the sum of 5s. 4d. a week for a period of six months in accordance with the provisions of section 7, subsection 3, of the Agricultural Wages (Regulation) Act, 1924, and the Orders of the Agricultural Wages Board and the Agricultural Wages Committee for the county of Dorset aforesaid.

Upon the hearing of the said informations, the following facts were proved or admitted :—

(A) That the appellant was a person authorized by law to institute proceedings under the said Agricultural Wages (Regulation) Act, 1924.

(B) That the Orders of the Agricultural Wages Board and the Agricultural Wages Committee for the administrative county of Dorset material to this case were as follows :—

(i.) An Order of the Agricultural Wages Board, No. 216, dated February 21, 1927, prescribing minimum rates of wages.

(ii.) An Order of the Dorset Agricultural Wages Committee (Dorset 6) dated April 30, 1926, defining overtime employment.

(iii.) An Order of the Dorset Agricultural Wages Committee (Dorset 7) dated February 11, 1927, defining the benefits or advantages which might be reckoned as payment of wages in lieu of payment in cash. These were (a) a cottage and (b) board and lodging. The Order further provided : "Except as in this Order provided, no benefit or advantage shall be reckoned as payment of wages in lieu of payment in cash."

(C) That the respondent in or about the month of March, 1922, entered into a contract with the said James Ellis Hunt, whereby the respondent was to employ the said James Ellis Hunt as a worker in agriculture—namely, a cowman on the respondent's farm, called Coombe Farm, Sherborne, and that the said James Ellis Hunt continued in the service of the respondent until March 25, 1927, under the said contract.

(D) That at all material times the respondent paid to the said James Ellis Hunt a weekly wage of £1 12s. 6½d. and supplied him with one pint of new milk daily.

(E) That the value of the said milk was 2½d. a pint or 1s. 5½d. per week.

(F) That in accordance with the agreement made between the respondent and the said James Ellis Hunt, the said milk was purchased from the respondent, the price thereof being deducted from the weekly cash wages paid to the said James Ellis Hunt.

It was contended on behalf of the appellant :—

(a) That as and from the date of the Order of the Dorset Agricultural Wages Committee dated February 11, 1927, the respondent was prohibited from reckoning as payment of wages the value of the milk provided by the respondent, and that the respondent was bound to pay the said James Ellis Hunt such wages in cash without any deduction or set-off for any amount which might be owed by the said James Ellis Hunt.

(b) That if there was an agreement made between the respondent and the said James Ellis Hunt to set off the value of the said milk against the weekly cash wages due to the said James Ellis Hunt such deduction would be contrary to the said Orders and to the decisions in the cases of Williams and Others v. North's Navigation Collieries (1889), Limited (22 The Times L.R., 372 ; [1906] A.C., 136) and Jones v. Harris (43 The Times L.R., 1 ; [1927] 1 K.B., 425).

It was contended on behalf of the respondent that the respondent was entitled to set-off against the wages payable to the said James Ellis Hunt the value of the milk as a debt due to the respondent.

Upon the facts proved or admitted the justices held :—

(a) That the supply of the milk to the said James Ellis Hunt was in the nature of a sale ; that the said James Ellis Hunt in effect paid the money for the price of the milk to the respondent out of the moneys received by him as wages from the respondent.

(b) That excluding the sum of 1s. 5½d. referred to above, 5s. 4d. was in fact due from the respondent to the said James Ellis Hunt in respect of arrears of wages for the weeks ending March 11 and 18, 1927, respectively.

The justices therefore, in the circumstances, convicted the respondent and imposed upon him a fine of 10s. in each case and ordered him to pay to the said James Ellis Hunt the sum of £6 18s. 8d. in respect of arrears of wages at the rate of 5s. 4d. per week in accordance with section 7 (3) of the Agricultural Wages (Regulation) Act, 1924.

The question upon which the opinion of the Court was desired was whether upon the above statement of facts the said determination was correct in point of law.

Mr. Hubert Hull appeared for the appellant, contending that the justices were wrong in allowing a set-off of 1s. 5½d. a week ; the respondent did not appear and was not represented.

The Lord Chief Justice.—This is a case stated by justices and it raises a rather important point on the working of the Agricultural Wages (Regulation) Act, 1924. By section 8 of that Act the Minister of Agriculture has power to make regulations, and in particular " (a) for requiring the wages committees by order to define the benefits or advantages (not being benefits or advantages prohibited by law) which may be reckoned as payment of wages in lieu of payment in cash . . . and for enabling the committees by order to limit or prohibit the reckoning of benefits or advantages as payment of wages in lieu of cash. . . ."

In pursuance of those powers and the Orders made under them, the Dorset Agricultural Wages Committee made a certain Order, dated February 11, 1927, whereby it was ordered that, except as therein provided, no benefit or advantage should be reckoned as payment of wages in lieu of payment in cash. The only benefits permitted to be so reckoned were a cottage and board and lodging. It was here found that the appellant paid Hunt £1 12s. 6½d. per week, and that that sum fell short of the minimum wage by 5s. 4d. even though credit were given for 1s. 5½d., which was paid, as it was said, for milk. The case finds that the respondent in March, 1922, entered into a contract with this cowman, and that in pursuance of that contract the milk was purchased from the respondent, and the price deducted from the wages paid by the respondent to Hunt. In other words, the price of the milk was treated as part of the wages. The justices found with some hesitation that this deduction was allowable, that it was "in the nature of a sale," and that the cowman "in effect" paid for the milk. It is clear that the respondent has done the very thing which the statute and Orders provide that he is not to do. The appeal, I think, succeeds.

MR. JUSTICE AVORY.—I agree.

MR. JUSTICE SHEARMAN.—I agree.

Summary Jurisdiction—Local authority—Information preferred by clerk—Case stated—Personal recognizance by clerk—Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1857 (20 and 21 Vict., c. 43), s. 3—Public Health Act, 1875 (38 and 39 Vict., c. 55), s. 259.

Where the clerk to a local authority takes proceedings in his own name under the power conferred by s. 259 of the Public Health Act, 1875, he is the informant, and on a case stated being asked for by him, he is the appellant and the proper person to enter into the recognizance required by s. 3 of the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1857. It is immaterial that he may have been described in the information as "duly authorized," such words being mere surplusage.

Leyton U.D.C. v. Wilkinson (43 The Times L.R., 326 ; [1927] 1 K.B., 853) distinguished.

A preliminary objection was taken by the respondent to the hearing of this case, stated by justices for Hampshire, on the ground that the appellant had not entered into the recognizance required by section 3 of the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1857.

On November 24, 1927, the Eastleigh and Bishopstoke Urban District Council resolved :—

"Inasmuch as a report dated November 17, 1927, has been received by the Council from their Sanitary Inspector that Frederick George Martin, of Rose Cottage, Crowd-hill, Eastleigh, did on November 17, 1927, at 10.15 a.m., whilst in the employ of the Four Counties Bacon Company (1927), Limited, offend against the by-law numbered 9 in force with respect to slaughterhouses in the urban district of Eastleigh and Bishopstoke, by reason of the said Frederick George Martin proceeding to slaughter four pigs before the same had been effectually stunned with a mechanically operated instrument suitable and sufficient for the purpose as provided by the said by-law numbered 9, that proceedings be taken against the said Frederick George Martin in the Court of Summary Jurisdiction in respect of so offending against the said by-law, and that the Clerk to the Council be authorized to lay the necessary information and do all things necessary in connexion with such proceedings in the name of and on behalf of the Council."

In pursuance of this resolution, an information was preferred by the Clerk to the Council on December 1, 1927, of which the material parts were as follows :—

"The information of Jesse Lawrence, of the parish of Eastleigh in the said county, Clerk to the Urban District Council of Eastleigh and Bishopstoke, duly authorized, who states, &c.—(Signed) J. LAWRENCE."

On this information a summons was issued which was, so far as material, in the form following :—

"To Frederick George Martin.—Information has been laid before me this day by Jesse Lawrence, of the parish of Eastleigh, in the said county, Clerk to the Urban District Council of Eastleigh and Bishopstoke, duly authorized in this behalf, for that you, &c., &c.

You are therefore hereby summoned, &c., &c."

On December 12 the justices heard the matter of the information and dismissed the charge against the defendant. On December 16 Mr. Lawrence gave notice of his desire for a case to be stated, in these terms.

"URBAN DISTRICT OF EASTLEIGH AND BISHOPSTOKE.
Council Offices,
Eastleigh, Hants.

To Colonel Edwin King Perkins, C.B.E., M.P., Colonel Ernest Frederic Hall, C.M.G., and Frederick James Hendy and George Kennett Page, Esquires, four of his Majesty's justices of the peace for the county of Southampton, and to John Colin Dominy, Esquire, the Clerk of the Court of summary jurisdiction sitting at Eastleigh.

Whereas an information where I, the undersigned, Jesse Lawrence, was informant, and Frederick George Martin was defendant, was heard before and determined by the Court of summary jurisdiction sitting at Eastleigh on the twelfth day of December, 1927. Now I, the undersigned, being dissatisfied and aggrieved with your determination upon the hearing of the said information as being erroneous in point of law hereby, pursuant to the provisions of the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1857, and the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1879, apply to you to state and sign a case setting forth the facts and grounds of such your determination and the grounds on which the proceedings are questioned, for the opinion thereon of the King's Bench Division of the High Court of Justice.

Dated this sixteenth day of December, 1927.

J. LAWRENCE.
Clerk to the Urban District Council of Eastleigh and Bishopstoke."

On February 9, 1928, the Eastleigh and Bishopstoke U.D.C. passed the following further resolution :—

"Resolved that the Clerk to the Council be authorized to enter into the necessary recognizances on behalf of the Council in the sum of £50, with two sureties each in the sum of £25, in connexion with the case to be stated for the opinion of the High Court of Justice on the decision of the justices, in the recent proceedings for breach of by-laws with respect to slaughterhouses, and that the Council indemnify the two sureties from all responsibility."

* Reported by J. W. HALL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The recognizance entered into by the Clerk on February 13, 1928, was in this form :—

"Be it remembered, that on February 13, 1928, Jesse Lawrence, of the Council offices, Leigh-road, in the parish of Eastleigh, in the said county, Clerk to the Urban District of Eastleigh and Bishopstoke, as Principal, A. B. and C. D., as sureties, personally came before one of his Majesty's justices of the peace for the said county and severally acknowledged themselves to owe to our Sovereign Lord the King the several sums following—that is to say, the said Jesse Lawrence the sum of £50 and the said A. B. and C. D. the sum of £25 each of good and lawful money of Great Britain to be made and levied of their several goods and chattels, lands and tenements respectively, to the use of our said Lord the King, his heirs and successors, if he, the said Jesse Lawrence, shall fail in the condition indorsed."

The indorsed condition recited that on the twelfth day of December, in the year of our Lord One thousand nine hundred and twenty-seven, an information preferred by Jesse Lawrence, Clerk to the Urban District Council of Eastleigh and Bishopstoke, was dismissed, and that the said Jesse Lawrence being dissatisfied with the said determination as being erroneous in point of law, had applied for a case to be stated.

The condition continued as follows :—"If, therefore, the said Jesse Lawrence, after the said Court of summary jurisdiction shall have stated a case setting forth the facts and the grounds thereof as aforesaid for the opinion of the said Court, shall duly prosecute without delay such his appeal and submit to the judgment of the said Court thereon and pay such costs as may be awarded by the same, then the said recognizance shall be void or else to stand, in full force and virtue."

The notice which accompanied the copy of the case served on the respondent contained the following :—

"Take notice that I, the undersigned Jesse Lawrence, Clerk to the Urban District Council of Eastleigh and Bishopstoke, being the informant in an information preferred by myself . . .

(Signed) J. LAWRENCE.
Clerk to the Urban District Council of Eastleigh and Bishopstoke."

Mr. Scholefield, K.C., and Mr. Sydney Turner appeared for the appellant ; Mr. Montgomery, K.C., Sir Henry Maddocks, K.C., and Mr. W. J. Gandy, for the respondent.

Counsel for the respondent took a preliminary objection that the recognizance should have been entered into by the Urban District Council, and have bound their goods. They relied on Leyton U.D.C. v. Wilkinson (43 The Times L.R., 326 ; [1927] 1 K.B., 853) ; the use of the words "duly authorized" in the information and summons showed that the principals were the Council.

THE LORD CHIEF JUSTICE.—In this case the preliminary point is taken that section 3 of the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1857, has not been complied with. That section requires that the appellant, at the time of applying for a case to be stated by the justices, shall enter into a recognizance to prosecute the appeal. The person upon whom that duty is cast is the appellant. The argument has been put forward that this case is on all fours with Leyton U.D.C. v. Wilkinson (43 The Times L.R., 326 ; [1927] 1 K.B., 853). But there the ground of complaint was that the appellant, the Leyton U.D.C., had not entered into any recognizance at all. There, ex concessis, the appellant was the Urban District Council, and the Urban District Council had not entered into a recognizance. Here, the Urban District Council is not the appellant. The appellant is Mr. Jesse Lawrence, the Clerk. Why is he the appellant ? Because he laid the information and conducted the prosecution and applied for the case to be stated. He was able to do that under section 259 of the Public Health Act, 1875, which provides : "Any local authority may appear before any Court or in any legal proceeding by their clerk, or by any officer or member authorized generally, or in respect of any special proceeding by resolution of such authority, and their clerk, or any officer or member so authorized shall be at liberty to institute and carry on any proceeding which the local authority is authorized to institute and carry on under this Act."

But here it is said that someone, in drafting the information, added the words "duly authorized," and thereby made the clerk a mere agent for the Council, who were the true informants and the proper appellants. It is admitted that those words were not necessary. In my opinion, they are surplusage. The clerk was entitled to lay the information because he was the clerk, and it was not necessary to say that he was authorized. It is argued that because those words were inserted there is a discrepancy between the information and the recognizance, that the recognizance ought to have contained the words "duly authorized," and that the recognizance should have bound the goods and chattels of the Urban District Council. But the clerk was the informant, and he is the appellant, and he, the appellant, has entered into a recognizance. There is, I think, nothing in the point and it ought not to succeed.

MR. JUSTICE AVORY.—I agree.

MR. JUSTICE SHEARMAN.—I agree.

On the merits, the appeal was allowed. No new point of law calling for report was raised.

REX v. CALEDONIAN COLLIERIES, LIMITED.*

Canada — Alberta — Legislation — Validity —Taxation—Whether direct or indirect—British North America Act, 1867 (30 and 31 Vict., c. 3), s. 92 (2)—Mine Owners Tax Act, 1923 (Alberta statute).

The Mine Owners Tax Act, 1923 (Alberta statute), is invalid as it imposed indirect and not direct taxation within s. 92 (2) of the British North America Act, 1867.

Decision of the Supreme Court of Canada ([1927] S.C.R., 257) affirmed.

This was an appeal from a judgment of the Supreme Court of Canada ([1927] S.C.R., 257) on the question whether the Mine Owners Tax Act, 1923, of the province of Alberta, which imposed upon mine owners a percentage tax upon the gross revenue of their coal mines was ultra vires the province as an attempt to impose indirect taxation.

* Reported by SIR W. J. SOULSBY, Barrister-at-Law.

Mr. O. M. Biggar, K.C., (of the Canadian Bar), and the Hon. Geoffrey Lawrence, K.C., were counsel for the province of Alberta ; Mr. D. N. Pritt, K.C., and Mr. H. S. Patterson (of the Canadian Bar), for the respondents.

LORD WARRINGTON of CLYFFE in delivering their Lordships' judgment, said.—This appeal brought by special leave of His Majesty in Council, is from an order dated February 1, 1927, of the Supreme Court of Canada ([1927] S.C.R., 257), whereby that Court, consisting of Chief Justice Anglin, Mr. Justice Duff, Mr. Justice Mignault, Mr. Justice Newcombe, and Mr. Justice Rinfret, unanimously allowed an appeal from the Appellate Division of the Supreme Court of Alberta (22 Alb. L.R., 245) in favour of the present appellant on the ground that in their opinion the tax in question is not a direct tax and therefore one which it was not within the competence of the Province to impose.

The Act in question was passed by the Legislature of Alberta on April 21, 1923. It contained the following material provisions:—

"Section 3. Every mine owner shall from the last day of May, 1918, be subject to a tax upon the gross revenue received by him from his mine.

"Section 4. The said tax shall not be more than 2 per cent. of the said revenue and as determined by the Lieut.-Governor in Council under the provisions of this Act.

"Section 6. On or before the last day of each month each mine owner shall forward to the Minister a sum of money equal to 2 per cent. of the gross revenue received by him from his mine during the next preceding month."

The Act repealed a previous Act of the Province —the Mine Owners Tax Act, 1918—which also imposed a tax upon gross revenue, taking the form in that Act of 5c. per ton of the coal removed from the mine premises. The validity of this tax had been disputed by the mine owners, who had in many cases refused to pay it.

On August 1, 1925, the Lieut.-Governor by and with the advice of the Executive Council ordered that the tax in question should be 2 per cent. of the gross revenue received by the mine owner from his mine.

The respondent company are mine owners within the definition of that term contained in the Act in question. They began business in November, 1923.

They refused to pay the tax, and on August 21, 1925, the action in which the order under appeal was made, was commenced for the purposes of recovering the amount of the tax alleged to be due from them.

Is the taxation in question "direct taxation within the Province" within the meaning of section 92 of the British North America Act, 1867 ?

The question whether a tax is direct or indirect has on many occasions been the subject of decision by this Board, but it is unnecessary to refer to any of these decisions except that of Bank of Toronto v. Lambe (3 The Times L.R., 742 ; 12 App. Cas., 575), in which Lord Hobhouse, in delivering the judgment of the Board, made some useful observations as to the mode in which the question should be approached. The passage has often been cited, but it is worth while citing it again:—

"First, is the tax a direct tax ? For the argument of this question the opinions of a great many writers on political economy have been cited, and it is quite proper, or rather necessary, to have careful regard to such opinions, as has been said in previous cases before this Board. But it must not be forgotten that the question is a legal one, viz., what the words mean as used in this statute ; whereas the economists are always seeking to trace the effect of taxation throughout the community, and are apt to use the words 'direct' and 'indirect' according as they find that the burden of a tax abides more or less with the person who first pays it. This distinction is illustrated very clearly by the quotations from a very able and clear thinker, the late Mr. Fawcett, who, after giving his tests of direct and indirect taxation, makes remarks to the effect that a tax may be made direct or indirect by the position of the taxpayers or by private bargains about its payment. Doubtless, such remarks have their value in an economical discussion. Probably it is true of every indirect tax that some persons are both the first and the final payers of it ; and of every direct tax that it affects persons other than the first payers; and the excellence of an economist's definition will be measured by the accuracy with which it contemplates and embraces every incident of the thing defined. But that very excellence impairs its value for the purposes of the lawyer. The Legislature cannot possibly have meant to give a power of taxation valid or invalid according to its actual results in particular cases. It must have contemplated some tangible dividing line referable to and ascertainable by the general tendencies of the tax and the common understanding of men as to those tendencies."

What then is the general tendency of the tax now in question ?

First it is necessary to ascertain the real nature of the tax.

It is not disputed that, though the tax is called a tax on "gross revenue," such gross revenue is in reality the aggregate of sums received from sales of coal, and is indistinguishable from a tax upon every sum received from the sale of coal.

The respondents are producers of coal, a commodity the subject of commercial transactions. Their Lordships can have no doubt that the general tendency of a tax upon the sums received from the sale of the commodity which they produce and in which they deal is that they would seek to recover it in the price charged to a purchaser. Under particular circumstances the recovery of the tax may, it is true, be economically undesirable or practically impossible, but the general tendency of the tax remains.

It is said on behalf of the appellant that at the time when a sale is made the tax has not become payable and therefore cannot be passed on. Their Lordships cannot accept this contention ; the tax will have to be paid, and there would be no more difficulty in adding to the selling price the amount of the tax in anticipation than there would be if it had been actually paid.

Their Lordships therefore agree with the views expressed by the Judges of the Supreme Court that the tax in question is not a direct tax.

Some attempt was made in argument to support the tax on the ground that it is analogous to an income-tax, which has always been regarded as the typical example of a direct tax; but there are marked distinctions between a tax on gross revenue and a tax on income, which for taxation purposes means gains and profits. There may be considerable gross revenues, but no income taxable by an income tax in the accepted sense.

For these reasons their Lordships are of opinion that the appeal should be dismissed with costs and they will humbly advise His Majesty accordingly.

Court of Appeal. (Scrutton, Lawrence, and Greer, L.JJ.) 1928. June 8.

HAIN STEAMSHIP COMPANY, LIMITED v. BOARD OF TRADE.*

Ship—Collision—War or marine risk—Meaning of "warlike operation."

During the War a steamer belonging to the appellants was requisitioned by the Shipping Controller under a charterparty providing that the Crown should be liable for all consequences of warlike operations but that the owners were to bear the marine risks. After the Armistice the steamer, when still under requisition, was on a voyage with a mercantile cargo of oats and collided at night with another steamer which had been requisitioned by the United States Government and which was taking mines back to America, probably in the belief that they were no longer required for the purposes of the War. The collision was caused by the negligent navigation of both steamers, and the appellants' steamer was off hire for 99 days as the result of the damage which she suffered. An arbitration took place and the arbitrator found that the collision was a consequence of warlike operations and that therefore the Crown was liable to compensate the appellants.

Held, (1) that there was evidence on which the arbitrator could find that the steamer requisitioned by the United States Government was at the time of the collision performing a warlike operation, and (2) that the fact that the negligent navigation of the appellants' steamer contributed equally to the loss did not relieve the Crown from liability; and therefore the arbitrator's award must be affirmed.

Decision of Rowlatt, J. (44 The Times L.R., 344) reversed.

This was an appeal by the Hain Steamship Company, Limited, from the decision of Mr. Justice Rowlatt (44 The Times L.R., 344), on a special case stated by an arbitrator, which raised the question whether injuries suffered by a requisitioned ship were or were not the consequence of a warlike operation.

In 1917 the steamship Trevanion, belonging to the appellants, was requisitioned by the Shipping Controller under the charterparty T.99, which provided that the Crown should be liable for all consequences of warlike operations, but that the owners were to bear the marine risks. In December, 1918, the Trevanion was on a voyage from the United States with a cargo of oats, and a steamer, the Roanoke, which had been requisitioned by the United States Government, was on a voyage from England to the United States with a cargo of mines which were no longer required for the purposes of the War. On the night of Christmas Day the steamers came into collision in mid-Atlantic, with the result that the Trevanion was so much damaged that she was off hire for 99 days. The collision was due to the fact that both steamers were being negligently navigated at the time.

The arbitrator considered that he was bound by the decisions in the Geelong case—Commonwealth Shipping Representative v. Peninsular and Oriental Branch Service (39 The Times L.R., 133; [1923] A.C., 191)—and the Warilda case—Attorney-General v. Adelaide Steamship Company, Limited (39 The Times L.R., 333; [1923] A.C., 292)—and held that the collision was a consequence of warlike operations, and that, therefore, the Crown was liable to pay the owners of the Trevanion.

On appeal by the Board of Trade, which had succeeded to the Shipping Controller, against the award, Mr. Justice Rowlatt held that, as hostilities had ceased, the mine-carrying steamer was not engaged in a warlike operation, and that the Crown was not liable.

The owners of the Trevanion appealed.

Mr. Dunlop, K.C. (Mr. Balloch with him), appeared for the appellants; the Attorney-General (Sir Thomas Inskip, K.C.) and Mr. Russell Davies for the Crown.

At the conclusion of the arguments, the Court reserved judgment.

Lord Justice Scrutton, in the course of his judgment, said that two contentions were raised on behalf of the Crown; (1) That the Roanoke was not engaged in a warlike operation; and (2) that the collision was partly caused by the negligence of the Trevanion, and that that prevented the collision from being the consequence of a warlike operation by the Roanoke.

He would deal first with the second point, which could be shortly disposed of. The decision of the House of Lords in the Warilda case—Attorney-General v. Adelaide Steamship Company, Limited (39 The Times L.R., 333; [1923] A.C., 292)—showed that the negligence of a warship engaged in a warlike operation did not prevent the collision caused thereby from being the consequence of a warlike operation. It was only that the warlike operation was negligently conducted, and the collision happening in that warlike operation was still the consequence of it, though the navigation of the warship were negligent. So said the House of Lords.

But, further, it had been decided by the House of Lords that if a loss were equally caused by two risks or perils the person insuring or bearing the risk of one of those perils was not relieved because another peril which he did not insure or bear the risk of equally contributed to the loss. In his opinion, therefore, if the Roanoke was engaged in a warlike operation conducted negligently so as to cause the loss, the persons liable for "war risks" were not excused because the loss was equally caused by the negligence of another ship.

There remained the question whether the Roanoke, some six weeks after the beginning of the Armistice, was engaged in a "warlike operation." The Armistice did not suspend operations of war; the blockade continued, and any German ships at sea were liable to capture. Vessels carrying contraband were captured and condemned by the Prize Court. The state of active war might have revived in full severity. It was admitted that if on Christmas Day, 1918, the Trevanion had struck a floating mine the damage would be a consequence of a warlike operation. It was, he understood, admitted that if in the actual collision some mines on board the Roanoke had exploded the damage would be a consequence of a warlike operation.

The arbitrator found that there was no evidence as to the circumstances in, or the purposes for, which the mines were carried by the Roanoke. It was very probable that they were being carried home to the United States in the belief that the War was coming to an end, in which case the problem would be the same as if a warship were carrying the United States troops back to the United States. But the arbitrator also found that the Roanoke was at the time of the collision proceeding "under her aforesaid public employment"—namely, that of a regularly commissioned mine-planter of the United States Navy. He then found as a fact that the Roanoke at the time of the collision was performing a warlike operation. If there was evidence on which he could so find, his finding was conclusive, and he (the Lord Justice) was clear on the facts found that there was such evidence.

The word "warlike" was, no doubt, a difficult word to define. It was not made easier by the fact that in the case of the Matiana—Green v. British India Steam Navigation Company, Limited—British India Steam Navigation Company, Limited v. Liverpool and London War Risks Insurance Association, Limited (36 The Times L.R., 791 ; [1921] 1 A.C., 99)—the House of Lords, by a majority of three to two, held that requisitioned merchant ships, sailing in convoy under the orders of a warship, sailing without lights, and zig-zagging to avoid submarines, were not performing a "warlike operation." But for that decision one would have thought it clear that the operation was a defensive one against an enemy, carried out because of war, and that both the shepherding warship and the intelligent merchant sheep, who were acting in a most unpeacelike fashion to defend themselves against the enemy, were engaged in a warlike operation.

In the Warilda case (supra) a hospital ship carrying wounded home, but with means on board to protect herself against submarines, was held to have been engaged in a warlike operation. Lord Cave, in the Geelong case—Commonwealth Shipping Representative v. Peninsular and Oriental Branch Service (39 The Times L.R., 133; [1923] A.C., 191), said:—

"Probably the phrase includes all those operations of a belligerent Power or its agents which form part of or directly lead up to those processes of attack and defence which are of the essence of war."

The question of the Armistice was not before the Lord Chancellor, but he (the Lord Justice) should amend the definition by reading "directly lead up to or are the necessary result of." He would like the definition "pertaining to or directly connected with war."

Marching down the hill under the command of the Duke of York was as much a warlike operation as the march up, and when Johnny came marching home again he was engaged, in his opinion, in as warlike an operation as when he marched out.

However that might be, in his view the findings of the arbitrator were conclusive here, with the result that the appeal would be allowed and the decision of the arbitrator restored, with costs here and below.

Lord Justice Lawrence.—The first question on this appeal is whether the Roanoke at the time of the collision with the Trevanion was engaged in a warlike operation within the meaning of clause 19 of Charterparty T 99.

The arbitrator has found that at the relevant time the Roanoke was in the possession and under the control of the United States of America ; that she was employed by the United States of America solely for naval purposes as a regularly commissioned mine planter of the United States Navy ; and that she was operated by the Navy Department, officered by commissioned officers of the United States Navy and manned by a United States Navy crew.

The arbitrator has further found that at the time of the collision the Roanoke was proceeding "under her aforesaid public employment" from Portland, England, to Hampton Roads, Virginia, having 720 mines on board, but no other cargo and no passengers, and that there was no evidence with regard to the circumstances under or the purposes for which the mines were being carried.

The collision occurred on December 25, 1918, some six weeks after the Armistice. The duration of the Armistice was originally fixed at 36 days, but was subsequently extended from time to time. During the Armistice the blockade conditions set up by the Allied and Associated Powers remained unchanged, and German merchant ships at sea and vessels carrying contraband goods remained liable to capture, but the other hostilities had ceased. The Roanoke had, up to the time of the Armistice, admittedly been employed as a warship engaged in operations of war, and the question is whether she was performing a warlike operation when proceeding, under orders, from England to America, during the temporary and qualified suspension of hostilities at sea brought about by the Armistice.

The owners of the Trevanion contended that the Armistice did not change the character of the Roanoke's employment, and that as the War had not terminated the case was simply one of a warship in the employ of one of the belligerent Powers carrying munitions of war from one place to another during a state of war, and consequently, that the Roanoke was engaged in a warlike operation at the time of the collision.

The Board of Trade, on the other hand, contended that in order to render an operation "warlike" within the meaning of clause 19, it must be one which is performed in furtherance of hostilities, or for combatant purposes, and that an American warship proceeding to America after the cessation of hostilities, with munitions of war which were no longer required, was not engaged in a warlike operation.

The arbitrator, in deciding in favour of the owners of the Trevanion, has found as a fact and held as a question of law that the Roanoke, at the time of collision, was performing a warlike operation.

Mr. Justice Rowlatt has disagreed with this decision and has acceded to the contention of the Board of Trade. Hence the present appeal.

In my opinion, the learned Judge has put too narrow a construction on the expression "warlike operations." In the collocation in which that expression is found, in clause 19, it is plainly wider than the expression "hostilities," which immediately precedes it and to which it is an alternative. A common acceptation of the word "warlike" is "pertaining to war" or "martial," and, in my opinion, it is used in that accepted sense in clause 19. Even so, however, that does not solve the present problem, because it still remains to be considered whether the operation in which the Roanoke was engaged at the time of the collision can properly be called a warlike operation in the sense in which I have indicated.

In the present case, the Court is spared the more difficult task of determining whether a merchant vessel officered and manned by her owners is engaged in a warlike operation. Here the Court is concerned with the movements of a warship of one of the belligerent Powers, proceeding under orders in a time of war, in the area of the war, and on a mission directly connected with the war. There is no evidence with regard to the object with which the order was given to the Roanoke to proceed to Hampton Roads, and I can well conceive that it would be difficult, if not impossible, for the Board of Trade to have adduced evidence as to what the intention of the American Naval Authority was in giving the order. If one might be allowed to hazard a guess, the giving of the order was probably due to an intelligent anticipation that the peace negotiations with Germany would have a successful issue, but it is quite likely that the naval authority concerned deferred its decision with regard to what to do with the Roanoke, and with the mines which she had on board, until her arrival at Hampton Roads. It must be a matter of pure conjecture whether on her arrival there she would be ordered to remain in harbour with the mines on board, to await the outcome of the peace negotiations, or whether she would be ordered to disembark the mines and either be put out of commission or else be retained in commission and employed in carrying stores or munitions, or otherwise assisting the Fleet which was engaged in the blockade of the German ports and in other operations of war. One point, however, is clear—namely, that at the time of the collision the Roanoke was still in commission as a fully equipped mine-planter, immediately available in the possible event of the resumption of hostilities. It cannot, I think, be open to serious doubt that a warship, while hostilities are still in progress, is engaged in a warlike operation when, after having accomplished a particular operation of war (whether successfully or otherwise), she is returning home because, for the time being, she is no longer required at the place where she was conducting that operation, and even although it is unlikely that she will be required again during the war, and in that sense her return may be said to be a peaceable operation. In my opinion, the fact that the return of a warship from active hostilities is due to the temporary cessation of those hostilities (either in the particular locality where she was engaged or generally) does not operate to remove the return voyage from the category of warlike operations. Such a return of a warship, whether after a victory and undamaged or after a defeat and crippled, is, in my opinion a movement of a combatant force directly connected with its combatant duties, and is therefore a warlike operation.

The authorities cited by counsel do not deal with the effect of the Armistice on the character of the movements of warships, but they contain dicta which have been relied on by counsel on both sides as supporting their respective contentions.

The Petersham case and the Matiana case (Britain Steamship Company v. The King ; Green v. British India Steam Navigation Company (36 The Times L.R., 791 ; [1921] 1 A.C., 99)) were cases concerned with merchant vessels, both of which were held not to have been engaged in warlike operations at the material times. The actual decisions in those cases have no direct bearing on the question to be determined in the present case, but in the Court of Appeal Lord Justice Atkin said that he was inclined to think that during war almost any action or movement of the combatant forces in the course of their combatant duties, while exercised in the area of war, could be included in the expression "warlike operations" (see 35 The Times L.R., at p. 731 ; [1919] 2 K.B., at p. 695) ; and in the House of Lords various dicta concerning the operations of warships seem to support the present appellants' contention to this extent, that they point to the correct view being that in case of a warship the carrying on of actual hostilities is not a necessary ingredient in a warlike operation.

The Ardgantock case (Attorney-General v. Ard Coasters, Limited) and the Richard de Larrinaga case (Liverpool and London War Risks Insurance Association, Limited v. Richard de Larrinaga (Marine Underwriters of) (37 The Times L.R., 692; [1921] 2 A.C., 141) were cases concerned with warships, both of which were held to have been engaged in warlike operations at the material times. In the Richard de Larrinaga case (supra) it was decided that a warship proceeding to a particular place in order to pick up a convoy was engaged in a warlike operation. Although this decision does not cover the present case, there are some passages in the judgment of Mr. Justice Bailhache (36 The Times L.R., 147; [1920] 1 K.B., 700) and in the speeches in the House of Lords which are of assistance here. Mr. Justice Bailhache, in the course of his judgment, expressed the opinion that almost any movement of a warship at sea in war time is a warlike operation, and in the House of Lords the result of the opinions delivered seems to me to be that although there may be occasions when movements of warships in time of war are not warlike operations, yet, speaking generally, when a warship is in time of war at sea, under orders to proceed to a particular spot, to perform a warlike operation, whatever its nature may be, she is engaged in that warlike operation. If, as I think, the disembarkation of such dangerous and destructive munitions of war as live mines (which are never carried at sea except for the purpose of actual warfare) be a warlike operation, then the opinions expressed in the House of Lords in that case would cover the case of the Roanoke, even assuming that the proper inference to be drawn from the facts as found by the arbitrator is that she was proceeding to Hampton Roads in order to disembark the mines which she was carrying when the Armistice was signed.

The Geelong case (Commonwealth Shipping Representative v. Peninsular and Oriental Branch Service (39 The Times L.R., 133; [1923] A.C., 191)) was concerned with the movements of a merchant vessel called the Bonvilston, which, at the material time, was under requisition by the British Government and was carrying ambulance wagons and other Government stores from Mudros to Alexandria. The speeches delivered in the House of Lords were, therefore, directed to the question whether a merchant vessel, under requisition by the British Government, carrying stores in time of war, was or was not engaged in a warlike operation. In such a case, it is, of course, of the utmost importance to ascertain for what particular purpose the stores were being carried, and the decision that the Bonvilston was engaged in a warlike operation was based entirely on the fact found by the arbitrator that the stores were carried from one war base to another war base. Viscount Finlay, in his speech, states that it was immaterial whether the stores were being carried to a war base for the purpose of warlike operations to be conducted from that base, or were being fetched away from a base because the warlike operations conducted from it had ceased, as in either case the carriage was part of a military operation (see p. 204). This reasoning would a fortiori apply to a warship such as the Roanoke when carrying munitions of war from a war base because the warlike operations conducted from that base had temporarily ceased.

A careful perusal of all the opinions delivered in the House of Lords in the cases to which I have referred has satisfied me that they contain nothing which militates against the conclusion at which I have arrived that the Roanoke was at the time of the collision engaged in a warlike operation, but, on the contrary, so far as they go, they support that conclusion. I, therefore, think that the arbitrator was right and that his award ought to be affirmed on this point.

The second and only other question on this appeal is whether the negligent navigation of the Trevanion operates to take the loss out of clause 19 and to free the Board of Trade from liability. The arbitrator has found that the collision was caused by the negligent navigation of both vessels and that both were equally to blame, the negligence consisting in a bad look-out on both vessels, insufficient porting by the Trevanion and failure to keep her course on the part of the Roanoke.

This question is, in my opinion, covered by authority. The Warilda case (Attorney-General v. Adelaide Steamship Company, Limited (39 The Times L.R., 333; [1923] A.C., 292)) decides that when a ship, engaged in a warlike operation, comes into collision with another ship, the loss occasioned by the collision is none the less a consequence of a warlike operation because such operation is negligently conducted. The case of Reischer v. Borwick (10 The Times L.R., 568; [1894] 2 Q.B., 548 (approved in the House of Lords in Leyland Shipping Company, Limited v. Norwich Union Fire Insurance Society, Limited (34 The Times L.R., 221; [1918] A.C., 350)) decides that where a loss is due to two concurrent causes, each being as much the proximate cause as the other, it is no answer to a claim under a policy covering one of the causes that the loss was also due to the other cause which was not covered.

Applying the principles laid down in those cases to the facts of the present case, I am of opinion that as the negligent navigation of both vessels continued up to the moment of the collision and as the negligence of the Roanoke while engaged in a warlike operation did not alter the character of that operation, the Board of Trade cannot escape liability under clause 19 by reason of the fact that the loss was also due to the negligent navigation of the Trevanion.

In my judgment, for the reasons stated, the appeal succeeds, and the award of the arbitrator should be restored.

Lord Justice Greer stated the facts and said:—It was not suggested by the owners of the Trevanion that the collision was a consequence of hostilities, inasmuch as it could not be said that either vessel was at the time engaged in active hostilities, but it was said, and I think rightly said, that there was sufficient in the findings of the arbitrator, as stated in the special case, to show that the collision was the result of a warlike operation, that is to say, of the operation that was being carried on by the Roanoke steaming across the Atlantic towards Hampton Roads, carring mines.

Certain of the terms of the Armistice, so far as they related to naval operations, were made part of the special case. These terms included immediate cessation of all hostilities at sea, the surrender of all submarines, the dismantling of certain German surface warships, the right of the Allies to sweep up all minefields and destroy obstructions laid by Germany outside certain territorial waters, and the maintenance of existing blockade conditions (German merchant ships found at sea remaining liable to capture). By clause 34, the duration of the Armistice was 36 days, with powers of extension, and it was thereby agreed that during such period on failure of execution of any of the above clauses the Armistice might be repudiated by one of the contracting parties on 48 hours' previous notice.

It is clear from the terms of the Armistice that it did not put an end to all warlike operations. The continuation of the blockade involved a continuance of some warlike operations; so also, in my judgment, did the sweeping up of mines. The ss. Roanoke was at the time of the collision in all respects a United States war-vessel carrying munitions of war. The American Naval Department were the chartered owners of the vessel in possession, and she was carrying out an operation which, but for the Armistice, could not have been described otherwise than as a warlike operation. If she had been carrying mines during the War for the purpose of planting them she would, beyond question, have been engaged in a warlike operation. If she had been engaged in lifting mines during or immediately after war it would probably be admitted that her operations could properly be described as warlike operations. If she had been carrying mines towards the place where it was intended that they should be laid, this, again, would be a warlike operation. If for some reason it had been decided not to lay the mines in their intended position and the vessel had been carrying them back to a place of safety, till it could be decided in what other position they should be laid, she would still be engaged in a warlike operation. The existence of a temporary suspension of active hostilities at the time does not, in my judgment, convert that which would otherwise be a warlike operation into a peaceable operation. The Armistice only operated as a suspension of certain acts of hostility, and did not put an end to the War or render it impossible for warlike operations to continue. The Roanoke was at the time of the collision engaged in preserving and moving across the Atlantic munitions of war which could at any time, if the Armistice came to an end, be utilized for the purposes of war.

A number of decisions in the House of Lords and the Court of Appeal were discussed in the course of the argument, but on the question I am now considering, reliance was placed by the Attorney-General almost entirely upon the decision in the case which is known as the Geelong case (Commonwealth Shipping Representative v. Peninsular and Oriental Branch Service (39 The Times L.R., 133; [1923] A.C., 191)), as establishing the proposition that in order to bring the carriage of combatant forces or of munitions of war from one area of war to another within the words "warlike operations" it must be proved that they were being so carried for combatant purposes. I assume for the purposes of my judgment that this was part of the ratio decidendi of that case, and of the Petersham case (Britain Steamship Company, Limited v. The King (36 The Times L.R., 791; [1921] 1 A.C., 99)), but I think that Mr. Dunlop was right in saying that it had reference to the temporary use of merchant vessels, and not to the carriage of munitions of war by the armed naval forces of one of the belligerents.

In my judgment the arbitrator was not wrong in law in deciding upon the facts stated in the special case, that the Roanoke was engaged at the time of the collision in a warlike operation.

A further point was raised on behalf of the Board of Trade by the Attorney-General. He contended that inasmuch as the negligence of both vessels contributed to the collision, the collision could not be said to be the consequence of the warlike operation which was being negligently conducted by the ss. Roanoke. I do not think that this argument ought to prevail. It was decided in the Warilda case (Attorney-General v. Adelaide Steamship Company, Limited (39 The Times L.R., 333; [1923] A.C., 292)) that the negligence of a vessel which is claiming under clause 19 of charterparty T.99 does not prevent her recovering against the Crown if she was engaged in a warlike operation. Lord Shaw, at page 300, uses these words:—"Faulty navigation on the part of one ship or the other is, of course, the determining factor of responsibility as between the two ships, but, in my opinion, it is not a legitimate factor for the other purpose which is here attempted—namely, of converting a war risk into a sea risk."

This must be equally true where the negligence is the negligence of both ships. The loss of a vessel caused by the entrance of water through a hole in the hull caused by a collision due to negligent navigation is without doubt an ordinary sea risk, and a marine underwriter would, in the absence of an f. c. and s. clause, be liable to indemnify the owner from damage so caused.

The question to be decided is not whether the collision in this case was a sea risk, but whether, being a sea risk, it is one of the risks covered by the exceptions created by the f. c. and s. warranty. If it comes within one or other of the special sea risks described in that clause, it ceases to be a risk for which the owner accepts liability under clause 18, and becomes one for which the charterer accepts liability under clause 19. If what happened is a consequence of a warlike operation it is none the less so because it is also a consequence of faulty navigation of one or other or of both of the colliding vessels. For the purpose of deciding this case negligent navigation of either or of both vessels is irrelevant.

When a collision is caused, as in this case it was, by more than one proximate cause, one of which is a "warlike operation," it seems to me that it is taken out of the sea risk by the warranty, inasmuch as it is a consequence of a warlike operation. This view is in accordance with the decision in Reischer v. Borwick (10 The Times L.R., 568; [1894] 2 Q.B., 548), and Leyland Shipping Company, Limited v. Norwich Union Fire Insurance Society, Limited (34 The Times L.R., 221; [1918] A.C., 350), as explained by Lord Sumner in P. Samuel and Co., Limited v. Dumas (40 The Times L.R., 375; [1924] A.C., 431). At page 467 of the report of the last-named case, Lord Sumner says: "Where a loss is caused by two perils operating simultaneously at the time of loss and one is wholly excluded because the policy is warranted free of it, the question is whether it can be denied that the loss was so caused, for if not the warranty operates. It is then convenient and even necessary to test the application of the term 'proximate' otherwise than by sequence of time, and attempts, more or less successful, have been made to explain it by using other adjectives, but the rule remains. I doubt if the present question would ever have been disposed of in favour of the respondents simply by saying that the hole had to be made first and then the water came in afterwards. Accordingly, the explanation of the two cases cited in this connexion, Leyland Shipping Company, Limited v. Norwich Union Fire Insurance Society (supra), and Reischer v. Borwick (supra), I think, is this. In the former, where the question was really one of fact, the pressure of the water overcame the resistance of the bulkhead and the ship filled and sank, but it was the explosion of the torpedo which admitted that pressure to the bulkhead. Thus there were two concurrent causes, proximately operating—namely, the opening of the ship's side and the pressure of the sea—and the policy, being free of the consequences of the former, it was free of this loss, though, if the insurance had been against perils of the sea and no more, the loss would have fallen within it. So in the other case. The policy was against collision and damage received in collision only, and it could not be denied that the vessel was damaged in collision. It took two things to sink her; the hole made in collision and water flowing into it. They were both immediate and concurrent causes, and if either was within the policy, the assured recovered."

For these reasons, I think that the appeal should be allowed.

The order of the Court was that the award of the arbitrator be restored with costs of the appeal and in the Court below.

Court of Appeal.
(Lord Hanworth, M.R., Lawrence and Russell, L.JJ.)
1928. June 11.

MANCHESTER CORPORATION v. AUDENSHAW URBAN DISTRICT COUNCIL.*

Highways—Road maintenance—Obligation imposed by private Act—Increase of traffic—Extent of obligation—Manchester Corporation Waterworks and Improvement Act, 1875 (38 and 39 Vict., c. clxi.), s. 14 (ii.).

The plaintiffs were empowered by statute to make a road in accordance with the provisions of the Act and to the reasonable satisfaction of the defendants' predecessors. The road was duly made and completed in 1878, in accordance with the Act and to the satisfaction of the defendants' predecessors, but the traffic and cost of maintenance had of late years greatly increased, and the road had fallen into disrepair. Eve, J., held, following Sharpness New Docks and Gloucester and Birmingham Navigation Co. v. Attorney-General (31 The Times L.R., 254; [1915] A.C., 654) that the plaintiffs were only liable to repair the road according to the standard of requirement of 1878, but that as that standard would not last long under the strain of modern traffic it would be wasteful to order them to do it, and there must be an inquiry as to what contribution the plaintiffs should make towards the cost of durable repairs.

Held, on appeal, that the Judge had correctly estimated the plaintiffs' liability, but that there was no jurisdiction to make any other order or to direct the proposed inquiry.

Decision of Eve, J. (44 The Times L.R., 88 ; [1928] 1 Ch., 127), affirmed with a variation.

This was an appeal from a decision of Mr. Justice Eve (44 The Times L.R., 88 ; [1928] 1 Ch., 127).

The plaintiffs claimed a declaration with regard to a road constructed in the areas of the defendants, the Audenshaw Urban District Council and the Denton Urban District Council under the Manchester Corporation Waterworks and Improvement Act, 1875, that the extent of the plaintiffs' liability as to the maintenance thereof was determined by that Act and that they were not required to maintain a better road.

The road had been constructed by the plaintiffs in 1878 under powers conferred by the Act whereby the plaintiffs were authorized to make, construct, lay down, and maintain the reservoirs and roads (including the road in question) there enumerated, and when and as soon as the same were completed and opened to the public to stop up and appropriate to the purposes of the new reservoirs (inter alia) a portion of Taylor-lane. By section 14 (ii.) of the Act it was enacted that the road in question should be at all times thereafter maintained by and at the expense of the plaintiffs and should be of the width of 14 yards with footways as therein mentioned and that the carriage-way of the road should be macadamized.

In April, 1878, the road was completed in accordance with the statutory requirements and to the satisfaction of the two local boards. It served a district then and for many years thereafter of an agricultural character. It was satisfactorily maintained by the plaintiffs down to a date shortly after the commencement of the War.

The nature of the traffic had from about that time changed and it had been apparent that an ordinary waterbound macadamized road was not adequate for the increasing traffic of the district with the change from slow-moving traffic to fast motor traffic. The question was how the cost of reconstructing the road to suit modern traffic was to be borne.

The defendants pleaded that the plaintiffs' obligation was to maintain the road in a state adequate for the traffic of the present day and (in the alternative) they counterclaimed that the plaintiffs were at any rate liable to maintain the macadamized carriage-way as specified in the Act, whatever might be the nature of the present-day traffic.

Mr. Justice Eve held that on the construction of the Act the plaintiffs were liable only to maintain the road in the condition in which it was completed in 1878, and that they were not liable for the cost of providing for all modern means of locomotion by reconstructing the fabric of the road. He gave leave to the defendants to apply for an inquiry as to any contribution which they might allege ought to be made by the plaintiffs to the cost of re-conditioning the road.

The defendants appealed.

Mr. Scholefield, K.C., and Mr. H. A. Hill appeared for the appellants ; and Sir Herbert Cunliffe, K.C., and Mr. John Bennett for the respondents.

The MASTER OF THE ROLLS, after stating the facts, said that the findings in the Court below did not form any basis upon which it could be said that the plaintiffs had ceased to be liable under section 14 (ii.) of their Act for the maintenance of the road. It was possible for them to repair it. "The road is not incapable of being repaired," said Mr. Justice Eve, "as a water-bound macadamized road." There was therefore no reason for saying that that liability, which primarily rested upon the Corporation, did not continue at the present time, and he (the Master of the Rolls) could not see how their liability could be interpreted in the mere terms of a contribution to be made to some authority which had not the control at the present time. Mr. Justice Eve said, in his judgment, that reconstruction work was called for ; that the maintaining of the road as in 1878 was of no practical use; that that did not free the plaintiffs from all liability to repair, and that the failure of the plaintiffs to spend money on the road during recent years might have increased the necessity for repair. He therefore made an order that the defendants might apply for an inquiry as to the contribution which ought to be made by the plaintiffs towards the reconditioning of the road. He therefore carried to its conclusion the view which he held, based on the economic point of view. He established the liability of the plaintiffs, but it was to be a liability by way of contribution towards the proper reconditioning of the road.

Was that judgment right ? The plaintiffs were the owners of the road, and yet, somehow or other, the defendants were to repair the road, to re-make the road, and the plaintiffs were only to make a contribution. It appeared to him (the Master of the Rolls) that that judgment and the inquiry were based upon a confusion of thought, and did not allow for the continuance of the liability of the plaintiffs in respect of what Mr. Justice Eve called "this Corporation Road," which the plaintiffs still had to maintain.

The Court must therefore consider whether any modification ought to be made by virtue of the authorities cited. In Sharpness New Docks and Gloucester and Birmingham Navigation Company v. Attorney-General (31 The Times L.R., 254; [1915] A.C. 654)—a case of the greatest importance, the House of Lords held that there was no liability upon the undertakers to maintain their bridges so as to be suitable for the future traffic which had arisen after the bridges had been constructed. "Sufficient to bear the ordinary traffic of the district and the traffic which might reasonably be expected to pass along the said highways, having regard to the present character and needs of the district"—that was what was sought to be enforced. The smaller question whether they were bound to keep the bridges in the condition in which they had been approved by the Commissioners was not raised. It seemed that it was treated sub silentio as a point which of course remained. Lord Haldane said (31 The Times L.R., at p. 255; [1915] A.C., at p. 662): "The Court of Appeal seem to have thought that the obligation under these words to maintain and repair might have imposed an obligation to make new works, by analogy to the general obligation of the county authority to keep a highway in such a condition that it could carry not only the traffic of the period at which it was made, but heavier traffic coming into existence subsequently. But section 61 of the Act which we have to construe in the present case does not appear to me to admit of resort to any presumption of intention based on the analogy of the common law." Therefore what was ultimately determined in the Sharpness case (supra) was the duty imposed by the statute, which, by imposing a statutory duty, excluded the presumption of the common law. The decision, as a whole, was that, by virtue of the terms of the statute, there was a liability to repair, and to repair only in accordance with and up to the standard accepted by the Commissioners when the bridges were built, with the result that the House negatived the claim for a declaration that the appellants were bound to maintain and keep in repair the bridges so that they might be able to bear the traffic expected to pass along the highways in view of the present character and needs of the district.

His Lordship referred to Attorney-General for Ireland v. Lagan Navigation Company ([1924] A.C., 877) and Attorney-General v. Great Northern Railway Company (32 The Times L.R., 674; [1916] 2 A.C., 356), and said that the Sharpness case (supra) had been applied for the purpose of saying that the measure of liability was that imposed by the statute; not the increased liability arising since the statute was passed. Applying that to the present appeal the Corporation had a duty to maintain the road at a standard fit for the traffic of 1878. There was no finding that they had done so. All that was said was that by reason of the increased traffic they ought not to be bound to repair at all, or else that, by reason of the increase of traffic, it would be unwise, economically or practically, to hold them liable to a duty which still remained upon them by statute. To him (Lord Hanworth) it seemed that they, and they alone, had a duty to repair the road. It was said that to repair according to the standard of 1878 would last only five, some said ten, years. If it lasted only five years the Corporation would have to repair it again, and it might be wiser upon their part to undertake more permanent repairs, and if they wished to do so, Sandgate Urban District Council v. Kent County Council (15 The Times L.R., 59) showed that it would be within their powers to take that course and to charge their ratepayers with it.

But the point to be determined was whether their liability under their Act had terminated or increased, and to him (the Master of the Rolls) it seemed that it had not. They were under a liability to repair according to the standard of 1878, whether it might last a longer or shorter time. Whether that might or might not be the most economical or practical way of dealing with the matter, it was the legal liability. To that extent the judgment of Mr. Justice Eve must be varied and the direction for an inquiry struck out.

Lord Justice Lawrence agreed. He said that the defendants in the action in their anxiety to make the Corporation construct a better and a stronger road had endeavoured to enforce that view on the Court below. They were wrong, and Mr. Justice Eve was right in dismissing their counterclaim to that effect with costs. But there could hardly be any justification for the assumption that if they so failed they would themselves undertake the construction of such a road, and would convert the liability of the Corporation under the statute into a money contribution towards the making of such a road.

The learned Judge below had founded his judgment on the Sharpness case (31 The Times L.R., 254; [1915] A.C., 654). He applied the reasoning in that case to the present case, and held that the standard by which the liability of the Corporation must be judged was neither the ordinary traffic when the road was constructed nor the ordinary traffic of to-day, but the road itself as determined by the Act. That seemed to be right, but the learned Judge had gone on to say that no Court would enforce such an obligation, because it would lead to extravagant and wasteful expenditure. Yet it was proved that the road was not incapable of being repaired according to the standard of 1878. There was a conflict of evidence as to how long such a road would last, but that only showed that the liability to repair might be heavier than when the road was originally constructed. The Corporation had power to make a road which would last longer, but whether they would do so was not for the Court to determine. There might, of course, be an agreement between the parties upon the lines indicated in the judgment below that the local authorities should construct the road and receive a contribution from the Corporation, but the Court could not assume that such an agreement would be entered into and direct an inquiry for which neither party had asked. The order of the learned Judge should therefore be varied as stated by the Master of the Rolls.

Lord Justice Russell said that there was no doubt that the liability of the plaintiffs in the action was determined by the Sharpness case (31 The Times L.R., 254; [1915] A.C., 654). Their liability was defined by the Act of 1875, and it was a liability to maintain the road as a road of the class and durability described in the Act of 1875, and as it was in fact constructed in 1878. So far, the judgment of Mr. Justice Eve was perfectly correct. But when he directed an inquiry as to the sum which the Corporation should contribute to the reconditioning of the road by the two Councils he was wrong. There was in that order a suggestion that the Corporation were not liable to repair the road, and that the liability to repair rested with the Councils. The judgment must therefore be varied in the manner suggested.

ROYAL INSURANCE COMPANY, LIMITED v. STEPHEN.*

Revenue—Income-tax—Deductions from profits—Railway investments—Effect of grouping—Income Tax Act, 1918 (8 and 9 Geo. V., c. 40), Sched. D., Case I.

The appellants, an insurance company, had investments in British railway stocks, and it was admitted by the Crown that any loss suffered by the appellants on such investments was deductible from the appellants' profits for purposes of income-tax. The result of the Railways Act, 1921, was that the appellants received in exchange for their various railway holdings stocks in the four amalgamated railway companies created by that Act. The market value of these new stocks was less than the original cost to the appellants of the old stocks, and the appellants claimed that the loss so occasioned to them should be allowed as a deduction from their profits for 1922 and 1923 in computing their income-tax liability under Case I. of Schedule D.

Held, that as the effect of what had happened was that the old investments had been closed and realized and new investments had been begun, the appellants were entitled to the deduction claimed.

This was a case stated by the Special Commissioners of Income Tax.

The appellant company appealed to the Special Commissioners against additional assessments to income-tax made under Schedule D by the Additional Commissioners for the division of Liverpool, in the sum of £38,123 for the year ending April 5, 1924, in the sum of £276,328 for the year ending April 5, 1925, and in the sum of £354,790 for the year ending April 5, 1926, in respect of the company's profits other than profits arising from life assurance.

In addition to their life assurance business (which was not material to the present case), the appellants carried on the business of fire, accident, and general insurance, and in the course of that business had occasion to make large investments, which were varied from time to time. Those investments at all material times included a great variety of stocks of railway companies. Any profit realized or loss suffered by the appellants on any such investments was admitted by the appellants and the Crown respectively to be an item to be included in or deducted from the appellants' profits for the purposes of income-tax. The appellants claimed to have suffered in the years 1922 and 1923 losses amounting to £753,971 on certain investments and claimed that those losses—namely, £39,414 in the year 1922 and £714,557 in the year 1923—should be allowed as deductions from their profits for the years 1922 and 1923 in computing their income-tax liability under Case I. of Schedule D for the years ending April 5, 1924, April 5, 1925, and April 5, 1926.

The only question for the Court was whether those two sums of £39,414 and £714,557 were properly allowable as deductions from the appellants' profits for the purposes of Case I. of Schedule D.

Under the Railways Act, 1921, the railway companies of Great Britain were formed into four groups, the principal railway companies in each group (in the Act referred to as "constituent companies") being amalgamated and other smaller companies (in the Act referred to as "subsidiary companies") being absorbed by one or other of the amalgamated concerns. Speaking in general terms the constituent and the subsidiary companies were wound up and the holders of stocks therein received in exchange stocks in one of the four great companies (in the Act referred to as the "amalgamated companies").

The various stocks received by the appellants in the amalgamated companies in exchange for the stocks held by them in the constituent and subsidiary companies had a definite market value on the date of the exchange. The cash paid to the appellants for fractions of stock held in the constituent and subsidiary companies was not based on the nominal or market value of those stocks, but on the market value of the new stocks in the amalgamated companies received in exchange.

It was contended by counsel for the appellants (a) that on the substitution of the stocks in the new companies for their holdings in the old companies the appellants, in fact and in law, suffered the loss claimed by way of deduction; (b) that the transaction was none the less a realization of investments because the old stocks were (except for fractions) not sold for cash; (c) that the appellants had made a loss on the realization, because the new stocks had a definite market value which was less than the original cost to the appellants of the old stocks, and the assessments should be reduced accordingly; and (d) that the amount of the loss suffered was the difference between the cost price to the appellants of the old stock and the market value of the stock received in the amalgamated companies.

For the Crown it was contended, inter alia, (a) that the amounts claimed as deductions were not deductible in computing the appellants' profits; (b) that there was no sale or realization of investments, but merely a substitution of securities; (c) that the amounts claimed as deductions were not an expense incurred in earning the appellants' profits; (d) that the appellants' claim was, in effect, a claim to write down the book value of investments which the appellants still held, and that such writing down was not a permissible deduction for income-tax purposes; and (e) that the appellants had not suffered any loss, and therefore the assessments should be confirmed.

The Special Commissioners held that the stocks held by the appellants in companies amalgamated or absorbed under the Railways Act, 1921, and the schemes made thereunder, were not realized when those stocks were exchanged for stocks in the four "amalgamated" companies, and that the amount claimed by the appellants to be the loss arising from the alleged realization was not a proper deduction to be made in computing the balance of the appellants' profits and gains for the purpose of Case I. of Schedule D. They accordingly confirmed the assessments.

Mr. Latter, K.C., and Mr. H. P. Glover appeared for the appellants; the Solicitor-General (Sir Boyd Merriman, K.C.) and Mr. R. P. Hills for the Crown.

Mr. Justice Rowlatt, in giving judgment, said that the question was whether the old securities had been "realized" by the appellants. It was clear that the change of securities had been effected on a money basis, and that the appellants had now got stocks and shares which gave them an interest in the entirety of a new undertaking, of which only a very small part was represented by the shares that had disappeared. The new shares were not always of the same denomination or character as the old.

The Special Commissioners, in deciding in favour of the Crown, must be taken to have adopted the broad view that the appellants had not recalled their money, and that there had only been a change in the form of their investments. That argument had attracted him for some time; but, on the whole, he was of opinion that the appellants were right in their contention. Underlying the question was the principle that, while an investment was fluctuating, no notice could be taken of that fluctuation for income-tax purposes. But when that state of affairs ended, and when that investment ceased to figure in the appellant company's assets so that it became known what the holding of that investment had meant to them, and a start was made with a new investment, the position was different. Here the appellants had finished with their investments in the companies which had disappeared, and it could be calculated exactly in money what the holding of those investments had meant to them; the old securities would fluctuate no more, and what would fluctuate for the future would be different shares in new companies. Looking at the matter from that point of view, the old investments had been closed and realized, and new investments had been begun.

He therefore came to the conclusion, with some degree of hesitation, as the point was a nice one, that the appellants were entitled to succeed. The appeal would be allowed, with costs.

ESHUGBAYI ELEKO v. NIGERIA GOVERNMENT OFFICER AND ANOTHER.*

Habeas Corpus — Successive applications—To different Courts or to different Judges of same Court.

Although since the Supreme Court of Judicature Act, 1873, the several Superior Courts have been combined in one High Court of Justice each Judge of that Court still has jurisdiction to entertain an application for a writ of habeas corpus in term time or in vacation and is bound to hear and determine such an application on its merits, notwithstanding that some other Judge has already refused a similar application; and the same principle applies in the case of the Judges of the Supreme Court of Nigeria.

This was an appeal from a judgment of the Supreme Court of Nigeria which affirmed decisions of Mr. Justice Tew refusing to grant a writ of habeas corpus to a native chief against whom the Acting Governor purported to make an order of deportation from Lagos to Oyo. The appellant had already made an application to the Acting Chief Justice, which had also been refused.

Mr. Montgomery, K.C., and Mr. Horace Douglas appeared for the appellant; the Hon. Stafford Cripps, K.C., Mr. J. C. Howard (Solicitor-General for Nigeria), and Mr. Sydney E. Pocock for the respondents.

The Lord Chancellor (Lord Hailsham) delivered their Lordships' judgment as follows:—The facts which give rise to this appeal can be shortly stated; but the question of law involved is one of grave constitutional importance to his Majesty's subjects in this country as well as in the oversea Dominions.

By the Deposed Chiefs' Removal Ordinance of 1917, as amended in 1925, it was provided that:—

"(1) When a native chief or a native holding any office under a native administration or by virtue of any native law or custom has been deposed or removed from his office by or with the sanction of the Governor . . . the Governor may: (a) if native law and custom shall require that such deposed chief or native shall leave the area over which he exercised jurisdiction or influence by virtue of his chieftaincy or office . . . by an Order under his hand direct that such chief or native shall, within such time as shall be specified in the Order, leave the area over which he had exercised jurisdiction or influence and such other part of Nigeria adjacent thereto as may be specified in the Order, and that he shall not return to such area or part without the consent of the Governor. . . . (2) Any deposed chief or native who shall refuse or neglect to leave such area or part of Nigeria as aforesaid, as directed by the Governor, . . . shall be liable to imprisonment for six months, and the Governor may by writing under his hand and seal order such deposed chief or native to be deported, either forthwith or on the expiration of any term of imprisonment to which he may have been sentenced as aforesaid, to such part of Nigeria as the Governor may by such Order direct."

On August 6, 1925, the Acting Governor purported to make an order under the Ordinance in the following terms:—

"Whereas Eshugbayi, a native chief holding the office of Eleko in the Colony, has with my sanction been deposed and removed from his office, and whereas native law and custom requires that the said Eshugbayi shall leave the area over which he exercised influence by virtue of his office: Now therefore I do hereby direct that the said Eshugbayi shall leave the said Colony and the Province of Abeokuta Ijebu and Ondo within twenty-four hours of the service of this Order, and that he shall not return to any of the said areas without my consent."

On August 8, 1925, the acting Governor made a further order reciting the order of August 6, reciting that the appellant had refused or neglected to comply with it, and ordering that the appellant should be deported forthwith to Oyo, in the Province of Oyo.

Immediately on service of the order of August 6 the appellant gave notice of motion for leave to set aside the order and to stay execution on it. This motion was heard on August 7 and 8 by the acting Chief Justice of Nigeria, and was dismissed on August 8. On the dismissal of the motion the appellant gave notice of motion on August 8 for leave to issue a writ of habeas corpus, and on August 10 leave was granted for a rule nisi for a writ of habeas corpus returnable on August 13. On that day cause was shown against the rule and the rule was discharged on technical grounds without going into the merits. Meanwhile the appellant on the same August 8 had issued a writ against the acting Governor and the Chief Secretary of the Government of Nigeria claiming a declaration that the order of August 6, 1925, was void, and asking for an injunction to restrain the defendants from taking any steps under the Order. On August 19 the Attorney-General for Nigeria moved to stay or dismiss this action as being frivolous and vexatious and an abuse of the process of the Court. The motion was heard by the acting Chief Justice, and on September 7, 1925, he ordered that the action should be dismissed on those grounds.

On September 18, 1925, the appellant gave a fresh notice of motion for leave to issue a writ of habeas corpus, and on October 12, 1925, the acting Chief Justice gave judgment refusing the motion. The Judge held that the orders of August 6 and 8 had been validly made and that the detention of the appellant was, therefore, lawful. On December 4, 1925, the appellant gave a fresh notice of motion for a writ of habeas corpus. This motion was heard before Mr. Justice Tew on December 8, 1925, when the Attorney-General for Nigeria took a preliminary objection that a similar application based on the same material had been made by the appellant, and had been dismissed by the acting Chief Justice, and that in view of that refusal the application could not be entertained. On December 14, 1925, the Judge gave judgment upholding the objection and dismissing the motion on that ground.

The appellant appealed against this decision and, on the hearing of the appeal, took the point that there was no evidence that the previous application had been made or that it had been based on the same ground. The Court directed that the case should be returned to the Judge that evidence might be filed on these points. Accordingly, on March 9, 1926, an affidavit was filed by the Solicitor-General for Nigeria, and on March 15, 1926, Mr. Justice Tew re-heard the motion and dismissed it on the same ground as before. From this decision the appellant again appealed, and on June 1, 1926, the Full Court, in a considered judgment, dismissed the appeal and upheld the view of Mr. Justice Tew that the preliminary objection prevailed and that he had no jurisdiction to entertain the application. It is from this decision that the present appeal is brought before the Board.

On the hearing before this Board the appellant contended in the first place that there never had been a decision on the merits of his application, and that the dismissal of the second motion for a habeas corpus by the acting Chief Justice had been merely on technical grounds. Even if this contention were relevant, it was not in fact made out. In their Lordships' view it is clear from a perusal of the judgment that the merits were most carefully considered by the acting Chief Justice, and that the refusal was based expressly on the Judge's view on the merits of the application.

But it was further contended on behalf of the appellant that by the common law of this country, which applies in Nigeria, it is the right of any imprisoned person to apply successively to every tribunal competent to issue a writ of habeas corpus, and that each tribunal must determine such an application upon its merits unfettered by the decision of any other tribunal of co-ordinate jurisdiction, even if the grounds urged are exactly the same.

On behalf of the respondents, Mr. Stafford Cripps admitted the existence of the right to make successive applications, but he argued that the applications must be to different Courts. He pointed out that in the present case each application had been made to the Supreme Court of Nigeria, and he contended that since that Court had determined the matter by dismissing the application on October 12, no fresh application based upon the same materials could be entertained by that Court. In support of this argument he cited the language of Lord Esher in Ex parte Cox (4 The Times L.R., 81 ; 20 Q.B.D., 1 at p. 13):—

"It is not correct to say that under the old system there could be an application to all the judges in succession. There could be an application to all the Courts in succession."

He (counsel) pointed out that, although the decision of the Court of Appeal had been over-ruled in the House of Lords, where the case is reported under the name of Cox v. Hakes (6 The Times L.R., 465; 15 App. Cas., 506), none of the Lords had dissented from Lord Esher's statement of the law, and Lord Bramwell's language at page 523 seemed to indicate that his view of the old practice was the same. Counsel further called attention to the fact that no instance could be found in the books of applications being made to successive Judges of the same Court, and he cited decisions in New Zealand in Ex parte Bouvy (18 N.Z.L.R., 601), and of the Court of Appeal in Canada in In re Loo Len No. 2 ([1924] 1 Dom. L.R., 910) to the same effect.

This constitutes a formidable body of judicial opinion, and their Lordships have thought it right, therefore, to examine with some care the earlier history of the writ. This will be found set out in Hale's Pleas of the Crown, Vol. II., p. 143; in Bacon's Abridgment under the title "Habeas Corpus, Section B"; in Sir William Blackstone's Commentaries, Vol. III., p. 131 et seq.; and in the discussion of Blackstone's Opinion appearing in Lord Eldon's judgment in Crowley's case (2 Swanston, 1 at p. 39 et seq.).

From these authorities it appears that the writ of habeas corpus was originally issuable out of the Court of King's Bench and out of the Court of Chancery; but that in very early days the Courts of Common Pleas and Exchequer had claimed the right to issue the writ in protection of their own officers and suitors, and that this practice had been gradually extended to other cases. In the 17th century the Habeas Corpus Act, 1640 (16 Chas. I., c. 10), expressly recognizes the right and duty of the Court of Common Pleas to order the writ to issue; and the Habeas Corpus Act, 1679 (31 Chas. II., c. 2), s. 9, enacts that it shall be lawful to move and obtain habeas corpus as well out of the High Court of Chancery or Court of Exchequer as out of the Courts of King's Bench or Common Pleas or either of them. This latter Act further provided that the Lord Chancellor or any one of His Majesty's Justices might grant a habeas corpus in vacation, and imposed heavy penalties on any Judge who wrongfully refused to entertain the application.

It was conceded for the respondents that under the terms of this statute application could be made in vacation to successive Judges of the same Court. This led to the curious result that on the respondents' argument if application were made in vacation it could be renewed to each Judge of the Court, but if it were made in term it could only be made once to the Court of Chancery and once to each of the three Courts of Common Law. But a far more serious consequence of the respondents' argument would be the effect on the right to apply for this writ of the Supreme Court of Judicature Act of 1873. That statute combined into one Court the old High Court of Chancery, the Court of Queen's Bench, the Court of Common Pleas, and the Court of Exchequer, together with the Admiralty and Probate Courts and the Court for Divorce and Matrimonial Causes.

If, therefore, the respondents are right in contending that an application for a writ of habeas corpus can only be entertained once by any one Court, it necessarily follows that the effect of the Supreme Court of Judicature Act, 1873, must have been to deprive the subject of the right which he had previously enjoyed of applying successively to the Court of Chancery and to each of the three Common Law Courts, and to limit him in future to one application to the Supreme Court of Judicature. Their Lordships would be reluctant to reach such a conclusion unless compelled to do so by clear words. The writ of habeas corpus is a high prerogative writ for the protection of the liberty of the subject, and it would be a startling result if a statute, enacted primarily for simplification of procedure, should have materially cut down that protection. But, in fact, their Lordships do not think that the Act has had this result, or that the contention of the respondents is well founded.

It is true that there is no reported case before the year 1873 of applications being made to successive Judges of the same Court, but it must be remembered that the Common Law Courts usually sat in banco so that an application to the Court was in effect an application to all the Judges of the Court sitting together. There is a precedent for application being made to a Judge of the Court of Exchequer sitting in Chambers and a subsequent application being made to the Court of Exchequer in the case of Ex parte Partington (13 M. and W., 679), where Baron Parke says:—

"This case has already been before the Court of Queen's Bench on the return of a habeas corpus, and before my Lord Chief Baron at Chambers on a subsequent application for a similar writ. In both instances the discharge was refused. The defendant, however, has a right to the opinion of every Court as to the propriety of his imprisonment and therefore we have thought it proper to examine attentively the provisions of the Statute without considering ourselves as concluded by these decisions."

If it be conceded that any Judge has jurisdiction to order the writ to issue, then, in the view of their Lordships, each Judge is a tribunal to which application can be made within the meaning of the rule and every Judge must hear the application on the merits. It follows that, although by the Supreme Court of Judicature Act, 1873, the Courts were combined in the one High Court of Justice, each Judge of that Court still has jurisdiction to entertain an application for a writ of habeas corpus in term time or in vacation, and that he is bound to hear and determine such an application on its merits, notwithstanding that some other Judge has already refused a similar application. The same principle must apply in the case of the Judges of the Supreme Court of Nigeria.

It follows that, in the opinion of this Board, the Judge was wrong in refusing to hear the application in the present case on its merits, and the appeal must be allowed. In expressing this view, their Lordships must not be taken to be offering any opinion on the merits of the application or upon the validity of the order impugned. These matters will be investigated by the Judge who hears the application and will be decided by him on the evidence already filed and any further evidence which may be placed before him. The appellant must have the costs of the appeal here and below; the costs of the application before Mr. Justice Tew must abide the result of the re-hearing. Their Lordships will humbly advise His Majesty accordingly.

IN THE ESTATE OF GATES, DECEASED.*

Probate—Will—Construction—"I leave all my money to X."

In the case of a will the operative part of which consisted solely of the words "I leave all my money to Alfred George Cabell," on an application by Cabell for a grant of administration with the will annexed, Lord Merrivale, P., held (44 The Times L.R., 353; [1928] P., 128) that the bulk of the deceased's estate passed to Cabell, including cash in the house, a credit on current account at the bank, and stocks and shares, but that the equity of redemption in certain freehold houses and the furniture in the deceased's house passed to the next-of-kin, and as there was no executor named in the will, and the deceased had died since January 1, 1926, leaving his property not wholly disposed of, the persons entitled under an intestacy took, in accordance with the Probate Rules (Non-Contentious Business), rule 119, a grant of administration with the will annexed, in priority to the legatee, Cabell. Certain additional assets were discovered after the date of the judgment.

On appeal that part of the order of the President which concerned the construction of the will was discharged by consent so that, in the event of there being no settlement, the construction of the will might be determined de novo in the Chancery Division.

This was an appeal from a decision of Lord Merrivale, President of the Probate, Divorce, and Admiralty Division (44 The Times L.R., 353; [1928] P., 128).

Alfred Gates, who died on April 21, 1927, in his very brief will stated: "I leave all my money to Alfred George Cabell." No executor was named in the will. Mr. Cabell moved for a grant of letters of administration and claimed to be entitled to the testator's whole estate. The next-of-kin also asked for a grant, and contended that Mr. Cabell was only entitled to cash in the testator's house and money to the credit of his current account.

The President held that the will disposed of the whole estate (including stocks and shares), except the testator's furniture and the equity of redemption in some freehold house property, but that Mr. Cabell's motion failed, as the estate was not wholly disposed of and the testator died after January 1, 1926, and therefore by rule 119 of the Probate Rules (Non-Contentious Business) the persons entitled on an intestacy took a grant of administration with the will annexed in priority to a legatee. Both parties appealed.

Mr. Spens, K.C., and Mr. G. C. Tyndale appeared for the next-of-kin; Mr. Gover, K.C., Mr. Clifford Mortimer, and Mr. W. Latey for Mr. Cabell.

Certain additional assets had been discovered since the date of the judgment, and by consent the order of the President was varied by omitting the words containing his ruling as to what portion of the estate passed to Mr. Cabell, the effect being that administration in common form with the will annexed would issue to the next-of-kin, and, failing a settlement, the proper construction of the will would have to be determined de novo in the Chancery Division.

Court of Appeal. (Scrutton, Greer, and Sankey, L.JJ.) 1928. June 11.

SYMINGTON AND CO. v. UNION INSURANCE SOCIETY OF CANTON, LIMITED.*

Insurance (Loss)—Clause in policy but not in slip—Warehouse to warehouse clause—Loss "reasonably attributed to fire."

The respondents, who were cork growers and had a factory and a warehouse near Algeciras, sent from the factory to Algeciras quantities of cork for shipment and allowed it to accumulate on the jetty till there should be enough for a cargo. While an accumulation on the jetty was awaiting shipment the respondents effected with the appellants an insurance by a slip. Before the policy was issued a fire broke out on the jetty, and to prevent its spreading to the cork the authorities jettisoned part of the cork and threw sea-water on the rest, with the result that a large portion was lost or damaged. The policy, when issued, contained a free of capture and seizure clause and a warehouse to warehouse clause and provided for payment of any loss "which may reasonably be attributed to fire," and a clause in the margin provided that shore risk against fire was not covered where the assured had fire insurance. The marginal clause was not in the slip. The respondents, who had another insurance against fire, claimed under the insurance effected with the appellants, and in an arbitration an award was given in the respondents' favour.

Held, (1) that as the goods at the time of the loss had reached the jetty in the ordinary course of transit they were covered by the warehouse to warehouse clause, (2) that the goods were lost by a peril insured against, (3) that the underwriters were not relieved from liability by the f.c. and s. clause, and (4) that the question whether the policy, so far as it contained a fire insurance clause, was or was not contrary to the usual form of marine insurance on goods, must be referred back to the arbitrator.

Decision of Roche, J. (44 The Times L.R., 392), varied.

This was an appeal from the decision of Mr. Justice Roche (44 The Times L.R., 392) on the award of an arbitrator, stated in the form of a special case, which raised a question of construction of a policy of insurance.

By an insurance effected in 1919 the appellants insured goods of the claimants, Symington and Co., at and from any port or ports, place or places between Bordeaux and Nice, both inclusive, to the United Kingdom and until delivered at destination inland . . . . in the vessel called the Hillhouse . . . sailing February, 1920. . . . Beginning the adventure upon the said goods and merchandises from the loading thereof on board the said ship. . . .

The claimants were cork growers, carrying on business in Spain. In 1919 they had a factory and warehouse at San Roque, which is about eight miles north of Algeciras and is connected therewith by railway. The cork was sent down from the claimants' warehouse at San Roque to Algeciras, where there was a jetty but no warehouse, and was either shipped from the jetty at Algeciras or was ferried across from the jetty to Gibraltar and shipped there. Owing to lack of railway facilities the cork was sent down to Algeciras in small quantities day by day, and was allowed to accumulate on the jetty till there was enough to be shipped to the United Kingdom.

On February 9, 1920, there was on the jetty at Algeciras awaiting shipment an accumulation of cork consisting of 1,105 bales of large grain and 1,006 of small grain. Some of the small grain had been lying on the jetty since August, 1919, and the rest of the cork had been sent down from the warehouse at San Roque in November and December, 1919, and January, 1920. The claimants expected to ship the accumulated cork on a steamer, the Hillhouse, about February 20, 1920.

On November 25, 1919, the claimants effected an insurance of £20,000 on the cork with the present appellants and other companies, the insurance to begin on January 1, 1920.

On February 9, 1920, before any declaration had been made under the insurance and before a policy had been issued, a fire broke out on the jetty at Algeciras, at some distance from the claimants' cork. To prevent the fire from spreading to the claimants' cork the port and military authorities decided to jettison part of it and to throw sea-water on the part which remained on the jetty. As a consequence 1,011 bales of large grain and 205 bales of small grain were lost or damaged. The claimants claimed under the policy, and the claim was referred to arbitration. The arbitrator awarded in favour of the claimants subject to the decision of this special case.

The policy contained material clauses as follows :—

"1. Warranted free of capture seizure arrest restraint or detainment. . . .

"6. The insured goods are covered subject to the terms of this policy from the time of leaving the shipper's or manufacturer's warehouse during the ordinary course of transit until on board the vessel . . . and from the vessel whilst on quays wharves or in sheds during the ordinary course of transit until safely deposited in consignee's or other warehouse at destination named in policy.

"9. Warranted free from particular average . . . but notwithstanding this warranty the assurers are to pay the insured value of any package or packages which may be totally lost in loading transhipment or discharge, also for any loss . . . which may reasonably be attributed to fire. . . ."

There was also inserted in the margin of the policy the following clause :—

"This policy not to inure to the benefit of any Fire Insurance Company. It is warranted and agreed by the assured that any shore risk against fire granted herein shall not cover where the assured or any carrier or other bailee has fire insurance which would attach if this policy had not been issued."

The claimants had another insurance against fire, but the arbitrator held that the policy should be read as not containing the above marginal clause, because it was not contained in the slip which represented the real contract between the parties.

* Reported by E. J. M. Chaplin, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Mr. Justice Roche held (1) that as the slip contained the real contract the marginal clause must be treated as non-existent ; (2) that as the goods at the time of the loss were in the ordinary course of transit, they were covered by the warehouse to warehouse clause ; and (3) that the loss might reasonably be attributed to fire, and, therefore, the award must be affirmed in favour of the claimants.

The insurance company appealed.

Mr. Le Quesne, K.C., and Mr. Simey appeared for the appellants ; Mr. Porter, K.C., and Mr. Somervell for the respondents.

Lord Justice Scrutton.—On one of the points in this case the Court is of opinion that further information is necessary, and they propose to send the case back to the arbitrator on that point ; but as the Court has made up its mind on the other questions which have been argued, it proposes to dispose of those questions leaving the ultimate result to depend on its decision when it has had the further information from the arbitrator.

This appeal comes before us from a decision of Mr. Justice Roche on a special case stated by an arbitrator in a claim by owners of goods against a marine insurance company. Messrs. Symington, who are the owners of the goods, are a firm who carry on the business of cork manufacturers and exporters. They grow the cork in Spain where they have a factory and warehouse at a place called San Roque, which is found by the arbitrator to be about eight miles to the north of Algeciras, a port on the coast, and connected with that port by railway. They grow the cork ; they then send it to their factory in order that it may go through some process to put it into a condition to be exported, and then bit by bit, because apparently they have not ready at one time in the factory enough to make a shipload, they send the cork down from their factory by the railway to Algeciras where it lies on the jetty increasing in quantity as further consignments come down until the ship that they have chartered arrives, there being enough cork then to make a ship-load, and it is then shipped to the United Kingdom. They had been carrying on this business for some years, and not unnaturally they desired to insure their cork against risks ; and it is pretty obvious to my mind that they desired to insure it from their factory, where it was put into an exportable condition, to various places in the interior of the United Kingdom, so that the insurance that they desired was not merely a marine insurance ; it was a marine insurance with land transit at the beginning and at the end.

In those circumstances, a good many years ago, I am sorry to say, in 1920, their broker in London took round a slip to marine companies stating the risk which he wanted to insure, and the particular slip that I have in my hand was underwritten by five companies for £15,000 in all. A loss occurred while the cork was on the jetty at Algeciras waiting for shipment, and the loss was of this nature. A fire broke out, not in the cork but close to it, and appeared likely to spread so that it would burn the stored cork. Persons described as the port and military authorities, desiring to stop the fire, came down and proposed to put a barrier in the way of the fire spreading, (1) by throwing some of the cork into the water so that at a particular place there would be a gap in the goods which the fire would not get over, and (2) by pouring sea water on some of the cork so that the fire would not be likely to light that cork by sparks, glowing cinders, or anything of that sort. The cork which was thrown into the water was, of course, damaged by sea water. The part which was wetted by sea water was also damaged. Thereupon the shippers claimed from the underwriters for the loss by fire, or by jettison, or under the general words under which perils ejusdem generis with the named perils are covered. There was not at first a policy. The matter went to arbitration, and apparently the arbitrator stated a special case and it came, as special cases do come, before a judge of the High Court, and the judge, according to his duty, said : You are making a claim on a policy of marine insurance and there is not one ; I cannot hear this special case. Thereupon the proceedings had to start over again ; and before they could start over again there had to be a policy, and the views of the underwriters and the assured as to what should be the policy issued on the particular slip differed, and so the arrangement was made that the company should issue a policy in the form which they say was the right form and that the arbitrator, among other things, should decide whether any clause in the policy issued by the company to which the assured objected should or should not be struck out of the policy as not being justified by the slip.

So there come before us, and there came before the arbitrator and Mr. Justice Roche, the questions : (1) What should the policy be; (2) when you have settled the form of the policy, what are the rights of the parties on the true construction of the policy?

Now, I say at once, although I will deal with it later, that we are sending back to the arbitrator the question of rectification to ask him to find the fact, and I proceed to deal with the case on the points which have been argued on the construction of the policy apart from the clause about fire insurance, which is the clause affected by the question whether there should be rectification or not.

The first point which was argued on which we propose to express an opinion is whether on the policy as drawn the risk had attached at the time when the loss occurred. Now the policy is the printed form by which the Union Insurance Society of Canton insure "At and from," and then there is a blank to be filled in, "of and in the good ship or vessel called the," and then there is a blank to be filled in, "Beginning the Adventure upon the said Goods and Merchandises from the Loading thereof on board the said Ship, and so to continue and endure, until the said Goods and Merchandises shall be safely delivered from on board the said Ship." That was the printed form from which the parties were starting, and it is quite clear that that printed form did not express what the parties intended to cover; and it is a pity, though it is the invariable practice of underwriters, that when they did fill up the form they did not scratch out the words which were not applicable to the risk that they were going to cover, because there is no doubt first of all that at the delivery end the insurance was intended to cover the goods not only until they left the ship but until they were delivered at destination inland in the United Kingdom; and, secondly, it is clear that before the goods got on to the ship it was intended to cover risks in transit by craft, raft and/or lighter to the vessel, because that is clause 7 of the Institute Cargo Clauses which the slip stated were to be incorporated in the policy ; and, further, by clause 6 of the Institute Cargo Clauses it was intended to cover the risk from the time of leaving the shippers' or manufacturers' warehouse during the ordinary course of transit until aboard the vessel; so that both a water transit by craft and a land transit from warehouse were intended to be covered before the loading on board the ship which the printed form stated was the beginning of the adventure.

Now, what was done was to fill into the slip, after the words " at and from," " any port or ports, place or places between Bordeaux and Nice (both inclusive)," and the first question which was argued was what those words meant; and whether San Roque (where the warehouse was) was a place between Bordeaux and Nice; so that on those words the risk would begin on leaving the warehouse. Now I do not take, I think, quite the view that either the arbitrator or the Court below has taken of this point. " Any port or ports, place or places between Bordeaux and Nice " certainly does not mean as the crow flies or as an aeroplane would fly if it could; it does not mean anything like a straight line between Bordeaux and Nice. When it refers to any port or ports, I think it refers to the coast line, and I think it refers to that for the reason that it is primarily dealing with transit of goods in a steamer and the goods get on the steamer on the coast line ; and I am disposed to read " place or places " as analogous to " port or ports," to restrict both of them to shipping places and to treat " between Bordeaux and Nice " as along the coast line, including, of course, the banks of rivers between Bordeaux and Nice, going round the coast of Spain until in France you get to Nice. But it appears to me that to that shipping transit from the port or ports, place or places between Bordeaux and Nice there is added a land transit which is added by the words of clause 6 of the Institute Cargo Clauses which are expressly incorporated and which have nothing to do with the words " port or ports, place or places," except that the transit is from the warehouse to the port or ports, place or places, where the ship is to take on board the goods. Therefore, I should see no difficulty whatever in covering the transit from San Roque to the ship under the warehouse clause. The warehouse clause, to my idea, has been inserted because the shippers, the owners of the goods, want to cover their goods for the whole transit, including a period before they are on the ship, and including a period after they have been on the ship, whilst in each case they are completing the through transit on land. Therefore, I see no difficulty whatever in holding that the goods on the pier at Algeciras, having come in the ordinary course of transit from the shippers' manufactory at San Roque, were covered by the policy. That is not exactly the view that the learned Judge has taken; but it is the view which appears to me to be the proper construction of the policy and it has the same result as the view which the learned Judge has taken.

Then next, the goods being within the policy, the risk having attached, while they lay on the quay at Algeciras waiting to be shipped were they lost by a peril insured against ? Now, I leave out for the moment the question of the f.c. and s. clause. What happened to them ? Some of them were thrown into the sea to save the rest of them from destruction by fire. In my view, that risk is covered subject to the point about the f.c. and s. clause by the general words as a peril ejusdem generis with jettison. Jettison is throwing into the sea from the ship generally to save some part of the adventure. This jettison from the pier into the sea was also to save some part of the adventure. It was a jettison and appears to me to be covered subject to the point about the f.c. and s. clause by the general words as being a peril of the same character as jettison.

The rest of the goods for which the claim is made were damaged by water thrown on them in order to prevent the fire from spreading to them and to the other goods. Now, there has been considerable difficulty in English law about water used either to extinguish fire or to prevent fire from spreading. For a long time English average adjusters declined to admit any damage by water into general average. In cases to which I need not refer—Schmidt v. Royal Mail SS. Co. (45 L.J., Q.B., 646) is one of them—that view of English average adjusters was held to be erroneous ; and it has now been determined that it is a subject-matter of general average when, there being a fire, goods are damaged not by the fire but by the water used to extinguish the fire, or the water used to prevent the fire from spreading, and that such damage can be claimed as a damage resulting from fire, and, in my view, can be claimed under a marine policy as a damage caused by fire. There will be found a long discussion in Mr. Lowndes' book on General Average about the effect of that.

The test seems to be as is stated in The Knight of St. Michael (14 The Times L.R., 191 ; [1898] P., 30) and in Kacianoff v. China Traders' Insurance Company (30 The Times L.R., 546 ; [1914] 3 K.B., 1121). Is it a fear of something that will happen in the future or has the peril already happened and is it so imminent that it is immediately necessary to avert the danger by action ? Lord Reading, C.J., puts it in this way at page 1128 : " Was there at the time such a condition of things that there was an actually existing peril of fire and not merely a fear that it might break out ? " Mr. Justice Barnes in The Knight of St. Michael (supra) puts it in very much the same way. I refer to it without reading it.

I therefore take the view on the facts found in this case that, there being an existing fire and an imminent peril, the damage caused by water either used to extinguish the fire or to prevent it from spreading was a proximate consequence of fire and could be recovered under the general words as being ejusdem generis with fire, it does not matter which for this purpose.

Then there is this further question. It is said that this jettison, and this pumping of water on the bales, amounted to a restraint of Princes. I use " restraint of princes " to cover the collocation of words which appear in the f. c. and s. clause. As is well known, the original Lloyd's policy contained the language, " Arrests, restraints, and detainments of all kings, princes and people of whatever nation, condition or nationality whatsoever," and, when it was desired to exclude the loss covered by those words from the policy so that the underwriters were not liable for loss covered by those words, for some reason which I have never understood underwriters did not use those words, but they used a different set of words, and they framed the f.c. and s. clause, " Warranted free of capture, seizure, arrest, restraint, or detainment, and the consequences thereof or any attempt thereat (piracy excepted), and also from all consequences of hostilities or warlike operations, whether before or after declaration of war." Like the Statute of Frauds, every word in that clause has been worth a ransom. I am bound to say that I think it would startle anyone if he were told that when a fire engine arrives and pumps water into a house that liability for the damage is excluded by the clause, " free of capture, seizure, arrest, restraint or detainment and the consequences thereof." It is difficult, I think, to conceive that that sort of operation can be contemplated either by the words " arrests, restraints, and detainments of all kings, princes and people," or by matters enumerated in the f.c.

and s. clause. The action of the port authority in saving a man's property, they being responsible for the safety of the whole port, does not appear to me to be a matter which is at all contemplated either by "restraint of princes" or by the f.c. and s. clause. It would be, I think, going much further than any case on the meaning of those words has yet gone; and I certainly decline to extend those words to a subject-matter which appears to me to be not in the contemplation of the parties who framed those words and who have used them for centuries.

It follows, therefore, that we are deciding these points. We are deciding that the policy attached to the goods as they lay on the quay at Algeciras, and that while on the quay at Algeciras they were lost by perils insured against and that the underwriters were not relieved from liability by the f.c. and s. clause.

There remains the question on which we propose to send the matter back to the arbitrator. It is said by the underwriters, although this slip says nothing about it: Our (the Canton Company's) usual form of policy has in the margin, "This policy not to enure to the benefit of any Fire Insurance Company. It is warranted and agreed by the assured that any shore risk against fire granted herein shall not cover where the assured or any carrier or other Bailee has Fire Insurance which would attach if this Policy had not been issued"; and it said that that marginal clause ought to be part of the policy granted under this slip. The assured has such a fire insurance; consequently though the policy attached and though but for that clause there would be a loss within the policy it is said that the assured cannot recover. Now this is undoubtedly a point of some difficulty, and I do not propose to say anything about the view which I at present take on it; but it appears to the Court material to know a fact which we might gather inferentially from some information that has been supplied to us but on which we think it desirable to have a finding of fact from the arbitrator, and the question which we want the arbitrator to answer is this: Whether the policy issued so far as it contains the fire policy clause is or is not contrary to the usual form of marine insurance on goods; that is to say, is it the usual form for a marine policy on goods to have this clause in it or a clause substantially similar? When we have heard the answer we shall then be in a position to discuss and to decide the view which we take on this particular point. I abstain from indicating what my view might be, or what the difficulties are, until we hear the answer to that question. The matter of costs will, of course, stand over until we finally decide the whole case.

Lord Justice Greer.—I agree with my Lord on the three points which it is desirable that we should decide at present, leaving out of consideration the question which has just been mentioned.

The claim before the arbitrator was a claim upon a policy of insurance, and, with the exception of one clause in the margin of the policy which has been referred to as the fire policy clause, it is not disputed that the policy, together with the clauses attached, is in accordance with the agreement of the parties of which the slip is evidence; and the questions we are now deciding depend upon the true interpretation and the right application of the words contained in this policy.

In the first place it is said that the risks covered by the policy did not begin, or, as it is usually expressed in marine insurance, the risks did not attach. At the time of the fire the goods were on the jetty at a port or place where it is conceded they would have been covered if they had come from a warehouse at that port or place—namely, Algeciras; but it is contended that as they came from a warehouse which is at a place called San Roque, which is eight miles away from Algeciras, the risk was not covered. Now, in my judgment, one has to read No. 6 of the Institute Cargo Clauses as an extension of the insurance beyond that which it would be if one had to read the policy only without the attached clause, and I read it as meaning that the further period to be covered in respect of fire, amongst other things, is the period of time, and also the operation which takes place, when the goods are coming from the shipper's or the manufacturer's warehouse during the ordinary course of transit until on board the vessel; and it is conceded that if that warehouse were in the port of loading the transit, however far the distance might have been from the warehouse to the ship, would have been covered by this clause extending the insurance. Now it seems to me that there is in the clause nothing which limits that extended insurance to the distance between the ship and a warehouse which is in the port of loading in contrast to a warehouse some few miles distant from the port of loading; and I am of opinion that the learned arbitrator was not wrong in concluding that the insurance covered the goods while they were on a stage in the transit from the manufacturers' or shippers' warehouse to the ship. It may be that the transit would not be included if the shippers' warehouse was so far away that no one would ever imagine that it was contemplated that the warehouse might be so far away and the transit might be so long, but at any rate it seems to me to be included, provided that it is not an unreasonable distance from the port, and provided that it is a place where it is not unusual or not unreasonable for a shipper to hold his cargo in readiness for shipment. I cannot find that the arbitrator was wrong in law in finding that the risk had attached.

Now the next question is whether or not the loss was caused by fire within the policy; and, in my judgment, it is right to say that the cause of the loss was the fire. It is quite true that fire never touched the goods; they were touched by the enemy of fire, that is to say, by water, and they were damaged by water. But it has long been decided, and for a long time acted upon in relation to fire insurance on land, that damage by water done to save the consequence of fire and damage by the destruction of property to save fire reaching that property can be held to be the consequence of the fire and within a policy of fire insurance. This matter was dealt with in Stanley v. Western Insurance Company (L.R., 3 Ex., 71). At page 74 Chief Baron Kelly says: "I agree that any loss resulting from an apparently necessary and bona-fide effort to put out a fire, whether it be by spoiling the goods by water, or throwing the articles of furniture out of window, or even the destroying of a neighbouring house by an explosion for the purposes of checking the progress of the flames, in a word, every loss that clearly and proximately results, whether directly or indirectly, from the fire, is within the policy." A similar question came up for decision in the case of The Knight of St. Michael (14 The Times L.R., 191; [1898] P., 30) before Mr. Justice Barnes. That was a case in which the question was concerned with a loss of freight by reason of coal heating but not actually getting on fire. Fire had not taken place, but the loss of freight arose upon the master of the vessel taking a course which would enable him to prevent fire from destroying the ship and the goods on board, and Mr. Justice Barnes calls attention to the fact that though there was no actually existing fire there was an actually existing state of peril of fire. Those words apply to the present case. There was in the present case an actual peril of fire though no actual fire affected the claimants' goods. That view agrees also with what was said by Lord Reading, C.J., in the case of Kacianoff v. China Traders' Insurance Company (30 The Times L.R., 546; [1914] 3 K.B., 1121). I think, therefore, that the true view on that part of this policy is that it is right to say that this loss was within the insurance against fire.

The next question is whether or not the insuring company, the respondents to the arbitration, have proved themselves on the facts to come within the warranty contained in the policy, "free of capture, seizure, arrest, restraint or detainment and the consequences thereof." That must mean arrest or detainment of princes or people. It is not proved here that there was on the part of the Government, or of the executive, or of any public authority, an act of force contrary to the wishes of the owners of the goods, or of the captain of the ship; and I think, in order to bring the case within the restraint of princes, it must be shown somehow or other that force was exercised by the Government, or the officers of the Government, before it can be said that there was any arrest, detainment, or restraint of princes or people. It might have been proved here; it is possible that there was a law or regulation that soldiers and port authorities should, as soon as they saw a risk of fire, hurry to put into the water or to cover with water any goods which were likely to be damaged, or any property of their own which was likely to be damaged; but nothing of that sort has been proved here; and what has happened is consistent with the authorities, that is to say, the people who were there at the time were doing their best on their own motion for the benefit of all concerned to see that the fire did not do more damage than they could prevent. In those circumstances I think the restraint of princes does not apply.

Now with regard to the other question on which, as my Lord has said, we desire some further facts. The point put for the appellants may be put in one of two ways. It may be said, as has been said with considerable force in the argument, that the agreement which is contained in the slip means that the policy is to be issued in the form which is the usual form of the Union Insurance Society of Canton; and if the case had turned upon that, and turned upon that only, we have enough materials in the case as it stands to decide the point; but it may be that the slip means that there should be a policy or an insurance on the terms which are usual in the insurance world, if there are such terms, and it is in order that we may be able to decide that question that we desire some further information from the arbitrator. There is some indication in what we have been told, but not in the arbitrator's finding, that it will be very difficult to find a policy which may be described, or a number of terms which can be described, as the usual form of insurance; and it seems to me that if the arbitrator cannot find the usual form of insurance then he cannot say that this policy was contrary to the usual form of insurance. Be that as it may, it is a matter on which the Court desires some further information, and I agree that it should go back, though for my part I am not unwilling to consider anything which may be said by the parties or counsel as to what the right form of question should be.

LORD JUSTICE SANKEY.—I agree, and I only desire to add a few words on each of the three points, upon which I am in agreement with my Lord and my brother Lord Justice Greer.

Three points are taken for the insurance company: (1) that the risk had not attached at the time of the loss, (2) that the loss was not due to a peril insured against; and (3) that the loss was due to restraint of princes. One has in approaching those three points to consider what is the contract between the parties. The contract is contained not only in the body of the policy which provides that it is "from any port or ports place or places between Bordeaux and Nice (both inclusive) to the United Kingdom and until delivered at destination inland," but there are stipulations in the body of the policy which are, in my view, extended by clause 6 of the Institute Cargo Clauses, that the insured goods are covered subject to the terms of this policy from the time of leaving the shippers' or manufacturers' warehouse during the ordinary course of transit until on board the vessel. It is found that at the time of the loss these goods were in ordinary course of transit from the manufacturers' warehouse, and the distance from the manufacturers' warehouse at San Roque to Algeciras was not, in my view, an unreasonable distance. In this particular case I think there is material upon which the arbitrator could find, and indeed as I think ought to find, that the goods were in ordinary course of transit, that is, land transit.

With regard to the next point, that the loss was not due to a peril insured against, I agree with my Lord in thinking that part of the loss comes under the word "jettison" in the words in the body of the insurance policy and part of it comes under the word "fire."

With regard to the last point, I will not repeat what Lord Justice Greer has read from the judgment of Chief Baron Kelly in Stanley v. Western Insurance Company (L.R., 3 Ex., 71); but it is to be observed that in this case as in other cases similarly decided the peril had begun to operate. In Kacianoff v. China Traders' Insurance Company (30 The Times L.R., 546; [1914] 3 K.B., 1121) Lord Reading, C.J., said at page 1127: "It would have been a totally different state of things if the vessel had left and then, outside, had been met and threatened by a Japanese vessel, or if, approaching Nagasaki, she had been in some such danger. No doubt there may be circumstances in which judges may differ as to when the particular peril did begin to operate, but there must be the beginning before the judge can exercise his judgment upon it," and in discussing the case of The Knight of St. Michael (14 The Times L.R., 191; [1898] P., 30) afterwards he says: "The danger was present, and if nothing had been done spontaneous combustion and fire would have followed in the natural course. That means that the peril had begun to operate." I think those remarks apply in this case; the peril had begun to operate and the loss comes within the words which are expressed in the body of the policy.

With regard to the last point—namely, that the loss was really due to restraint of princes under the Institute Cargo Clauses, No. 1, "warranted free of capture, seizure, arrest, restraint, or detainment"—I desire to repeat the words used by the learned Judge in the Court below, with which I am in entire agreement. He says: "I am concerned to say in my judgment that this"—that is, the facts in this case—"is not a restraint of princes. It seems to me a very far-reaching use of language to say that a fireman when he is pouring water upon goods which are within the ambit of the fire is using restraint of princes or anyone else. He is putting out a fire; he is dealing with a fire, and he is, I think, no more within the capture or restraint clause if he happens to be employed by the State than if he happens to be employed by the district authority or if he happens to be a volunteer member of the fire brigade."

For these reasons I am in agreement on the three points, and with regard to the point which we are sending back to the arbitrator I desire to say nothing until we know what the exact facts of the case are.

K.B. Div.
(Lord Hewart, C.J., Avory and Shearman, JJ.)
1928. May 14.

THOMAS v. THOMAS BOLTON AND SONS, LIMITED.*

Factories — Dangerous machinery — Fencing—Guard provided by employer not replaced by workman — Fatal accident—"Neglect" to observe provisions of Act—Factory and Workshop Act, 1901 (1 Ed. VII., c. 22), ss. 10 (1) (c), 136, 141.

The duty to fence securely dangerous machinery under s. 10 of the Factory and Workshop Act, 1901, is absolute, and it is no answer to a charge under s. 136, where a person has been killed or injured in consequence of the neglect to observe that provision, that the occupier provided proper guards and placed on the workmen the responsibility of using them. "Neglect to observe" does not import any element of wilfulness: mere non-observance is "neglect" within the section, and the occupier is liable unless he has recourse to the provisions of s. 141 (1), and brings the actual offender before the Court.

This was a case stated by Doncaster Justices.

An information was preferred by Henry Hawke Crosthwaite Thomas, the appellant, under section 136 of the Factory and Workshop Act, 1901, against Messrs. Thomas Bolton and Sons, Limited, the respondents, for that they, on August 16, 1927, were occupiers of a certain factory within the meaning of the Factory and Workshop Acts, 1901 to 1920, at Mersey Copper Works, Widnes, in the county of Lancaster, and that on the said day they neglected to observe a certain provision of the above Acts in that certain mill-gearing—that was to say, the coupling gear on a certain rolling mill, was not securely fenced or in such a position or of such construction as to be equally safe to every person employed or working in the factory as it would have been if it had been securely fenced, contrary to the requirements of section 10 of the Factory and Workshop Act, 1901, and that in consequence of such neglect one William Calder was killed. The information was heard on December 8, 1927, when the justices dismissed the information.

The following facts were proved or admitted:—

1. That the respondents were, on August 16, 1927, the occupiers of a certain factory within the meaning of the Factory and Workshop Acts, 1901 to 1920, and on that day certain mill-gearing—namely, a certain coupling gear on a certain rolling mill—was not securely fenced, inasmuch as a guard had not been fixed at the said mill-gearing, and in consequence one William Calder was killed.

2. That on August 16, 1927, four of the respondents' workmen were engaged at the said rolling mill, and for the purpose of setting the rollers before they were set in motion nine guards which effectually guarded the gearing when in motion had been removed, eight of which had been replaced before the rollers were set in motion, and that the said coupling gear had been in motion for about one hour when the said William Calder was killed.

3. That it was the duty of the workmen engaged in the said work, including the said William Calder, to replace the whole of the said guards in position before starting the rollers, and that owing to their neglect in not replacing one of the guards, the said William Calder, who slipped and fell, was dragged into the coupling gear, receiving injuries from which he died.

4. That the respondents had provided adequate guards for securely fencing the mill-gearing, and employed a manager over the department in which the machinery was working to supervise the work and to see that the machinery was duly fenced, and further had exhibited in the works printed notices of rules, one of which prohibited workmen from removing any guard from machinery without special instructions.

The appellant contended that due diligence had not been exercised by the respondents in seeing that the mill-gearing was fenced and that notwithstanding that the respondents had provided guards to fence the same it was incumbent on them to provide some person or persons to see that the same was securely fenced.

The respondents contended that having provided the guards for effectually fencing the mill-gearing and having placed the responsibility of seeing that the same was securely fenced when in motion on the workmen engaged thereon, and having taken all reasonable precautions to see that the said mill-gearing was adequately and securely fenced, they had not contravened section 136 of the Act. And, further, it was contended by the respondents that the appellant should have taken proceedings under section 141 (2) of the Act against the respondents' workmen.

The justices' attention was directed to the case of Groves v. Lord Wimborne (14 The Times L.R., 493; [1898] 2 Q.B., 402).

The justices being of opinion that the respondents having provided the guards necessary for effectually fencing the said mill-gearing had taken all steps that could reasonably be expected of them to see that the said mill-gearing was properly fenced and, in view of the admission of the respondents' workmen that it was the fault of the workmen employed on the said mill-gearing that the same was not fenced on the day in question whereby the said William Calder was killed, that the respondents could not be said to have contravened section 136 of the said Act, dismissed the information.

By the Factory and Workshop Act, 1901, section 10 (1) (c), "All dangerous parts of the machinery and every part of the mill-gearing must either be securely fenced, or be in such position or of such construction as to be equally safe to every person employed or working in the factory as it would be if it were securely fenced."

By section 136, "If any person is killed or dies or suffers any bodily injury or injury to health, in consequence of the occupier of a factory or workshop having neglected to observe any provision of this Act or any regulation made in pursuance of this Act, the occupier of the factory or workshop shall be liable to a fine not exceeding £100. . . ."

By section 141, "(1) Where the occupier of a factory or workshop is charged with an offence against this Act, he shall be entitled upon information duly laid by him, to have any other person whom he charges as the actual offender brought before the Court at the time appointed for hearing the charge; and if, after the commission of the offence has been proved, the occupier of the factory or workshop proves to the satisfaction of the Court—

(a) that he has used due diligence to enforce the execution of this Act; and

(b) that the said other person had committed the offence in question without his knowledge, consent, or connivance, that other person shall be summarily convicted of the offence and the occupier shall be exempt from any fine. The person so convicted shall, in the discretion of the Court, be also liable to pay any costs incidental to the proceedings.

(2) When it is made to appear to the satisfaction of an inspector at the time of discovering an offence—

(a) that the occupier of the factory or workshop has used all due diligence to enforce the execution of this Act, and

(b) by what person the offence has been committed; and

(c) that it has been committed without the knowledge, consent, or connivance of the occupier and in contravention of his orders, the inspector shall proceed against the person whom he believes to be the actual offender without first proceeding against the occupier of the factory or workshop."

Mr. Giveen appeared for the appellant; Mr. R. K. Chappell for the respondents.

Mr. Giveen contended that the obligation to fence dangerous machinery was absolute, and an employer could not be heard to say "I provided guards, and told my workmen to use them; the responsibility is theirs." If such a defence were open, no limited company could ever be convicted. The course open to the employers was to bring the workmen before the Court under section 141 (1), in which case they would escape the fine.

Mr. Chappell contended that in section 136, imposing more serious penalties for breaches of the Act resulting in death or injury, the wording had deliberately been changed from that of section 135: "If a factory or workshop is not kept in conformity with this Act." To impose the more serious penalties it was necessary to show "neglect" to observe a provision of the Act. That imported something more than mere failure or omission.

The Lord Chief Justice.—We need not trouble you, Mr. Giveen.

This is a case stated by justices. The information was preferred by the appellant against the respondents who were occupiers of a certain factory, and who neglected to observe a certain provision of the Factory and Workshop Acts "in that certain mill-gearing, that is to say, the coupling gear on a certain rolling-mill, was not securely fenced or in such a position or of such construction as to be equally safe to every person employed or working in the factory as it would have been if it had been securely fenced." The justices having heard the information dismissed it. The question for this Court is whether in so doing they came to a correct determination in point of law.

The facts may be very shortly stated. In this factory there was, among other things, a certain coupling gear on a certain rolling mill, and it is found as a fact that that was not securely fenced inasmuch as a guard had not been fixed at the said mill-gearing and in consequence one William Calder was killed. That is expressly stated in paragraph 1 of the findings of fact, but it is also found that four of the respondents' workmen were engaged at the mill, and for the purpose of setting the rollers before they were set in motion nine guards which effectually guarded the gearing when in motion had been removed, eight of which had been replaced before the rollers were set in motion, and the coupling gear had been in motion for about an hour when Calder was killed. In other words, the rollers were in motion for the space of one hour with one out of the nine guards not in position. The case goes on to say: "that it was the duty of the workmen engaged in the said work, including the said William Calder, to replace the whole of the guards in position before starting the rollers, and that owing to their neglect in not replacing one of the guards the said William Calder, who slipped and fell, was dragged into the coupling-gear, receiving injuries from which he died"; and, finally, it is found "that the respondents had provided adequate guards for securely fencing the mill-gearing and employed a manager over the department in which the machinery was working to supervise the work and to see that the machinery was duly fenced, and further had exhibited in the works printed notices of rules, one of which prohibited workmen from removing any guard from machinery without special instructions." The contention that was made below on behalf of the respondents was that they, having provided guards for effectually fencing the mill-gearing, and having placed the responsibility of seeing that the mill-gearing was securely fenced when in motion on the workmen engaged thereon—not a workman or a superintendent but "the workmen" in the plural—and having taken all reasonable precautions to see that the mill-gearing was adequately and securely fenced, had not contravened the section. The justices accepted that contention. They say they were of opinion "that the respondents having provided the guards necessary for effectually fencing the mill-gearing and having taken all steps that could reasonably be expected of them to see that the said mill-gearing was properly fenced and in view of the admission of the respondents' workmen that it was the fault of the workmen employed on the said mill-gearing that the same was not fenced on the day in question whereby William Calder was killed, the respondents could not be said to have contravened section 136 of the Act, and we therefore dismissed the information." Mr. Chappell in his ingenious argument on behalf of the respondents has laid stress on the word "neglected" in section 136 of the statute, a word which is not to be found in section 135. His argument is that section 135 deals with the case where the factory or workshop is simply not kept in conformity with the Act, whereby the employer, or the occupier, incurs or may incur certain penalties. On the other hand, section 136, which is dealing with more serious penalties in case of death or injury, uses the words "if any person is killed or dies or suffers any bodily injury or injury to health in consequence of the occupier of a factory or workshop having neglected to observe any provision of this Act or any regulation made in pursuance of this Act, the occupier of the factory or workshop shall be liable to a fine not exceeding one hundred pounds"; and the argument is that that expression "having neglected" involves of necessity some act of negligence, and that that is further to be seen by the terms of proviso (a), and of proviso (b) where one gets the somewhat different expression "the occupier shall not be liable to fine under this section if an information against him for not observing the provision or regulation to the breach of which the death or injury was attributable has been heard and dismissed." There a contrast is pointed between the phrases "not observing" or "failing to observe" or "omitting to observe" on the one hand, and, on the other hand "neglecting to observe." It seems to me that that distinction, however ingenious, is faulty, for the purposes of this statute. One begins here with a statutory duty. What, then, is meant by the proposition that somebody has neglected to observe the statutory duty? I think the words used by Mr. Justice Patteson in the case of King v. Burrell (12 Ad. and E., 460) are in point. There it was held that an overseer who neglected to sign the burgess list delivered by him under the section incurred the penalty imposed by the section although his neglect was not wilful. At page 468 Mr. Justice Patteson said this: "Then it is contended that the qualification of wilfulness must be imported into the section. Every day I see the necessity of not importing into statutes words which are not to be found there. Such a mode of interpretation only gives occasion to endless difficulties. What then is neglect? It is the omission to do some duty which the party is able to do. The defendant could have signed the list: that is not denied; but he did not sign. He has therefore neglected to sign. No discretion or option was left to him." I think, therefore, it is apparent here that the evidence was all one way. The statute says that the dangerous part of the machinery shall be securely fenced, which is quite a different thing from saying that guards shall be provided for dangerous parts of the machinery or that persons shall be appointed to see that the dangerous parts of the machinery are securely fenced. Mr. Chappell, I observe, has not seriously relied upon the other limb of the defence that, after all, these employers did appoint somebody to see that the fencing was adequate and, indeed, that the workmen themselves had ex concessis neglected that duty. If serious reliance were sought to be placed upon such a contention as that, then I think recourse should have been had to section 141. If at the time of the discovery of an offence it was not made to appear to the satisfaction of the inspector that somebody other than the occupiers of the factory was to blame, then if the occupiers desired to excuse themselves they should have had the blameworthy person brought before the Court under subsection 1 of that section; and it is to be observed that even if they had taken that course, which admittedly they did not take here, the only beneficial consequence that would have occurred to them would have been that they would have been exempt from a fine; "and if, after the commission of the offence has been proved, the occupier of the factory or workshop proves to the satisfaction of the Court—(a) that he has used due diligence to enforce the execution of this Act; and (b) that the said other person had committed the offence in question without his knowledge, consent, or connivance, that other person shall be summarily convicted of the offence and the occupier shall be exempt from any fine." No such course was taken here. The respondents produced nobody upon whom they expressly sought to put the blame. The question therefore is: Was this the consequence of a failure or omission, the same thing as neglect, to observe the provisions or one of the provisions of this statute? The answer clearly is that it was due to the failure at the critical time to have this dangerous machinery in fact securely fenced, and, the fact being that it was not securely fenced, it mattered not that somewhere upon the premises there was a guard which had been removed.

It seems to me, therefore, that these magistrates misdirected themselves in point of law, and that this appeal ought to be allowed.

MR. JUSTICE AVORY.—I am of the same opinion. I think that section 136, in using the words "having neglected to observe," is merely saying the same thing as if it had said "where the occupier has not observed the provisions of the Act" as in section 135 which provides: "If a factory is not kept in conformity with this Act, the occupier thereof shall be liable to a fine." Section 136 merely imposes additional penalties in case there has been injury to health or anybody is killed. The point taken in the case on behalf of the respondents—namely, that the informant should have taken proceedings under section 141, subsection 2, of the Act—appears also to have been misconceived, because there is no power to compel the inspector to take proceedings under section 141, subsection 2: it is only when certain things are made to appear to his satisfaction at the time of discovering the offence that it is provided that he shall proceed against the person who is believed to be the actual offender without first proceeding against the occupier of the factory; and in default of the inspector being satisfied at the time of discovering the offence that some other person is the actual offender, then it is clear that it is open to the occupier to take proceedings under subsection 1 of section 141.

In this case, therefore, it appears to me that no reliance can be placed on section 141. For these reasons I am of opinion that the magistrates ought to have convicted, the question of the penalty to be imposed being a matter entirely for them in view of the circumstances of this particular case.

MR. JUSTICE SHEARMAN.—I am of the same opinion. Section 10 (1) with its four paragraphs (a), (b), (c), and (d) imposes upon the owner or occupier of a factory the absolute obligation when there is any danger from machinery, not only to provide adequate fencing but to keep it in position during the whole of the time that the machinery is working. Then section 135 makes it an offence if the occupier does not observe that obligation. In my judgment where section 136 says: "neglected to observe" it means exactly the same thing. "Neglected to observe" and "failing to observe" and "not observing" in the case of a duty, mean exactly the same thing. I agree, as has been pointed out by my Lords, that the only protection left for the occupier against a fine is, if he can establish to the Court that there being a breach of that duty he is not responsible but somebody else is the real offender; he then has to rely upon the procedure indicated in section 141. He did not choose to rely upon it in this case, and therefore he cannot avail himself of its provisions. This matter must go down to the magistrates to convict.

IN RE FORD—EX PARTE HAWKINS.*

Bankruptcy—Goods in possession, order, or disposition of bankrupt—Goods on sale or return or on approval—Custom of antique furniture trade.

His LORDSHIP, in dismissing this motion by the trustee in the bankruptcy of Mr. Alfred Ford, a dealer in antique furniture, who carried on business at 4, Bruton-street, W., held that there was a custom in the antique furniture trade for dealers or private individuals to send goods to retailers either on sale or return, or on approval, on the terms that the property did not pass to the retailer unless and until the retailer elected to purchase them or a sale was effected to a third party.

The trustee, Mr. Ebenezer Henry Hawkins, claimed on the motion a declaration that certain goods were part of the property of the bankrupt divisible among his creditors and vested in the applicant as trustee of the property of the bankrupt on the ground (1) that the goods belonged to, or were vested in, the bankrupt at the beginning of the bankruptcy; and (2) alternatively, that the goods were, at the beginning of the bankruptcy, in the possession, order, or disposition of the bankrupt in his trade or business by the consent and permission of the true owner in such circumstances that he was the reputed owner thereof. The trustee asked for an order that the respondents, Restall, Brown and Clennell, Limited, of 103, Great Russell-street, W.C., should deliver up the goods to him as trustee.

The respondents, who were manufacturers of English period furniture and general dealers in antiques, had supplied the bankrupt with goods on approval. As soon as they received notice of the bankruptcy they claimed the goods which had been sent on approval, alleging that, by a custom of the trade, the goods did not pass to the retailer until he purchased them or sold them, and that any person who might lend money to the bankrupt on the faith of the display of goods in his shop ought to find out that such was the custom of the trade.

Mr. Edward Clayton, K.C., and Mr. J. Flowers appeared for the trustee; Mr. Schiller, K.C., and Mr. W. N. Stable for the respondents.

Evidence was called as to the existence of the custom.

MR. JUSTICE CLAUSON said that, in view of the evidence, he must hold that the custom of the trade had been proved, and that the motion must be dismissed, with costs.

K.B. Div. (Wright, J.) 1928. June 20.

JAMES FINLAY AND CO., LIMITED v. KWIK HOO TONG HANDEL MAATSCHAPPIJ.*

Contract—Sale of goods—C.i.f. contract—Resale by buyers—Bill of lading—Date of shipment incorrectly stated—Repudiation by sub-purchasers—Measure of damages payable by vendors to original buyers.

In 1920 the plaintiffs bought from the defendants a quantity of sugar in Java, the sale being c.i.f. Bombay, and shipment was to be made in September, 1920. The sugar was not loaded on the steamer till October. The bill of lading, which was dated September 30, stated that the sugar had been shipped, and the plaintiffs, being unaware of the true facts, took up the shipping documents on presentation and paid the price. The plaintiffs then resold part of the sugar by a contract which stated that the bill of lading should be conclusive evidence of the date of shipment. The market was falling, and the sub-purchasers, having discovered that the sugar was not of September shipment, refused to carry out their contract, and the plaintiffs sold the sugar by auction at a lower price. In an action by the plaintiffs against the defendants for breach of contract,

Held, that it was an implied condition of the contract that the bill of lading should correctly state the date of shipment, and the plaintiffs were not bound to enforce against their sub-buyers a statement which they (the plaintiffs) knew to be untrue, and the measure of the damages to which the plaintiffs were entitled was the difference between the contract price which they had paid on taking delivery and the market price of the sugar.

This dispute between buyers and sellers raised questions as to the right construction of certain contracts and as to the proper measure of damages for breach of contract.

Mr. Le Quesne, K.C., and Mr. Somervell appeared for the plaintiffs; Mr. Jowitt, K.C., and Mr. van den Berg for the defendants.

Mr. LE QUESNE, in opening the case, said that early in 1920 three contracts were made between the parties for the purchase and sale of sugar in Java. The sales were c.i.f. Bombay and shipment was to be made of stated quantities during July, August, and September. The July and August shipments took place as required, and no question arose as to them; but the September shipment was not in fact made in September, although the bill of lading was dated September 30.

The documents were presented to the plaintiffs in due course, and believing them to be in order they took them up and paid the price. They had resold part of the sugar to Indian purchasers; but those purchasers discovered that the sugar was not, as it was described to be, of September shipment, and refused to carry out their contract. If the plaintiffs had known the true facts they would not have accepted the sugar and would not have parted with their money. They now brought an action for breach of contract, and the question was what was the proper measure of damages.

The defendants had put in a defence denying the plaintiffs' allegations. They also contended that on the true construction of the contract the sugar had been shipped in September as required; for it had been put into lighters even if it had not actually been loaded on to the steamer in that month. Alternatively, they pleaded that the loading actually began on September 30 and was finished in October, and that there was a custom of the port that goods the loading of which had begun in a particular month were considered goods of that month's shipment, even if the loading were not completed until a later month.

The contract for sub-sale contained a clause as follows:—

"7. The bill or bills of lading shall be conclusive evidence of the date of shipment."

The bill of lading began:—

"Shipped in good order and condition by N. V. Kwik Hoo Tong Handel Mij. on board the steamship Sealda, lying in the port of Cheribon for carriage to Bombay. . . ."

At the end of the bill of lading were the words: "Dated at Samarang this 30th day of September, 1920."

Evidence which had been taken on commission was read, and a witness was called who said that the plaintiffs had had no reason to doubt the correctness of the bill of lading, and that they had accepted the date in it as correct. The market was falling at the time, and if they had known that the statement that shipment had been made in September was incorrect they would have refused to accept delivery of the sugar. When they did find out the truth it was impossible to obtain in the market sugar which would comply with the description in their contract with their sub-buyers.

Cross-examined, he said that as the contract with the sub-buyers provided that the statement as to date in the bill of lading should be conclusive, the sub-buyers could not have disputed their liability. But as soon as the plaintiffs discovered that the date was in fact wrong they did not press their claim against the sub-buyers because they did not think it right to do so. The question whether the sub-buyers were or were not solvent had nothing to do with their decision.

Mr. JOWITT proceeded to cross-examine with reference to the alleged custom, and MR. JUSTICE WRIGHT allowed an amendment of the pleadings, as follows:—

"By the custom of the port of loading, should a steamer which has contracted to take cargo for shipment during a particular month arrive at the loading port at which such cargo has been declared ready for shipment by the shippers at any date during the month, and the cargo to be loaded on such steamer is ready in lighters during the month and loading takes place within a reasonable time after the vessel's arrival, then notwithstanding that such cargo may not be loaded during the contract month it is accepted that the shipper fulfils his engagement in respect to the shipment period, and therefore all bills of lading for the cargo may bear the date of the month of the contract notwithstanding the fact that the steamer may not have loaded during such month."

The witness said that he had never heard of such a custom.

Mr. LE QUESNE submitted that the first question for consideration was what was the law which governed this contract. That question had really been settled by the House of Lords in earlier proceedings in this case ([1927] A.C., 604), and the law applicable must be English: Dicey, Conflict of Laws, 4th Ed., page 628; Jones v. Oceanic Steam Navigation Company (40 The Times L.R., 847; [1924] 2 K.B., 730, at p. 733). Whether the shipment was made in time must therefore be decided by English law. Even if, as was contended, the law of Java applied, the result would be the same, for the expert lawyers called on commission had stated that, by Java law, if a custom contradicted the provisions of a contract the contract must prevail.

As to the custom, the evidence failed to establish it, either as originally pleaded or as now stated in the amendment. It had been shown that the steamer arrived on September 30, and was ready to begin loading at 1.30 that afternoon, and could have loaded the whole of the sugar before midnight on that day. But the sellers did not load, and apparently had not even put the sugar into lighters within the required time. The inference must be that in fact they had not the sugar ready. Whether the custom existed or not was, therefore, immaterial. Also, the buyers did not know of the existence of the alleged custom, and were consequently not bound by it, even if it existed. Kirchner v. Venus (12 Moore P.C., 361, at p. 399); Robinson v. Mollett (L.R., 7 H.L., 802, at p. 838); Scrutton on Charterparties, 12th Edn., pp. 30-31; Bowes v. Shand (2 App. Cas., 455, at pp. 464, 473, and 480).

As to damages, the plaintiffs were entitled to recover the money which they had paid for the sugar as money paid under a mistake of fact induced by the sellers. They paid on documents presented by the sellers, and they were not prevented from recovering the money, less the value of the goods actually received, by the fact that they could not now return the goods. (Smith's Leading Cases, 12th Edn., 430; Durrant v. Ecclesiastical Commissioners, 6 Q.B.D., 234). Alternatively, they were entitled to the difference between the contract price and the market price, which was all that they could have realized. There was an implied term in contracts of sale that the date on a bill of lading should be correct. (United Baltic Corporation case, 8 Ll.L., 190; Suzuki v. Burgett, 10 Ll.L., at p. 225). And as a third point he submitted alternatively that the plaintiffs were entitled to the difference between the sum which they would have received from their sub-buyers if the subsale had been completed and the sum which they actually received on selling the goods which they had received from the sellers. On the sub-buyers' refusing to accept, the plaintiffs disposed of the goods by auction, and the sum realized was much less than that which the sub-buyers had agreed to pay. When the plaintiffs first discovered that the sellers had not complied with the contract there were no goods of the contract description obtainable in the market which the plaintiffs could have supplied to their sub-buyers.

It was contended that the clause in the sub-contract, saying that the date stated in the bill of lading was conclusive, enabled the plaintiffs to insist that the sub-buyers should accept the goods whatever the actual date of shipment. If that was so, as the plaintiffs were bound to minimize the damages against the sellers, they would be obliged to take the point against the sub-buyers. But that was not the right construction of the clause; it could not force a buyer to accept something which he had not bought, Vigers v. Sanderson (17 The Times L.R., 316 ; [1901] 1 Q.B., 608, at p. 610-11).

Mr. VAN DEN BERG, for the defendants, submitted that there were two questions:—(1) Whether there was any breach of contract at all ; and (2), if so, whether the damages were more than nominal. He contended that on the evidence there was no breach.

MR. JUSTICE WRIGHT said that he found as a fact that none of the sugar was loaded in September.

Mr. VAN DEN BERG said that it was necessary to consider the meaning of the word "shipment" ; at the port the practice was that the bill of lading might be dated for a particular month provided that during that month the goods had been put into lighters. It was not necessary that they should actually be put on board the steamer. The plaintiffs were aware of the practice, and so were all the material parties in the case. The law of Java should be enforced by the English Court in this contract (Chatenay v. Brazilian Submarine Telegraph Company, Limited ; 7 The Times L.R., 1 ; [1891] 1 Q.B., 79, at p. 82), and by the law of Java the plaintiffs would be bound by any custom which was material, whether they knew of it or not.

On the question of damages, he submitted that if the plaintiffs were to recover damages at all they should only be nominal. So far as the plaintiffs' claim for the loss of profit on their sub-sale was concerned, he submitted that the plaintiffs could have enforced their sub-sale because the sub-sale contract expressly provided that the bill of lading should be conclusive as to the date of shipment. The sub-buyers therefore could not refuse to perform their contract on the ground that the date in the bill of lading in fact turned out to be inaccurate. The clause was in perfectly unambiguous language, and the only way in which the sub-buyers could have escaped liability would have been to prove fraud on the part of the plaintiffs, and no one could suggest anything of that sort. It had long been usual in order to avoid disputes to provide expressly that a statement in a document should be conclusive. (Bowes v. Shand supra, at p. 482 ; Scrutton on Charterparties, 12th Edn., p. 73 ; Lishman v. Christie, 3 The Times L.R., 710; 19 Q.B.D., 333). So far therefore as the resale was concerned the plaintiffs had brought their loss upon themselves by not enforcing their claim against their sub-buyers. The plaintiffs said that they felt it would be discreditable after they knew the truth to insist on their rights against their sub-buyers ; but a man must be just before he was generous, and if a party could mitigate damages by insisting on his rights against other parties he was bound to insist on them. Further, there was nothing to indicate that at the time of the sale to the plaintiffs a sub-sale was in the contemplation of the parties.

The true principle on which the damages in this case should be assessed was set out in Taylor v. Bank of Athens (27 Com. Cas., 142). The value of the goods was the same whether the shipment was actually made in September or in October, and the damages must, therefore, be nominal.

The claim as for money paid under a mistake of fact must fail, because, apart from fraud, such a claim could only succeed where there had been a total absence of consideration, and here the plaintiffs had accepted the goods and dealt with part of them by way of resale. Moreover, on the facts, there really was no payment under mistake of fact ; the plaintiffs' local agents who actually made the payment knew all the circumstances. There was no duty on the seller under a c.i.f. contract to tender accurate documents, apart from fraud.

Mr. LE QUESNE replied, and at the conclusion of the argument judgment was reserved.

MR. JUSTICE WRIGHT delivered the following considered judgment :—The plaintiffs in this case are a company carrying on business as merchants in India and elsewhere, having a house in London, and the defendants are merchants in Java, dealing in particular in the sale and shipment of sugar from Java.

The plaintiffs claim damages for breach of three contracts for the sale of sugar. These contracts were dated in January and February of 1920. The first was January 30, 1920, the second February 2, 1920, and the third February 24, 1920. They were all made at Samarang through the intervention of a broker called R. Butterworth. The contracts were c.i.f. contracts ; each contract was for 300 tons of white Java sugar of a specified quality, and the defendants as sellers contracted to sell and deliver this sugar at various prices. According to the first contract the price was 76s. 3d. a cwt. ; according to the second the price was 76s. 10½d. a cwt. ; and according to the third contract 79s. 9d. a cwt., cost, insurance and freight, Bombay. Shipment was to be during the months of July, August, and September, 1920—100 tons monthly in each of those months. As to payment, it was provided : "Buyers are to open a credit (or credits) on Messrs. James Finlay and Co., Limited, London, which credit is to be confirmed by the Bank at buyers' expense by cable, if necessary, and the sellers or their agents are to draw thereunder in three months' sight drafts, for the due payment of which drafts at maturity the buyers remain responsible."

The portions of these contracts which are here in question are the 100 tons under each of the contracts which the contracts provide shall be for shipment during September of 1920. The defendants, in their ordinary course of business as merchants, made three sub-contracts with certain buyers in Bombay. These contracts were also c.i.f. contracts, and they provided for shipment in July, August, and September, equally, at various prices in Bombay, the prices being slightly higher than the prices in the contract between the plaintiffs and the defendants, and in respect of those sub-contracts there was appropriated by the plaintiffs to the contracts between them and the defendants the quantity of 150 tons.

I need not refer in detail to the terms of those sub-contracts, with this exception, that under clause 7, which is identical in each of these contracts, it is provided that "The bill or bills of lading shall be conclusive evidence of the date of shipment." Under these contracts the defendants, who had duly delivered the July and August instalments, took steps with reference to the third instalment—that is the September instalment, which is the one in question—and they arranged to ship the sugar from a port called Cheribon in Java by the steamship Sealda, a vessel of about 8,000 tons belonging to the British India Steam Navigation Company.

The first question of fact which I have to determine is whether any of the 300 tons of sugar was actually shipped in the month of September. On that the defendants, while objecting to the admissibility of the log-book in evidence, strenuously contended that I ought to accept in evidence certain documents which I shall refer to a little more in detail later, which they said evidenced the shipment of the 300 tons in September.

I was not, however, left merely to decide this question on the documentary evidence, because the plaintiffs called as a witness the captain of the Sealda, who had retired from the sea, a gentleman called Captain Holyoak. He gave evidence as to his arrival at Cheribon, and as to what happened when he did arrive at Cheribon. His evidence convinced me that no cargo was in fact loaded on September 30 at Cheribon, and that, therefore, none of the contract goods were shipped in September. He had a quite clear and specific recollection of what had happened. He stated that the ship arrived in the roads at Cheribon about half-past 1 on the afternoon of September 30 ; that the ship lay out in the roads about a mile and a half from the shore at the usual anchorage ; that he was ready to receive cargo as soon as he arrived, but that he received no cargo on that day. He did not go ashore himself that day, and no launch came from the shore to him until the evening, when a launch came with the stevedores' men, and he said that no cargo was loaded until 7 o'clock in the morning of the following day, October 1, and that the loading went on thereafter and during October 1 and 2, and that the ship sailed on October 3. I accept that evidence. I am perfectly satisfied that he is a witness of truth, and that he is speaking from independent recollection ; and he seemed to be somewhat annoyed at having been compelled to proceed with some speed down the coast in order to reach Cheribon on September 30 in time, and then to have wasted the rest of the day without loading any cargo. I find, therefore, as a fact, that the 300 tons which were tendered by the defendants as under this contract were not a September shipment, and so far were not in accordance with the contract.

The defendants asked me to rely on certain documents. They were the mate's receipts, which were dated September 30. How the mate, who was well spoken of by the captain, came to sign documents which, although they do not state a date of shipment, may anyhow be construed, and would naturally be construed, as evidence of shipment by September 30, I do not know and I do not further conjecture. The other documents relied on by the defendants were certain Customs documents called certificates of origin, which were documents to be delivered, and which were in fact delivered as part of the documents against which payment was required, and these documents also purported to show a shipment on September 30. I do not, however, find myself able to attach any evidential value to those documents. They are apparently prepared by the Customs authority on the basis of boat notes which are endorsed by the shipper, and the Customs do not take any part in or exercise any personal oversight over the act of shipment ; they simply act in effect on information obtained from the shipper. There is also, of course, a most important document to be considered : that is the bill of lading. The bills of lading have been produced ; they are signed by the agents for the ship, Messrs. McNeill, who fill various capacities at the port of Samarang—they had not a branch at the actual port of shipment, Cheribon—and these bills of lading are "shipped" bills of lading. They bear date at Samarang September 30, 1920, and they purport to show this: "Shipped in good order and condition by the defendants on board the steamship Sealda lying in the port of Cheribon for carriage to Bombay." Then they set out the particulars of the voyage and the character of the sugar, and they are on the form of the British India Steam Navigation Company, Limited, and must have been filled up by the ship's agents, Messrs. McNeill and Co., at Samarang. In view of the fact that I am satisfied that the shipment did not take place until after September 30, I can only regard all these documents as false, incorrect and inaccurate documents.

The contract, as I have stated, provided for the opening of a credit. The plaintiffs, a concern of very high financial standing, were not in fact asked to open, and did not in fact open, a credit in respect of the first two shipments; it was not until the end of September that they were asked to cable a credit, and that they did by a cable, which was sent on September 30 and addressed to the brokers, Messrs. Butterworth, at Samarang, guaranteeing acceptance at three months of the drafts in respect of the sugar contracts, and duplicate documents to be attached to the drafts. The method which was adopted was that the drafts were accordingly drawn; they were drawn by the defendants payable to the Hongkong and Shanghai Banking Corporation, whose agents, Messrs. McNeill, also were at Samarang. They are dated September 30, 1920; they cover the total amount of the contract price, they are addressed to Messrs. James Finlay and Co., Limited, London, and they refer severally to the appropriate quantity of sugar as shipped per the steamship Sealda from Cheribon to Bombay against the specified contracts, and they purport to be drawn under a telegraphic credit dated London, September 30, 1920.

The course of business was, as I have said, to attach to these drafts one set of shipping documents, the bills of lading, the policies and the other documents, and to send the remaining copies of the relevant documents to the plaintiffs' house at Bombay in order to enable them to obtain delivery of the goods on arrival.

No question arises as to any delay in cabling the credit. It is quite clear, however, that the drafts cannot have been drawn on September 30, as they purport to have been drawn, anyhow in the form in which they now appear, because it is obvious and is certain that the cabled credit had not been received at Samarang until October 2, and the ship, as I have said, sailed on the 3rd. She arrived at Bombay on November 9, the documents addressed to Bombay having arrived there some days before—about October 25—and the discharge immediately commenced and was finished on November 15. I gather that the drafts with the accompanying documents which had been sent to London had been discounted with the Hongkong and Shanghai Banking Corporation—that seems to be assumed—and reached London in November, and were duly presented by the Bank to the plaintiffs' house in London with the accompanying documents. They were accepted accordingly on November 12, 1920, and payment was due on February 15, 1921.

The discharge having been completed, the next thing that happened was that the sub-buyers began to raise objections to the goods, alleging that they were not satisfied that the goods which were tendered were a September shipment. As it turns out, they were perfectly right, although how they ascertained it is not clear. The market had fallen very considerably, and buyers would, in cases such as that, naturally be prepared to exercise their legal right, and would certainly not be too willing to accept a shipment which did not correspond to the contract, and which they were not bound to accept.

The sub-buyers accordingly persisted in these objections. The plaintiffs, however, who had no reason to suspect the accuracy of the documents, pressed them to take delivery, and, indeed, exercising the right which they had under the sub-contracts, sold the goods by auction early in December. The amount realized by that sale appears on the sale account. It was very substantially less than the amount payable under the contract, and the actual figures which I have are limited to some 250 tons, because in this action, for some reason, the plaintiffs are only claiming damages in respect of 250 tons and not in respect of the whole 300 tons. The difference between the contract price for the 250 tons and the value of the goods as realized on the auction sale is this: the contract price between the plaintiffs and the defendants was £19,481 17s. 6d., and the amount realized for the 250 tons at the auction sale was £10,064 9s. 3d., showing a difference of £9,417 8s. 3d.

Mr. Geddes, the Bombay manager of the plaintiffs, gave evidence as to market prices and values, and there is no other evidence before me. I accept his evidence; he is a witness of very high standing. He says that the amount realized at the auction represents the fair market price of that sugar, whether taken at the actual date of the auction early in December, or at a date in November when the cargo was discharged.

So things remained for some time, the plaintiffs pressing the sub-buyers to take delivery, and at the same time making inquiries from the brokers in Java —Messrs. Butterworth—as to the facts of the shipment, and being assured that the shipment was in order. In February, 1922, however, they came to the conclusion from information which they had received that the shipment was not a September shipment. They accordingly served a notice of arbitration upon the defendants, because the contracts contained an arbitration clause. The importance of that arbitration clause is that it carries with it the result that the contract must be construed by English law. The clause is in these terms: "Any dispute arising out of this contract is to be settled by arbitration of London brokers in the usual manner, and this submission may be made a rule of the High Court of Justice or any Division thereof."

It was held in the House of Lords in the somewhat prolonged proceedings between the parties in this case ([1927] A.C., 604), that the contracts in question must be construed according to English law. There is a qualification attached to that which does not seem to me to be material for any purpose in this case.

The arbitration resulted in an award dated January 18, 1923. That award was ultimately set aside by a judgment of the Divisional Court dated November 22, 1923. Thereupon the plaintiffs and the defendants agreed that the matter in dispute between them, namely, whether the defendants had fulfilled their contracts by making a good tender, or whether the plaintiffs were not entitled to damages or compensation for breach of contract, should be determined by an action in the Courts, the arbitration clause being waived. That action was limited to the 150 tons, part of the 300 tons, which was alone relevant to the sub-contracts. After the writ was issued it was desired by the plaintiffs to include in the action 100 tons, leaving out 50 tons for some reason which was not material. The result of that was that leave had to be obtained to serve an amended pleading out of the jurisdiction. That led to the matter going to the House of Lords in the case to which I have already referred, where the House of Lords affirmed the order of the Courts below, giving leave to serve out of the jurisdiction on the ground I have stated, that the contract was a contract to be construed by English law.

Then further delays arose because the defendants obtained an order for a commission to Java to take evidence. The main, if not the sole, ground of that commission was an allegation by the defendants that, though the shipment was not made in September, they were still entitled to maintain that they had fulfilled their contract by reason of a custom. That custom, as alleged originally in the pleadings delivered on February 11, 1926, was alleged in these terms: "By the custom of the port of loading should a steamer which has contracted to take cargo for shipment during a particular month arrive at the loading port at which such cargo has been declared ready for shipment by the shippers at any date during the month, and shipment of such cargo commences during the month and continues the work of loading till complete, it is accepted that the shipper fulfils his engagement in respect to the shipment period, and therefore all bills of lading for the cargo may bear the date of the month on the contract notwithstanding the fact that the steamer may not have completed the loading of the cargo by the last day of that month." Then there is a further allegation that, "By the law of Java the said custom is binding on the plaintiffs." I need not consider that custom so alleged any further, because on the second day of the trial, when it became clear that the loading by the Sealda of these parcels had not commenced at all in the month of September, the defendants asked leave, which I granted, to amend their pleadings. Thereupon the custom appeared under a different guise, and in these terms: "Further, or in the alternative, by the custom of the port of loading, should a steamer which has contracted to take cargo for shipment during a particular month arrive at the loading port at which such cargo has been declared ready for shipment by the shippers, at any date during the month and the cargo to be loaded on such steamer is ready in lighters during the month and loading takes place within a reasonable time after the vessel's arrival, then, notwithstanding that such cargo may not be loaded during the contract month, it is accepted that the shipper fulfils his engagement in respect to the shipment period, and therefore all bills of lading for the cargo may bear the date of the month on the contract, notwithstanding the fact that the steamer may not have loaded during such month"; and then: "By the law of Java the said custom is binding on the plaintiffs." That is a somewhat extraordinary custom. The bills of lading in question to which it is said the custom applies are bills of lading which state in terms, according to their obvious tenor, that the cargo was shipped on or before the date of the bill of lading—that is, on or before September 30—and the custom apparently is that notwithstanding the form of the bill of lading it is a perfectly good bill of lading, though it purports to state that the cargo was loaded in September, whereas in fact no such cargo was loaded at all in September.

A good deal of evidence, however, was given on commission. I have read that evidence with some regret. The evidence is confused, obscure and conflicting, and it conveys to my mind an impression that neither the witnesses nor those who conducted the inquiry had any clear conception of what was meant by "custom," or what custom they were seeking to eestablish, or how a custom can or should be established. I do not intend to deal with the evidence in detail. It is enough for me to say that I am quite satisfied that the amended custom has not been proved, and the defence based on any such custom is, I think, not made out. In any case, by English law, which, I think, is the relevant law, and so far as I can follow the evidence, by Java law, if it applies at all, such custom would not receive effect, as being contrary to the express terms of the contract. There is some suggestion also that a mate's receipt or a bill of lading stating that the goods have been shipped on the vessel in terms can be properly given in respect of the goods if they have been merely delivered into lighters; that, again, would be, if a custom or practice were established at all, which, I think, it is not, contradicting the terms of the actual documents, and, I think, would not receive legal effect. But no such custom or practice, in my judgment, is established, nor indeed is it established in fact that these 300 tons of sugar were in lighters at any time in the month of September. So far as I have been able to ascertain from the difficult and voluminous evidence, all that happens in practice has been that ships' agents in Java have been induced, by receiving letters of guarantee, to sign bills of lading bearing a false date of shipment. They may have thought that the letter of guarantee or indemnity was a sufficient protection for them, and may not have felt any conscientious scruples. What those responsible for the conduct of the affairs of the British India Steam Navigation Company would have thought of such proceedings, I do not stop to inquire.

The only other fact I need mention is that it appears that this practice, or custom, whatever it was, was abolished or discontinued some time in 1921, apparently because the banks, or the American banks, had become aware of it and had protested with that effectiveness which banks can exercise. I find that the parcel of sugar in question was not shipped in September, and that no custom has been established. That being so, there is a default on the part of the defendants, because they have not fulfilled their contract.

As I have held that the defendants have broken their contract, I have to consider what are the damages which the plaintiffs ought to recover. The defendants' case is that the plaintiffs cannot recover more than nominal damages. They contended that the plaintiffs having accepted the sugar in question and disposed of it cannot reject it, and the only relevant consideration is that the market value of the sugar, considered simply as sugar solely from the standpoint of quality, was in no way affected by the breach of contract. The plaintiffs contended that even if that were a true argument on the limited question of a failure to deliver goods answering to the contract description, there were other relevant and vital considerations, which I now consider. A c.i.f. contract, such as those in question, is a contract for the sale and delivery of goods which must be shipped as called for by the contract description, but it is also a sale of documented goods. The c.i.f. seller is bound to procure and tender to the buyer shipping documents, that is, in particular, a bill of lading which will, among other things, show the date of shipment, that being a condition of the contract. In my judgment it is an implied condition of the contract that the bill of lading so to be tendered shall be a true and accurate document and correctly state the date of shipment. Such a condition seems to me to be absolutely necessary to give to the transaction such business efficacy as the parties must have intended. It is on the faith of the bill of lading that the buyer is called upon to pay the price if he has to pay cash against documents, or to make himself liable for the price if he has opened a credit or otherwise agreed to give his acceptance against documents, and it is on the faith of the bill of lading that he accepts the goods, so far as the essential fact of shipment date is concerned. He is, indeed, entitled to a reasonable time to inspect the goods after discharge from the ship, but he has, as a rule, no independent means of checking the accuracy of the bill of lading date, at least in any reasonable time, or before he has so acted as to have accepted the goods. In any case the buyer is, I think, entitled to rely on the accuracy of the bill of lading date, and to regard the seller as impliedly guaranteeing its accuracy, unless there are express terms in the contract to the contrary. If that were not so, the buyer would in most cases be left without any effective remedy in respect of most serious losses sustained by him through misdated bills of lading. There may be no difference in market value (quality being identical) between an October and a September shipment, and if the goods only are looked at and their actual quality, it may be said that the buyer has not suffered damage and is only entitled to nominal damages, as the defendants say here. But I think such a view has little regard to the business realities of the position. The buyer under such a contract as those in question has the right to reject the tender of documents and refuse to pay the cash or accept the draft, if the shipment is not made in the contract month. The effect of misdating the bill of lading is to deprive him of that right by rendering its exercise impossible, if he relies, as in practice he generally must rely, and in law is entitled to rely, on the accuracy of the bill of lading date. He takes delivery of the goods and pays for them because on the face of the bill of lading he is bound to do so under the contract, whereas if the bill of lading showed because it was a true bill of lading that the sellers could not enforce the contract, because the shipment was out of date, the buyer could and would refuse the tender and could obtain the same goods at their market price, which I assume to be lower than the contract price, that is, at a great saving to himself. Mr. Geddes, the plaintiffs' Bombay manager, in evidence, which evidence I accept, said that if the bill of lading had borne an October date he would have stopped payment or acceptance of the draft by cabling to the London office, and would not have taken up the sugar, because it was not in accordance with the contract. In the same way the manager of the plaintiffs' London office said that before accepting the drafts they would look at the documents to see if they corresponded. In such a case the difference between the market price and the contract price, the latter being higher than the former, represents, in my judgment, the measure of damages in favour of the buyer for breach by the seller of his obligation to deliver a correct bill of lading. The obligation is in its nature, I think, a condition, and if the breach were known in time the buyer could reject the documents; but from its very nature the breach is often only ascertainable when it is too late to reject the documents or treat the contract as repudiated, and no remedy is possible to the buyer except a claim for damages, as on the footing of a breach of warranty. The measure of damages in such a case, in my judgment, is that which I have explained, and it seems to me exactly to fall within the language of section 51, subsection 2, of the Sale of Goods Act, 1893, namely, "the estimated loss directly and naturally resulting in the ordinary course of events from the seller's breach of contract." I apply once more the language of Lord Justice Fry, recently quoted by Lord Dunedin in Hall v. Pim (30 Lloyd's List, 159, at page 161), from Hammond and Company v. Bussey (4 The Times L.R., 95; 20 Q.B.D., 79, at page 100));

"What may the Court reasonably suppose to have been in the contemplation of the parties as the probable result of a breach of the contract, assuming the parties to have applied their minds to the contingency of there being such a breach?" In the present case it seems to me clear that the parties must have contemplated that the buyers would, by taking up the documents and accepting the goods on the faith that they were bound to do so, pay the higher contract price and lose their right to reject and suffer damage accordingly.

I may add that where the sellers are shippers it is almost inconceivable that such a breach of contract can be other than designed by them, since only the sellers in such a case have any motive to procure from the ship the misdating of the bill of lading, which can scarcely be accidental. I do not deal with the case on the basis of fraud since fraud is not alleged, but I must not be taken to agree with the contention that the defendants must be deemed to have acted in good faith on the basis of an alleged custom or practice, about which I have expressed my opinion. Nor can I attach any weight to the contention that the incorrectness of the date is a technical breach, since the sugar is the same sugar whether shipped on September 30 or October 1. In a business sense it is not the same; the date of shipment is of primary commercial importance; on it, in any case, depends the legal position of the parties, since the date of shipment is a condition of the contract (Bowes v. Shand, 2 App. Cas., 455) and on that legal position depend serious financial consequences.

As I have not been referred to any express decision on the point, I have to decide the question on principle. Taylor v. Bank of Athens (27 Com. Cas., 142) has given me no guidance, because Mr. Justice McCardie there had merely to decide a limited question put before him in a special case stated by arbitrators, in which the only question was whether the sellers committed a breach of contract in not shipping the goods within the proper period. No question was there raised as to the breach of contract in not tendering correctly dated documents.

The high standard of correctness which is almost universally, as I am convinced, observed all over the world in the dating of bills of lading is a matter of the utmost commercial importance, and I should be sorry to think that it can be departed from with impunity.

The defendants also raise another point as regards the 150 tons which were resold on the contract above referred to, namely, that the plaintiffs suffered no damage, because by reason of clause 7 in that contract they were entitled to force the goods on the buyers even after they ascertained that the bill of lading dates were not correct, and hence could have recouped themselves for the money they had paid on the misdated bills of lading. That contention assumes that the sub-buyers were solvent, of which no evidence is forthcoming, but where the proper measure of damages has been prima facie established, it is for the "defendant to show circumstances that would entitle him to a mitigation" (Roper v. Johnson, L.R., 8 C.P., 167). But there is a wider objection. No doubt a plaintiff is bound to take steps to minimize damages, but that doctrine must be construed reasonably. The principle is thus stated by Lord Haldane (Lord Chancellor) in the British Westinghouse case ([1912] A.C. 673, at page 689): "The fundamental basis is thus compensation for pecuniary loss naturally flowing from the breach; but this first principle is qualified by a second, which imposes on a plaintiff the duty of taking all reasonable steps to mitigate the loss consequent on the breach, and debars him from claiming any part of the damage which is due to his neglect to take such steps. In the words of Lord Justice James in Dunkirk Colliery Company v. Lever (9 Ch.D., 20, at p. 25): 'The person who has broken the contract is not to be exposed to additional cost by reason of the plaintiffs not doing what they ought to have done as reasonable men, and the plaintiffs not being under any obligation to do anything otherwise than in the ordinary course of business.'"

In the present case I have had the evidence of Mr. Geddes, the manager of the plaintiffs at Bombay, a witness of the highest standing, who says that in no case would his company seek to enforce a misdated bill of lading on their buyers as soon as they knew it was incorrect. I fully accept his statement, and can appreciate not only why they would regard it as a dishonourable act, but also why it should affect their business standing in the East.

In addition I have heard arguments on both sides, though I do not think it necessary to express a final opinion, on the question whether the plaintiffs would succeed in any action against their sub-buyers. In any case the proceedings, even if successful, might be prolonged to the Privy Council through the Indian Courts, and finally fail in securing them fruits, but, on the contrary, leave the plaintiffs saddled with heavy costs. I do not think the defendants are entitled to impose on the plaintiffs this burden, or make it a condition of the recovery of damages, to which the plaintiffs are, if my judgment is right, prima facie entitled. I do not think they have sufficiently established circumstances which would entitle them to a mitigation of damages.

I think the plaintiffs are entitled to judgment for £9,417 8s. 3d., being the difference between the contract price, which they paid to the defendants, and the market value of the actual goods; that is limited to the 250 tons.

I do not deem it necessary to discuss further the two alternative forms in which the plaintiffs claim damages, namely, those set out in the first part of paragraph 7 and in paragraph 8 of the points of claim. I leave those claims, which were argued before me, undiscussed, since I decide the case in the manner I have already explained. There will, accordingly, be judgment for an amount to be fixed on the basis that I have indicated, and for costs.

THE HARKAWAY.*

Ship—Damage caused by anchor—Obstruction in fairway of navigable river—Duty to buoy or mark anchor.

Persons who drop an anchor in a navigable river, where at a certain state of the tide it will form an obstruction in the fairway, owe a duty to warn other persons navigating up and down the said river of the presence of the obstruction, by buoying or otherwise marking the same, and if they fail in that duty they render themselves liable for any damage resulting therefrom.

* Reported by A. W. Grant, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

This was an action brought by the owners of the motor-vessel Harkaway against the Associated Portland Cement Manufacturers, Limited, to recover the damage sustained by the Harkaway by running upon the anchor of the defendants' sailing barge Louisa.

The facts were shortly as follows: At about 7 p.m. on April 1, 1927, the Harkaway, a wooden motor-vessel of 27 tons gross, 53ft. 1in. in length, and drawing 4ft. 3in. forward and 5ft. 3in. aft, was proceeding up the River Medina in the Isle of Wight, bound from Cowes to Newport, Isle of Wight. The tide at the time was "lay tide"; i.e., the water was swelling in the river but not running up. The Harkaway was proceeding up in the best water and had a depth of about a foot of water under her. The defendants' sailing barge Louisa was lying aground on the east side of the river, opposite the West Medina Cement Works, to which she was bound. She was made fast by a rope from her starboard quarter to a tree on the east shore, she was heading down and across the river, and her anchor was down with the cable leading from forward right ahead. There was nobody on board the Louisa, but she was exhibiting a proper anchor light. In these circumstances when the Harkaway was passing up at a distance of about 100ft. from the Louisa she ran upon the anchor of the Louisa and sustained such damage that she sank. It was contended by the plaintiffs that the anchor of the Louisa caused an obstruction in a public navigable river and that the defendants were guilty of negligence in not buoying it or otherwise giving warning of its presence and position to those using the river.

Mr. H. C. S. Dumas appeared for the plaintiffs; Mr. Alfred T. Bucknill for the defendants.

Mr. Justice Bateson.—I have no doubt that the plaintiffs are entitled to judgment in this case. The Harkaway, a wooden vessel, belonging to the plaintiffs, of 27 tons gross, 53ft. 1in. long, with a beam of 16ft. 5in., and fitted with engines of 35 b.h.p., was coming up the River Medina in the course of a voyage from Cowes to Newport, Isle of Wight. She had some general cargo and a crew of three hands. It was a perfectly fine evening and there was not any wind. The tide was what is called "lay tide," which means that the water was swelling in the river but not running up, and this motor-boat was proceeding up on the swelling water. She was drawing 5ft. 3in. aft and 4ft. 3in. forward, and she had about a foot of water under her as she was going up river. She passed a similar but slower motor-boat going up, and the master was taking her up in the best water that he knew. He could not get farther than a little above the West Medina Cement Works, because he would not have had water, and he would have to have water there because of the obstruction caused by the mud in the river. As he was going up in the best of the water he saw the defendants' sailing barge Louisa ashore, that is to say, on the mud on his port bow. The River Medina at this place is, at low water, a mere gut-way, about 30ft. wide, and then when the tide rises to high water there is a considerable amount of water extending to some 200ft. on one side of the middle line of the river and this gut-way, and 100ft. on the other side. The master of the Harkaway was going up, using the lay tide for his boat in what was the best of the water, when suddenly he found his vessel bumping over what turned out to be the anchor of the Louisa, as to which he had had no warning of any sort at all, except that there was a chain hanging out from the bow of the Louisa on to the mud, and then presumably going on some distance. It might be 10 or 15 fathoms; it might be more; it might be less; some vessels have different lengths. It might have been in one direction, following the hawse pipe, along the mud, and it might have been in a different direction under the water, and, unless there was some indication, the master would not know where the anchor was. At any rate he would not expect to find it in the best water which he had to navigate.

In truth and in fact this anchor was sticking up out of the bed of the river, forming an obstruction in the river, either on the edge of this gut-way or just within it—in my opinion in the one position in which an anchor ought not to be from the position of the Louisa, and certainly a position in which the master of the Harkaway would not expect it to be. Having, as I say, bumped over it, his vessel having sustained considerable damage, he found when the tide had ebbed this anchor on his port quarter, about 18in. behind him, and his vessel was so injured that she sank.

These are the short facts of the case. The Louisa was on the mud, and she had a rope from her stern tied to a tree, in order to keep her from floating on to her own anchor (so the mate said), so that evidently the possibility of her slipping on to her own anchor was present in his mind. Having thus secured her, the mate and crew went away, and there was nobody on board the Louisa to warn persons coming up the river as to the position of the anchor. The Harkaway gave the Louisa a perfectly proper berth, passing at a distance which her master thought to be perfectly safe. The anchor might have been driven farther into the river subsequently, but there is evidence to show that at that time it was sufficiently projecting to catch the Harkaway in this shallow water, and in the circumstances, in my view, the case is really an undefended one.

In the olden days, from 1663 (earlier perhaps) and thereabouts, cases of this sort were quite common where light draught vessels were going about in shallow places and anchors were being used to keep them in position. It was laid down so far back as 1663, in Clarke v. Scattergood: The Warewell and the Susan (Marsden's Admiralty Cases, 243), that it was neglect to leave an anchor in a navigable river without a buoy. I think that is good sense and it has stood for several centuries. I have consulted the Elder Brethren, and they also think it good sense that if people put an anchor down in channels which are shallow at low tide, it ought to be buoyed. It is said that if a buoy had been put down, a piece of wood or a tin can, the hang of the buoy would only have been 15ft.; but it would have been sufficient to give anybody warning, and no sort of warning was given in this case. It is said that in this river buoys are not used because they get cut away by the motor-boats—but that only means that they have not strong enough moorings—and it is said that if they put out stronger moorings the motor-boats would find possibly that their propellers were cut away instead of the mooring buoys. That, however, to my mind, is no reason why the anchors should not be buoyed, or, if not, some other means of warning people should be used if anchors are put in such places as this. In my view a warning ought to have been given of this obstruction and the defendants' servants had no right to put it in a public navigable river.

Mr. Dumas said that his clients had a right to pass and repass in any navigable water without obstruction. Mr. Bucknill, in reply, said, "So they have, and my clients have a right to put an anchor down." That is so, but they have no right to obstruct, and if they do put an anchor down they ought to give a warning. In the circumstances of this case I think there was a trap, and a trap which unfortunately worked very successfully. Then Mr. Bucknill said that there was ample warning of the position of the trap; but the fact that a ship is aground 90ft. from her anchor does not show where the anchor is or where it may be; and how could the master obtain a knowledge of the actual position of the anchor from the position of the Louisa? If a person puts an anchor down in such a place as this he ought to buoy it. At low water it is necessary that he should do so or use an anchor which does not stick up. If he uses an anchor that sticks up like a spike in the river I think he must pay for any damage that results. Mr. Bucknill said that to have to buoy such anchors would put a serious burden upon the defendants' vessels. It does add a little to the care required, but the number of places in which it would be required is not great, and the time during which there is any danger from an anchor is of course very limited, and it cannot cost much properly to buoy an anchor and it certainly cannot cost much in the case of an anchor such as the one in this case.

Then it is said that no bye-law has been made with regard to this matter, but I do not think that any bye-law is required to prevent people from being negligent. That is a matter of common law. Mr. Bucknill then asked:—What is to happen when these things take place at night? When that case arises I will direct my attention to it. My attention has been called by Mr. Dumas to the case of Jolliffe v. Wallasey Local Board (L.R., 9 C.P., 62), and to the case of Harmond v. Pearson (1 Campbell, 515), in which Lord Ellenborough said: "It is a peremptory law of navigation, that when any substance is sunk in a navigable river, so as to create danger, a buoy shall be placed over it for the safety of the public. This is the proper and specific notice, which all understand and are bound to attend to." That seems to be good law fairly applicable to this case, with the exception that there Lord Ellenborough was speaking of a barge and here I am speaking of an anchor, but it seems to me that where an anchor or the fluke of an anchor sticks up out of the bottom of a channel it is perhaps more dangerous than a larger object like a barge. Although it does not cover such a wide area it might do greater damage from the sharpness of its point. Mr. Dumas also referred to Mr. Marsden's work, "Collisions at Sea" (7th Edition), where he says at page 105: "Before the days of floating docks, damage to ships by grounding upon unbuoyed anchors in the Thames and elsewhere was a very frequent cause of action. The ship whose anchor was unbuoyed was invariably found in fault." Down to the case of The Warewell and the Susan (supra) there is a series of similar cases in Admiralty from 1648 to 1840. Mr. Marsden goes on to say: "and 'ordinances' of the Admiralty—which appear to have been presentments of juries at Admiralty sessions—were issued against leaving anchors unbuoyed. In an American case, it was held that in ordinary anchorages ground it is not necessary to buoy the anchor. That is the case of Baxter v. International Contracting Company (65 Fed. Rep., 250) which Mr. Bucknill quoted to me. I have not actually got the report, but it seems that in that case the learned Judge, Mr. Justice Brown, said that it was a case which happened in an ordinary anchorage ground, and he seemed to think that it was a case of a shifted anchor and that the plaintiff had failed to make out his case; so it does not help very much in this case. Mr. Bucknill referred to Coulson and Forbes, "Law of Waters," on pages 453 and 458 with regard to rights in navigable waters, and to Attorney-General v. Wright (13 The Times L.R., 480; [1897] 2 Q.B., 318). That deals only with the right to moor in navigable rivers and about that right there is no question.

I think, in the circumstances, that the plaintiffs are entitled to succeed. There must be judgment for the plaintiffs with a reference to the Registrar to assess the damage.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL FOR ALBERTA v. ATTORNEY-GENERAL FOR CANADA.*

Canada — Alberta — Escheated lands — Bona vacantia—Title of Crown—Whether in right of Dominion or of Province—Alberta Act, 1905 (Dominion statute) (4 and 5 Edw. VII., c. 3), s. 21—Ultimate Heir Act, 1921 (Alberta statute), s. 1.

In Alberta the Crown possesses the title to escheated lands in right of the Dominion and to bona vacantia in right of the province. The Ultimate Heir Act, 1921, of the province of Alberta, so far as it affects the Crown's right to escheated lands, is ultra vires by reason of section 21 of the Alberta Act, 1905, of the Dominion Parliament.

Decision of the Supreme Court of Canada ([1927] S.C.R., 136) affirmed.

This was an appeal by the Attorney-General for Alberta from a judgment of the Supreme Court of Canada ([1927] S.C.R., 136) relating to the claim of the Dominion of Canada to the title to escheated lands and bona vacantia within the province of Alberta. There was also a cross-appeal by the Attorney-General for Canada.

Mr. O. M. Biggar, K.C. (of the Canadian Bar), and the Hon. Geoffrey Lawrence, K.C., appeared for the province of Alberta; Mr. H. P. MacMillan, K.C. (of the Scottish Bar), Mr. Theobald Mathew, and Mr. Boyd McBride (of the Canadian Bar), for the Dominion of Canada.

LORD BUCKMASTER delivered their Lordships' judgment as follows:—The questions raised on these appeals are whether the Crown possesses in the right of the Dominion of Canada the title to (1) escheated lands and (2) bona vacantia within the province of Alberta. The Supreme Court of Canada has decided the first question in the affirmative and the second in the negative. The appeal by the Attorney-General for Alberta is against this judgment on the first point and the cross-appeal of the Attorney-General for Canada upon the second.

The province of Alberta was created in pursuance of the British North America Act of 1871 by a statute of the Dominion passed in 1905 (4 and 5 Edw. VII., c. 3, called the Alberta Act). Before its constitution and apart from the effect of the Land Titles Act of 1894 there is no real dispute on this appeal as to the title of the Crown in right of the Dominion to escheated properties and bona vacantia in the territories that now form part of the province. The main features of the present dispute are, first, the effect of the Land Titles Act of 1894; secondly, that of the Alberta Act; and thirdly, whether the province had power to deal with the property in question. The actual statute by which the province has purported to exercise the rights which it claims is an Act entitled the Ultimate Heir Act, passed in 1921, the essential provision of which is section 3 (1), and is in the following terms:—

"When any person dies intestate in fact in respect of lands situate in the province of Alberta, or being domiciled in Alberta dies intestate in respect of any moveable property or chose in action, and no person or corporation is otherwise than under the provisions of this Act entitled thereto as the heir or next-of-kin of the intestate, then the latter shall be deemed to have made a duly executed and entirely valid will, devising or bequeathing such land, moveable property, or chose in action" to the body corporate known as the Governors of the University of Alberta. It is this provision that has been held ultra vires so far as it relates to lands by the Supreme Court of Canada.

The facts that have given rise to this dispute are the deaths of three persons named Wudwud, Malesko, and Stevenson, who were domiciled in the province of Alberta, and died respectively on June 24, 1918, April 24, 1921, and November 8, 1919, leaving both lands and goods without heirs or next-of-kin. The administrators of the several estates made applications to the Supreme Court of Alberta for advice as to their distribution, alleging that no heir, next-of-kin, or other person entitled to the property of the deceased had been found.

The three applications having been consolidated, the Appellate Division of the Supreme Court of Alberta, Mr. Justice Ives dissenting, declared (22 Alb. L.R., 186) the Ultimate Heir Act to be valid and to apply to the real and personal property of any intestate such as Malesko, who died after that Act came into force. In respect of the estates of Wudwud and Stevenson, who died after the constitution of the province on September 1, 1905, and before the Ultimate Heir Act came into force, the Court directed (a) that personal property was to be distributed as bona vacantia to His Majesty in the right of the province, and (b) that lands granted by the Crown after September 1, 1905, were to be distributed to His Majesty in the right of the Dominion. The Court also declared that, apart from the provisions of the Ultimate Heir Act, lands such as Stevenson's, granted before September 1, 1905, and escheating after that date, were distributable to His Majesty in the right of the province. The question of the property being chargeable with the debts of the deceased was left undecided with liberty to apply. On appeal to the Supreme Court of Canada this judgment was affirmed only as to (b) and as to the personal estate.

It follows from this statement that the Land Titles Act of 1894 first needs consideration. This Act replaced earlier legislation on the same subject and was, after the constitution of the province, repealed as to Alberta, its terms being reproduced in a provincial statute known as the Land Titles Act, 1906. It was an Act for the registration of title, and provides that a certificate of title granted in pursuance of the statute shall be conclusive evidence as against His Majesty and all persons whomsoever that the person named on such certificate is entitled to the land included therein. It also provides that upon death of the owner of any land for which a certificate has been granted, the land shall vest in the personal representative of the dead owner, who upon a memorandum of probate or letters of administration being entered in the Register shall be deemed to be the owner of the land, and by section 3 it is enacted that the land should descend to the personal representative in the same manner as personal estate and be dealt with and distributed as personal estate. The argument of the appellant upon this Act is that the ownership effected by grant from the Crown followed by registration destroys the right of the Crown to escheated lands, and, further, that in order to assimilate the descent of real and personal estate it is necessary to exclude the right of escheat. Their Lordships think that this argument cannot be sustained. There is nothing in the statute to support the theory that on the registration of the title to land for the first time the character of the tenure under which it was originally held was changed, so that in case of the Crown being the grantor the effect of the Act was to enlarge the ordinary ambit of the grant.

The reasoning of Mr. Justice Anglin, in Trusts and Guarantee Company v. The King (54 S.C.R., 107, at pp. 126 and 127) upon this point, with which their Lordships agree, renders further elaboration unnecessary.

It is obvious that the title of the personal representative can be no greater than that of the owner whose estate he holds, and the provision as to the descent of land as personal estate does not affect the question, for escheated lands have not descended, and the question whether they can be sold and used for payment of debts, which has been left open, is not material, for even if they were so liable, to the extent to which they were not needed for this purpose they would still remain the subject of escheat, and though they might have been actually converted they would for this purpose retain the quality of real property by analogy to the doctrine of Ackroyd v. Smithson (1 Bro. C.C., 503).

Turning now to the Alberta Act of 1905, it is necessary to consider this in relation to the British North America Act of 1867. This Act of 1867 united the provinces of Canada, Nova Scotia, and New Brunswick, each of which possessed separate Legislatures at the time of the Union. It divided the province of Canada into two provinces, Ontario and Quebec, and gave to each provincial Legislature the right to make laws with regard to property and civil rights within the province. By section 109 it was provided:—

"All lands, mines, minerals and royalties belonging to the several provinces of Canada, Nova Scotia, and New Brunswick at the Union, and all sums then due or payable for such lands, mines, minerals, or royalties, shall belong to the several provinces of Ontario, Quebec, Nova Scotia, and New Brunswick, in which the same are situate or arise, subject to any trusts existing in respect thereof, and to any interest other than that of the province in the same."

The territory out of which the province of Alberta is constituted was unaffected by this section and remained subject to the laws of the Parliament of Canada. It therefore followed that the province could never, apart from statute, be in the position of owning lands, mines, minerals and royalties. Section 3 of the Alberta Act of 1905, however, made the provisions of the British North America Acts applicable to the province of Alberta in the following words:—

"The provisions of the British North America Acts, 1867 to 1886, shall apply to the province of Alberta in the same way and to the like extent as they apply to the provinces heretofore comprised in the Dominion, as if the said province of Alberta had been one of the provinces originally united, except in so far as varied by this Act and except such provisions as are in terms made, or by reasonable intendment may be held to be specially applicable to or only to affect one or more and not the whole of the said provinces."

By section 21 an exception in favour of Crown lands was made in the following terms:—

"All Crown lands, mines and minerals and royalties incident thereto, and the interest of the Crown in the waters within the province under the North-West Irrigation Act, 1898, shall continue to be vested in the Crown and administered by the Government of Canada for the purposes of Canada, subject to the provisions of any Act of the Parliament of Canada with respect to road allowances and roads or trails in force immediately before the coming into force of this Act, which shall apply to the said province with the substitution therein of the said province for the North-West Territories."

"Royalties," within the meaning of section 109 of the British North America Act of 1867, have been held in the case of Attorney-General for Ontario v. Mercer (8 App. Cas. 767) to include escheats. The reasoning of that case was this: that an escheat is essentially a royalty, and the only difficulty lay in deciding whether the interposition of the words "mines and minerals" after the word "lands" was not sufficient to deprive the word "royalty" of its proper force. It was there declared that these words did not have that effect, and, in consequence, the escheated lands were included in the provisions of section 109 of the British North America Act, 1867, and belonged to the Crown in the right of the province. The difference in the language between section 21 of the Alberta Act, 1905, and section 109 of the British North America Act, 1867, is not, in their Lordships' opinion, sufficient to warrant any real distinction in effect. The royalties must in the latter, as in the former, case be taken to include escheats, and these are reserved to the Crown for the purposes of Canada. This conclusion applies to all lands whenever granted, for the argument that the royalties reserved were only those in relation to lands then held as Crown lands cannot be maintained. In the words of Mr. Justice Duff: "Crown lands, mines and minerals" does not necessarily import "lands, mines and minerals" held by the Crown in full proprietorship; it may be read as including all interests of the Crown "in lands, mines and minerals within the province," and this their Lordships think is the correct interpretation.

Considering now the case of bona vacantia, it is plain that they are unaffected by this argument. They are not incident to Crown lands, mines or minerals, and are therefore not included in the reserved property mentioned in section 21. The Attorney-General for Canada, however, argues that they cannot belong to the province, since they never had so belonged before the province was constituted, and there is nothing in the Act of 1905 to confer such a title. Their Lordships think that this argument does not do justice to the fundamental provisions of section 3 of the Alberta Act, 1905. Reading the whole Act together they regard the effect of this section as putting the province of Alberta in the same position as the other provinces in regard to property, except as varied by the statute, either by express terms or reasonable implication. Section 21 is only sensible on this hypothesis, for unless it was assumed that it was required for the purpose of preserving the Crown rights in the property to which it relates, it would be meaningless, but if that be once assumed it follows that the property to which it does not relate is vested in the Crown, not for the purposes of Canada, but for the purposes of the province of Alberta.

They therefore are of opinion that the cross-appeal of the Attorney-General for Canada fails.

There remains the question of the power of the province to affect the title to the escheated lands by virtue of its authority to make laws relating to property and civil rights within the province. This right confers no power to deal directly with public property, which is expressly reserved by section 91 (1) of the British North America Act, 1867, to the Parliament of Canada. An Act, therefore, to declare that such property should vest in his Majesty in his right of Alberta would be void. This direct attack was indeed made by the Legislature of Alberta by an Act of 1915, c. 5, which was declared to be ultra vires by a judgment of the Supreme Court in Trusts and Guarantee Company v. The King (supra). This judgment was a majority judgment, from which Mr. Justice Idington and Mr. Justice Brodeur dissented, but their Lordships think that the decision of the Supreme Court was right. The argument against the Act was most accurately stated at page 110 in the following words of Chief Justice Fitzpatrick: "Judgment for the respondent on this appeal does not involve any decision as to the right of the Legislature of the province to change the laws of inheritance. Lands escheat to the Crown for defect of heirs and this has nothing to do with the question who are a person's heirs. But altering the law of inheritance is one thing and appropriating the right of the Dominion on failure of heirs is quite another."

The Act now in dispute, passed in 1921 by the provincial Legislature, proceeded on different lines to reach the same goal. It provided that the University of Alberta should be the ultimate heir to all property where descent failed. This it is sought to justify upon the ground that the province had power to alter succession and could impinge upon the Crown rights by introducing illegitimate or adopted children into the line of succession; that as to the former this had been done, and the provision had been held valid so far as Saskatchewan was concerned, a province with similar rights to the province of Alberta, in the case of Attorney-General for Canada v. Stone ([1924] S.C.R., 682).

Their Lordships think that the conclusion in Attorney-General for Canada v. Stone (supra) may be safely accepted. The provincial Government's power to control succession may be thus exercised provided that the statute is, when fairly regarded, designed solely for this end, but when under user of this power the Legislature attempts to defeat the Crown rights expressly reserved (section 21) they have passed on to forbidden ground and cannot justify their intrusion by a colourable pretext for their acts.

The cases summarized in the judgment of Mr. Justice Duff in the case of Attorney-General for Ontario v. Reciprocal Insurers (40 The Times L.R., 273; [1924] A.C., 328, at p. 337) show that where collision between the rights of the provincial and Dominion Parliaments arises under any statute the real purpose of the Act must be regarded in forming an opinion as to the validity of the statute. To use the words of the judgment referred to: "Where the law-making authority is of a limited or qualified character, obviously it may be necessary to examine with some strictness the substance of the legislation for the purpose of determining what it is that the Legislature is really doing."

In the present case, while the University of Alberta exists, and it is to be hoped it will continue for a time that knows no measurable limit, the right of the Crown is completely defeated.

It is not by varying or extending the ordinary rules of succession that this is accomplished, but by introducing outside all natural, lawful or conventional descendants or relatives of a deceased person an entirely foreign beneficiary and one, in part, at least dependent on the provincial revenues. There is no real difference in substance, and only partially in effect, between this and the Act of 1915, and in their Lordships' opinion it is equally open to objection. For these reasons they are of opinion that the appeal must fail and both the appeal and the cross-appeal should be dismissed without costs, and they will humbly advise His Majesty accordingly.

GRAY AND OTHERS v. PERPETUAL TRUSTEE COMPANY, LIMITED, AND ANOTHER.*

Will—Mutual wills by husband and wife—Whether evidence of an agreement to constitute equitable interests.

The mere fact that two wills have been made simultaneously by husband and wife in identical terms does not of necessity imply any agreement beyond an agreement so to make them, and is no evidence of an agreement that after the death of one spouse the other will not revoke his or her will.

This was an appeal from an order of the High Court of Australia reversing a finding of the Supreme Court of New South Wales.

Mr. H. P. MacMillan, K.C. (of the Scottish Bar), and Mr. A. C. Nesbitt appeared for the appellants; Mr. Wilfrid Greene, K.C., and Mr. Louis H. Gluckstein for the second respondent, Mrs. Hudson.

LORD HALDANE delivered their Lordships' judgment as follows:—

In this case the question is whether the appellants are entitled to the reversal of a judgment of the High Court of Australia, delivered by a majority on appeal from a decision of the Supreme Court of New South Wales (Mr. Justice Harvey, Chief Judge in Equity), which was reversed by the High Court. What was held by the High Court was that Mrs. Hargrave, the testatrix in this case, was entitled to revoke her will of October 29, 1914, and to make a different will of July 18, 1923. It was further held that the latter will was a good execution of a general power of appointment contained in a settlement dated January 25, 1879, and made between her and her husband, Lawrence Hargrave, who predeceased her. The settlement was a postnuptial one, consisting entirely of the husband's property. That was vested in a trustee, (1) upon trust for such persons and purposes as the wife should, with the consent of her husband during his life and afterwards at her own discretion, by deed or will appoint; (the wife had thus, in case of her surviving her husband, an unrestricted general power of appointment); (2) upon trust for the wife for life; and after her death and in default of appointment by her, (3) upon trust for such persons and purposes as her husband should by deed or will appoint, and in default and subject thereto; (4) on trust for the husband for life and after his death; (5) on trust for the child or children of the marriage of Mr. and Mrs. Hargrave absolutely, with an ultimate trust in default of children for her husband in fee.

The trusts of this settlement are stated above in outline. The wording is quite clear. The main trust, stated more precisely, was for such ends, intents and purposes as Mrs. Hargrave, should at any time or from time to time, with the consent of her husband during his life, and after his decease at or in her uncontrolled discretion, notwithstanding any future coverture, by deed or deeds, or by will appoint, and in default of and until and subject to any and every such appointment, upon trust during her life for her separate use, and after her decease, and in default of and subject to any and every such appointment by her as aforesaid, upon such trusts as the husband should by deed or will appoint, and subject to such appointment by him as aforesaid for him during his life and after his death for the children of the marriage absolutely, and in default of such children for the husband absolutely.

No appointment by deed was made, but on October 29, 1914, the husband and wife both made wills, and these were contemporaneous. By the husband's will he left all his property, including all his "estates, real and personal," over which he had a power of appointment by virtue of the settlement of January 25, 1879, to trustees for sale, conversion and investment, and to pay the income to his wife, Margaret Hargrave, for her life, and after her death to pay such income until the death of the last of his children equally between his surviving children and the issue surviving them of those that were dead; and after the death of the last of his children the trustees were to distribute the trust funds among all the grandchildren then living per capita and not per stirpes. It must be borne in mind that the husband's power under the settlement was subordinate to that of the wife, which had been made paramount.

The will of the wife, made on the same date, was in some points different. She appointed the respondent company to be her trustee and executor. She expressly refrained from exercising the power of appointment vested in her by the settlement of 1879. She left all her real and personal estate (excluding what she could appoint under the general power just referred to, which she had declared her intention not to exercise) to her trustee, upon trust, for conversion and investment, and to pay the income to her husband for his life, and then to her children surviving her (with representation), and after the death of the last of her children to distribute the corpus among her grandchildren then living per capita, with substitution of the issue of any of them who had died before the period of distribution leaving issue.

It is clear that the general power remained intact in her, although she had not exercised it, subject, of course, to any questions to which its subsequent exercise by her might give rise. So far there was no complication. In 1915 she made a codicil leaving two annuities to be paid by her trustee out of what she had vested in the trustee by her will. In July, 1915, her husband died, and henceforward Mrs. Hargrave took the benefits conferred on her by his will. On September 15, 1919, Mrs. Hargrave made another will, in which she again expressed an intention not to exercise the general power given to her by the settlement of 1879, but gave out of her own estate annuities, including one of £250 a year to her daughter Margaret, the second respondent. For the rest this new will did not interfere materially with the provisions of the will of 1914.

But on July 18, 1923, Mrs. Hargrave made a further will, which did interfere with these provisions completely. She had moved to London, and when there by this new will she "devised and bequeathed all her real and personal estate" to her daughter the second respondent, Margaret Hudson, absolutely, and appointed her the sole executrix.

Mrs. Hargrave died in October, 1923, and letters of administration with the will annexed were granted at Sydney to the respondent company.

There is no doubt that the terms of this final will were such as to amount to an exercise of the general power conferred on Mrs. Hargrave by the settlement of 1879. It is not in controversy that, although no intention to include the exercise of the power was expressed in this will, it must be taken to have been exercised under the general words of disposition, by virtue of either section 23 of the Wills, Probate and Administration Act of New South Wales, or by virtue of section 27 of the English Wills Act, 1837, if she was domiciled at her death in England. On this assumption the will disposes of property comprised in the settlement, amounting to over £12,000.

Their Lordships have to decide two questions which have been brought before them. The first is whether the simultaneous wills of Mr. and Mrs. Hargrave were mutual wills made in such circumstances that neither the husband nor the wife could revoke or modify them without the assent of the other. The second question is whether a case of election has arisen. As to the first question, it is necessary to turn to the evidence of the circumstances in which the wills of 1914 were made. The evidence is somewhat meagre. But it appears that by September, 1914, the respondent company had been appointed sole trustee of the settlement of 1879, and that Mr. and Mrs. Hargrave went to the office of the company to express their desire that their disposable property should go in the same way among their children and grandchildren. They had then four children and two grandchildren. Mr. Bennett, an official of the respondent company, gave evidence that on September 22, 1914, Mr. and Mrs. Hargrave came to the office of the respondent company and discussed how they should make their wills so that the property disposed of should go among their children after their deaths. Mr. Bennett had no exact recollection of what passed, but he thought that something was said by Mr. Hargrave to the effect that if he made a will leaving everything to her for life, with remainder to the children for life, and then to their children, would she not do the same, and that she said she would. Mr. Douglas, another official of the company, gave evidence to much the same effect, adding that it was arranged that the husband should make an appointment of the funds in the settlement, and that his wife should by her will negative any intention on her part to exercise her power.

This last provision appears to be the result of a belief in the minds of the parties that the non-exercise by the wife of her power might effect a saving of death duty.

The Chief Judge in Equity (Mr. Justice Harvey), who tried the case, was of opinion that it could not be said that the evidence established that there was an actual bargain between the husband and the wife that they should make wills in identical terms, in the sense that each refused to make a will unless the other agreed to do so. On this point of fact Chief Justice Knox, on the appeal to the High Court, agreed with him, although he felt constrained by the authorities to dismiss the appeal. Mr. Justice Isaacs, however, took a different view and held that the arrangement made amounted to an actual agreement. He was in favour of allowing the appeal, but on different grounds. Mr. Justice Higgins held that there was no agreement to make the wills irrevocable, and was for allowing the appeal. Mr. Justice Rich held that, as the wife when she succeeded had bound herself in equity to give effect to her husband's appointment and not to exercise her own power, a ground which did not depend on the mere effect at law of the establishment of a contract such as Mr. Justice Harvey had discussed, but on equitable interests which he thought had arisen, the appeal should be dismissed. Mr. Justice Starke thought that the husband and wife were not making stipulations binding either in law or in equity, but were only settling the division of their property in the measure which seemed fair to them at the moment. He was therefore in favour of allowing the appeal.

Mr. Justice Harvey had decided for the appellants on the ground that although no binding contract was proved, still it was established by authority that where mutual wills are made by two persons as the result of some understanding or arrangement between them, this was enough, although it might not amount to a binding contract in law, to give rise to equities.

Their Lordships are in agreement with Mr. Justice Harvey and the other learned Judges in Australia who have held that no binding contract was established by the evidence. What they have to consider is the proposition as to the effect in equity laid down by Mr. Justice Harvey, as stated.

There was a particular authority which was relied on by the appellants for the proposition that if two persons simultaneously make wills to the same effect, and in that sense mutually, a second will made by one of them after succeeding to the other's estate under the originally made will, is precluded from being treated as effective to interfere in equity with the existing disposition. This authority was the well-known case of Dufour v. Pereira, decided by Lord Camden in 1769 (Dickens 419). The decision has been fully discussed in a book of authority, Hargrave's "Juridical Arguments," Vol. II., at p. 272. The volume last named contains a very full account by the learned editor of a discussion of the case in its early stages by Lord Loughborough, who in 1797 finally decided the very question in Lord Walpole v. Lord Orford (3 Ves. Jun. 402). In Dufour v. Pereira (supra) the conclusion reached was that if there was in point of fact an agreement come to that the wills should not be revoked after the death of one of the parties without mutual consent, they were binding. That they were mutual wills to the same effect was at least treated as a relevant circumstance, to be taken into account in determining whether there was such an agreement. But the mere simultaneity of the wills and the similarity of their terms do not appear, taken by themselves, to have been looked on as more than some evidence of an agreement not to revoke. The agreement, which does not restrain the legal right to revoke, was the foundation of the right in equity which might emerge, although it was a fact which had in itself to be established by evidence, and in such cases the whole of the evidence must be looked at. It was upon this ground that Lord Loughborough, in the later case of Lord Walpole v. Lord Orford (supra), dismissed the claim founded on the principle of Lord Camden's judgment, holding that no sufficiently definite agreement had been proved.

The most recent judgment on the effect of mutual wills made by husband and wife, without independent evidence of any contract, is that of Mr. Justice Astbury in In re Oldham ([1925] Ch. 75). That learned Judge subjected the authorities to a careful examination, and came to the conclusion that the mere fact that two wills were made in identical terms does not of necessity imply any agreement beyond an agreement so to make them. In the case before him he found that there was not sufficient evidence of any further agreement, and that there was in the authorities referred to in the argument nothing that constrained him to decide otherwise.

Their Lordships agree with the view taken by Mr. Justice Astbury. The case before them is one in which the evidence of an agreement, apart from that of making the wills in question, is so lacking that they are unable to come to the conclusion that an agreement to constitute equitable interests has been shown to have been made. As they have already said, the mere fact of making wills mutually is not, at least, by the law of England, evidence of such an agreement having been come to. And without such a definite agreement there can no more be a trust in equity than a right to damages at law.

This disposes of the first of the contentions which were put forward at the Bar for the appellants. The second contention was that Mrs. Hargrave was put to her election either to take under her husband's will, or to reject it if she desired to retain the general power of appointment, and that having elected to take under his will, she could not afterwards create new interests under the power which could prevail in equity. This contention is, in the opinion of their Lordships, untenable. They are unable to find language in the husband's will which either puts the wife to her election, or puts her in the position of seeking at the same time to approbate and to reprobate its provisions. The husband's will disposed of his own property and also purported to exercise his own power of appointment under the settlement. But under the settlement his power was subordinate to the paramount power of the wife, who was enabled to override everything. This paramount power the wife expressly refrains from exercising in her will of 1914. But not the less she abstained from extinguishing it, and confines the operation of her will to her own property. Their Lordships, therefore, find no reason for holding that she was in any way precluded from exercising her general power subsequently, or for doubting that in law she must be taken to have done so by her final will of 1923. This being so, there is no inconsistency, and there is no room for any question of election arising.

For these reasons they will humbly advise His Majesty that the appeal should be dismissed. They are always reluctant to give unsuccessful appellants their costs. But in this case the questions which have arisen are so obviously the result of the obscure and unusual procedure of the husband and wife in relation to the settlement of 1879, that they think that the costs of all parties as between solicitor and client should be paid out of the settled funds.

RECTOR AND CHURCHWARDENS OF ST. NICHOLAS ACONS v. LONDON COUNTY COUNCIL.*

Ecclesiastical Law—Disused churchyard—Erection of electric transformer chamber—Whether a "building"—Refusal of sanction—Disused Burial Grounds Act, 1884 (47 and 48 Vict., c. 72), s. 3.

By s. 3 of the Disused Burial Grounds Act, 1884, "After the passing of this Act it shall not be lawful to erect any buildings upon any disused burial ground, except for the purpose of enlarging a church, chapel, meeting-house, or other places of worship."

By reason of this enactment the Board refused to sanction an agreement for the construction, by an electric lighting company, of a transformer chamber in a disused churchyard, holding that the proposed structure, although not substantially raised above the ground level, would be a building "erected upon" the churchyard and therefore came within the prohibition.

In re St. Nicholas Cole Abbey ([1893] P. 58) not followed.

Decision of the Court of Arches (44 The Times L.R. 241; [1928] P. 102) affirmed.

This was an appeal by the rector and churchwardens of the parish of St. Nicholas Acons, in the City of London, against an order made on January 24, 1928, by the Dean of the Arches (44 The Times L.R. 241; [1928] P. 102) dismissing an appeal of the present appellants from an order made by the Chancellor of the Consistory Court of London refusing to decree a faculty authorizing the appellants to enter into a proposed licence agreement with the City of London Electric Lighting Company, Limited, for the purpose of granting to the company the user of further portions of the churchyard of the parish for the enlargement of an existing transformer chamber and entrance under the churchyard. The Board sat with the Archbishop of Canterbury and the Bishops of Rochester, Norwich, and Chichester as Ecclesiastical Assessors.

Mr. Stafford Cripps, K.C., Mr. G. Wightman Powers, and Mr. G. G. Honeyman appeared for the appellants; the Hon. Sir Malcolm McNaghten, K.C., and Mr. Sidney G. Turner for the respondents.

The sole question for determination in the appeal was whether the Consistory Court had jurisdiction to decree the faculty prayed in view of the provisions of section 3 of the Disused Burial Grounds Act, 1884, which are in the following terms :—

* Reported by Sir W. J. Soulsby, Barrister-at-Law.

"It shall not be lawful to erect any buildings upon any disused burial ground except for the purpose of enlarging a church, chapel, meeting-house, or other places of worship."

The churchyard of St. Nicholas Acons, situated in Nicholas-lane, in the City, was closed for burials by an Order in Council in 1854, and since that date it had been kept as a private open space enclosed by railings.

The City of London Electric Lighting Company, Limited, supplied electricity for lighting and other purposes in the City of London, and supplied the large majority of the parishioners in the parish of St. Nicholas Acons. It was stated on the part of the appellants that by a faculty under the seal of the Consistory Court of London, dated April 6, 1892, the company was granted a licence to use for a period not exceeding 21 years a portion of the ground within the churchyard at a yearly rent of £20 for the purpose of affording an entrance to the company's transformer chamber, situate in Nicholas-lane, and the company constructed the entrance and railed it in. By a further faculty granted by the Consistory Court in March, 1914, a further licence was granted to the company to use the same portion of ground for the purpose for a further period of 21 years from May 12, 1913, at the yearly rent of £30.

Faculties authorizing the user of other churchyards for similar purposes had been decreed by the Consistory Court—namely, St. Benet Sherehog, on April 6, 1892; St. Nicholas Cole Abbey, on September 2, 1892; and St. Benet Fink, on September 2, 1892. Further faculties were decreed in respect of those three churchyards on March 18, 1915, March 2, 1914, and June 28, 1915, respectively.

Relying on the validity of the faculties, the company had continued to use the transformer chambers and the entrances attached thereto from 1893 down to the present date and had planned their network of mains for distributing electricity on the faith of the faculties so granted.

To comply with the recommendations of the Electricity Commissioners and to satisfy the increasing demand for electricity, both in the parish and in the further area supplied through the existing transformer chamber, it was necessary for the company to extend the transformer chamber. As the only possible method of extension was by carrying the transformer chamber under the churchyard the company applied to the appellants for permission to use for a term not exceeding 30 years further portions of the churchyard, in addition to that covered by the two former faculties for the extension of the transformer chamber. That application by the company was considered at a meeting of the parochial church council on March 28, 1926, when it was sanctioned and approved and the appellants were requested to petition the Consistory Court of London for the necessary faculty. The application was further considered by the vestry of the parish at meetings held in April and July, 1926, and at the last meeting a resolution was passed authorizing the appellants to petition the Consistory Court of London for the necessary faculty to enable the appellants to authorize the company to carry out the proposed works.

On April 6, 1927, the appellants petitioned the Chancellor of the Consistory Court of London to decree a faculty to issue sanctioning a proposed licence agreement and authorizing it to be entered into and carried into effect. The petition came on for hearing before the Chancellor on June 25 and July 16, 1927, and evidence was adduced on behalf of the appellants to show—

"(a) That the amenities of the churchyard would not be affected, but would be improved. (b) That the rent of £150 proposed to be paid by the company was fair and reasonable. (c) That in view of the expenditure involved the proposed term of 30 years was fair and reasonable. (d) That the machinery which would be installed in the transformer chamber would be noiseless. (e) That it was impossible to enlarge the existing transformer chamber in any other direction. (f) That the area proposed to be used was the minimum consistent with an efficient supply of electricity to the parish and the rest of the area supplied from the transformer chamber. (g) That there was no trace of the names of the persons buried in the churchyard. (h) That if any human remains were found in the course of carrying out the works notice would forthwith be given to the Registrar of the Consistory Court of London, and such remains would be reverently and decently re-interred in such cemetery or place as the Court should direct."

An appearance was entered on behalf of the respondents, the London County Council, who, by virtue of the Metropolitan Board of Works (Various Powers) Act, 1885, and the Local Government Act, 1888, were the authority for enforcing the observance of the provisions of the Disused Burial Grounds Act, 1884. It was contended on their behalf that the proposed transformer chamber would constitute a building erected on a disused burial ground within the meaning of section 3 of the Disused Burial Grounds Act, 1884, and that therefore the Chancellor had no jurisdiction to decree the faculty prayed.

The appellants contended that the proposed extension of the transformer chamber would not constitute a building erected on the disused burial ground, as it would lie wholly beneath the ground (with the exception of a small ventilation shaft). It was also contended by the appellants that, in view of the decisions of the Consistory Court of London 36 years ago in the case of this and other disused burial grounds in the City of London, which decisions had never been reversed, the company had constructed sub-stations and transformer chambers, and that, if those decisions were to be reversed after so long a lapse of time, it would now be a matter of the greatest difficulty to find any alternative places available for the construction of transformer chambers in the necessary parts of the City of London, and the whole population of the City of London would suffer as a consequence.

The Chancellor delivered judgment on July 16, 1927, holding that the proposed transformer chamber would be a building erected on a disused burial ground within the meaning of the Act, and that he had no jurisdiction to decree the faculty prayed, and ordered that the petition be dismissed.

From the decision of the Chancellor the appellants appealed to the Arches Court of Canterbury, and the appeal was heard before the Dean of Arches (Sir Lewis T. Dibdin), who delivered judgment affirming the order of the Consistory Court of London and dismissing the appeal, with costs.

The appellants now appealed to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council.

It was argued in support of the appeal that the Chancellor had jurisdiction to decree the faculty as prayed, and that the proposed extension would not constitute a building erected on a disused burial ground within the meaning of the Disused Burial Grounds Act, 1884.

At the close of the arguments for the appellants,

Their LORDSHIPS did not call upon counsel for the respondents, the LORD CHANCELLOR (Lord Hailsham) saying that their Lordships would consider the advice which they would tender to his Majesty.

The LORD CHANCELLOR (Lord Hailsham) delivered the considered judgment of the Board as follows:— This is an appeal by the rector and churchwardens of the Parish of St. Nicholas Acons, in the City of London, against an order made on January 24, 1928, by the Dean of the Arches, dismissing an appeal from an order made by the Chancellor of the Consistory Court of London, and refusing to decree a faculty authorizing the appellants to enter into an agreement with the City of London Electric Lighting Company, Limited, for the construction of a transformer chamber in the churchyard of the parish. There was no opposition to the application on its merits, but the respondents, the London County Council, objected to the grant of the faculty in pursuance of their statutory duty on the ground that the proposed transformer chamber would infringe the provisions of section 3 of the Disused Burial Grounds Act, 1884, and that on that ground there was no jurisdiction to grant it.

From the evidence it appears that the parish church of St. Nicholas Acons was destroyed in the Great Fire and has never been rebuilt; and that the churchyard was closed for burials by Order in Council in the year 1854 and has since that date been kept as a private open space enclosed by railings. It further appears that the City of London Electric Lighting Company, Limited, is an electricity undertaking supplying electricity for lighting and other purposes to a large number of persons in the City. For the purpose of its undertaking the company had erected a transformer chamber in Nicholas-lane, and in the year 1892 the company was granted a licence to use a portion of the churchyard for the building of an entrance to the transformer chamber and for railing off the entrance from the rest of the churchyard. This licence was granted for a period of 21 years by virtue of a faculty decreed by Chancellor Tristram on April 6, 1892, and was renewed for a further period of 21 years by virtue of a faculty granted in March, 1914. Since the grant of the licence the use of electricity has very largely increased, and evidence was called to prove that it was essential in order to supply the public need that the transformer chamber should be enlarged and that there was no site available for the enlargement except the churchyard.

The transformer chamber which it is proposed to place in the churchyard is described in the judgment of the Chancellor as:—

"A brick-built structure with a roof of asphalt supported by wrought steel girders and by reinforced concrete. That roof is under the surface of the churchyard and the only parts of the transformer chamber which will, so to speak, emerge in the churchyard are two ventilators, which are something like nine inches above the surface of the churchyard, and they will be practically concealed from sight by certain beds of flowers which the company undertake to place there.

"So far as noise is concerned, there will be no noise connected with the machines which are used in the transformer chamber. They are, in fact, motionless machines. . . So what is contemplated is a chamber mainly under the churchyard, but with two ventilator lights just above the surface, and containing noiseless machinery, machinery which is simply used for transforming current."

The relevant section of the Disused Burial Grounds Act, 1884, is in these terms:—

"Section 3: After the passing of this Act it shall not be lawful to erect any buildings upon any disused burial ground, except for the purpose of enlarging a church, chapel, meeting-house, or other places of worship."

It was not disputed that the churchyard in question is a disused burial ground within the meaning of the Act. For the appellants it was contended that the construction of this transformer chamber would be of great public advantage; that it was so designed as not to interfere with the use of the churchyard as an open space; that the grant of the licence would add materially to the revenue of the church; and that a necessary consequence of the decision appealed against, if upheld, would be that the faculties already granted in this and other cases were ultra vires, a conclusion which might lead to much public inconvenience.

Many of these considerations are matters eminently proper to be considered by Parliament on an application to amend the law; but they can have very little relevance to the question of law which their Lordships have to determine. The first question which has to be considered is whether the proposed transformer chamber is a building. Having regard to the nature of the structure as described above, their Lordships can entertain no doubt that that question must be answered in the affirmative, and, indeed, this was not seriously contested on behalf of the appellants. But the appellants' counsel contended that even if the chamber were a building it would not be a "building erected upon" the churchyard. It was argued that this expression must be limited to buildings raised substantially above the ground level and interfering with the use of the churchyard for the purposes of an open space. In their Lordships' view the language of the statute cannot be so limited. The erection of the building is begun as soon as the foundation has been excavated, and a building is erected on the site on which it is built none the less because no part of it is raised above the ground level as existing at the date of its erection.

It was argued that this view was inconsistent with the decision of the House of Lords in the case of the Mayor of Paddington v. Attorney-General (22 The Times L.R., 55; [1906] A.C. 1). In that case the borough council sought to erect a screen in a disused burial ground to prevent adjoining houses from acquiring an easement of light. The House of Lords held that a screen erected for such a purpose would not necessarily be a building; but their Lordships find nothing in the language of the judgment to support the limited construction sought to be put on the statute by the appellants in the present case.

It was further contended for the appellants that, since faculties had been granted in the year 1892 in this and other cases, their Lordships ought to treat the law as settled by these decisions and ought not now to disturb them. The cases in which faculties were granted are reported in the Law Reports under the heading In re St. Nicholas Cole Abbey ([1893] P. 58, and in the note to that case on p. 66). These were all unopposed petitions, and in none of them was the Disused Burial Grounds Act, 1884, referred to, either in argument or in the judgment.

The Chancellor appears to have treated the grant of the licence in the case of St. Nicholas Acons as being equivalent only to the grant of an easement of a right of way, and to have held that on that ground there was jurisdiction to make the order. The question whether the entrance to the transformer chamber then sanctioned constituted a building erected on the churchyard was never discussed or decided. Their Lordships are quite unable to treat a decision, given in an unopposed case without any reference to the Act of Parliament, authorizing the grant of a licence for a limited period as a decision which determines the construction to be put on the Act of Parliament, or as a factor which should in any way affect their Lordships' judgment on the question of construction now that it is before them.

It follows that, in their Lordships' opinion, this appeal fails, and should be dismissed with costs, and their Lordships will humbly advise His Majesty accordingly.

SMITH, HOGG AND CO., LIMITED v. LOUIS BAMBERGER AND SONS.*

Ship — Charterparty — Discharge of cargo — Meaning of "alongside"—Discharge on to quay and into lighters—Custom of Port of London — Respective obligations of shipowners and receivers.

The plaintiffs' steamer was chartered for the conveyance of a cargo of timber from Archangel to London, the charterparty providing, "The cargo to be brought to and taken from alongside the steamer at the charterer's risk and expense as customary." The defendants were indorsees of bills of lading which incorporated the terms of the charterparty. On arrival the plaintiffs discharged part of the cargo on to the quay and stacked it there and discharged part of it into lighters and stowed it in the lighters, and they brought this action, alleging that as the defendants did not take the cargo from alongside the steamer they (the plaintiffs) had had to incur the expense of stacking on the quay and of stowage in the lighters. The defendants pleaded that by the custom of the Port of London the shipowners were bound to bear the cost of unloading and stacking timber on the quay alongside the ship, and, in the case of overside discharge, the cost of delivery and stowage in the lighters.

Held, that by the custom in question the shipowners were under an obligation to bear all costs of unloading and stacking on the quay and of delivery and stowage in the lighters, and as there was no inconsistency between the custom and the charterparty the action failed.

Appeal from decision of Wright, J. (44 The Times L.R., 320), allowed.

This was the defendants' appeal and the plaintiffs' cross-appeal from the judgment of Mr. Justice Wright (44 The Times L.R., 320).

The action was brought by the plaintiffs, Smith, Hogg and Co., Limited, of Victoria-terrace, West Hartlepool, claiming from the defendants, Louis Bamberger and Sons, of Broad-street-buildings, E.C.2, £102 9s. 3d. in respect of the discharge of a quantity of timber from the plaintiffs' steamship Fernhill, in Surrey Commercial Dock, London.

Under bills of lading of various dates in September and October, 1926, which incorporated the terms of a charterparty dated September 13, 1926, made between the plaintiffs and the White Sea Timber Trust, it was provided that a quantity of deals, battens, and boards shipped at Archangel should be delivered at Surrey Commercial Dock to the order of the Russian Wood Agency, Limited, or their assigns. The charterparty contained, inter alia, the following clause:—

"The cargo to be brought to and taken from alongside the steamer at the charterer's risk and expense as customary."

The property in part of the cargo passed to the defendants as indorsees of the bills of lading. The cargo was discharged in part on to the quay and in part into lighters.

The plaintiffs pleaded that the defendants in breach of their obligations under the bills of lading did not take the cargo from alongside the steamer, and that in consequence they (the plaintiffs) carried the cargo to and stowed it in the usual place in the docks for discharged timber at a cost of £102 9s. 3d.

The defendants contended that the cargo was to be discharged according to the custom of the port of discharge, and pleaded that by the custom and practice of the Port of London the shipowner was, in the case of timber, bound to unload and stack it on the quay alongside the ship. In the case of overside discharge they alleged that the custom was to provide only sufficient open lighters to receive the goods from the ship's tackle, and that the shipowner was bound to do the whole work of delivering the goods into the open lighters. They contended that they were under no liability in respect of the money claimed by the plaintiffs, since, by the above custom, the shipowner was under an obligation to bear all costs of the unloading and stacking on the quay and the delivery and stowage in the lighters.

The defendants admitted that the plaintiffs discharged part of the cargo on to the quay and stacked it, but said that it was unsorted to marks or bills of lading. They alleged that the timber was subsequently removed and sorted by the Port of London Authority, labour in respect of which they (the defendants) were charged.

MR. JUSTICE WRIGHT held that, under a contract of the kind in question, when discharge was on to the quay, the cargo was "alongside" when it was available for release from the ship's tackle on the quay, and the obligation of the receivers to take it "from alongside" arose at that moment; but when the discharge was into lighters, it was the duty of the shipowners to place the cargo in the lighter, and the receivers' obligation only began after that had been done. The plaintiff shipowners, therefore, succeeded in their claim against the defendant receivers in respect of the cargo discharged on to the quay, but their claim failed as regarded the cargo discharged into lighters.

The defendants appealed, and the plaintiffs cross-appealed.

Mr. Raeburn, K.C., and Mr. J. Dickinson appeared for the defendants; and Mr. Le Quesne, K.C., and Sir Robert Aske for the plaintiffs.

The following considered judgments were read:—

LORD JUSTICE SCRUTTON.—This is an appeal in a test case intended to raise the question of the proper distribution of the costs of discharging timber in the Surrey Commerical Dock, London, as between shipowner and receiver. The s.s. Fernhill was chartered in 1926 in the well-known Merblanc (White Sea) Charter Form, which has been in existence since 1899. The material terms are that "the ship shall load a full and complete cargo of deals and/or battens and/or ends, &c., and proceed to a safe port (which was ultimately fixed as London) and there deliver the same. Cargo to be discharged with customary steamship dispatch, but according to the custom of the respective ports. The cargo to be brought to and taken from alongside the steamer at charterer's risk and expense as customary." The Fernhill carried timber cargo under 63 bills of lading, 31 of which were held by the present defendants. These bills only identified the subject-matter by number of pieces and sizes, not by marks. The goods shipped under each bill were separated on ship by a paint line, and a painted number, corresponding to the number of the bill of lading. But one batten of a given size is as good as another, and after the goods passed the ship's rail no attempt was made to keep them separate. So long as the receiver got his number of pieces of the right sizes, all was well. Timber goods at the Surrey Commercial Dock are discharged in two ways: (1) On to quay; (2) over side into lighters. As regards lighters, there has been litigation both before and after the Merblanc Charter as to the amount of work the shipowner must do in the barge by way of discharge or delivery at his own expense. As regards the quay, the discharge or delivery has proceeded on an agreed custom during all the time the Merblanc Charter has been in existence, the shipowner doing a recognized amount of work at his own expense, and until the present case no attempt has been made to disturb this custom or to impose less work on the shipowner, or alter the way in which by the custom of London the shipowner delivers or discharges, in regard to the cost of such work. The present attempt is made in consequence of a decision of the House of Lords in the case of The Turid (38 The Times L.R., 423; [1922] 1 A.C., 397) in respect of timber discharge in the port of Yarmouth, followed by a similar decision as to the port of Hull in the case of W. N. Hillas and Co., Limited v. Rederi Aktiebolaget Acolus (43 The Times L.R., 67). The question is whether on the facts of the discharge in London these decisions are applicable or not, and whether the agreed customs of the Port of London are excluded by the terms of the Merblanc Charter in that they contradict these terms. Discharge of timber cargoes in London under the Merblanc Charter has proceeded, so far as the discharge on the quay is concerned, in accordance with the customs, for over 25 years without objection. The question is whether the decisions of the House of Lords in The Turid (supra) and W. N. Hillas and Co., Limited v. Rederi Aktiebolaget Acolus (supra) compel an alteration of this old-established practice. Mr. Justice Wright has decided that the practice of discharge on the quay is to be altered as regards incidence of expense, and the receivers appeal. He has also decided that the practice of discharge into lighters is not to be altered as to incidence of expense, and the ship appeals.

The respective customs for quay and lighter discharge in London are agreed, reserving the question of their applicability in law to the Merblanc Charter. In practice they have always been treated as applicable to that charter until this case.

The agreed custom as to the quay discharge is set out in the correspondence and in the Judge's judgment. In substance it amounts to this. Though the goods in the ship are stored in separate parcels and leave the ship in separate parcels, they are not delivered to the receivers in separate parcels from the ship or sorted on the quay to sizes, marks or parcels. Largely for the convenience of the ship and to avoid delay, the whole cargo for the quay is discharged continuously on to the quay by the ship's gang and stacked on the quay by the ship's gang into two large stacks, one opposite the forward holds, one opposite the after holds. These stacks come up to the edge of the quay, and project over it towards the ship some 3ft. to 5ft. The timbers are of considerable lengths. In the bill of lading given me, out of 1,783 pieces, 688 range from 20ft. to 27ft. in length. They are at first handed out and rest one end on the quay and the other end on the ship's rail, for the convenience of the workmen on the quay lifting them. When the ship's winches are clear the timbers are lowered in slings, the distance of the lowering place from the edge of the quay being about 3ft., and again rest at an angle on the ship's side. The ship's gang then build them up into a stack, which may go back 30ft. from the edge of the quay, of which it will be seen 25ft. may be one piece at right angles to the ship. The stack will extend the whole length of the ship, except for the central gangway, and may be 12ft. to 15ft. high. It could be made higher and narrower, so extending less far back on the quay, but would in that case be less convenient to work. The whole cargo is thus discharged at once on to the quay, and stacked with one side of the stack almost touching the ship, by the ship's gang at the ship's expense. The ship has then finished with the cargo, and the Port of London Authority for the receivers, and at their expense, removes it to sheds, sorts it to sizes, and delivers it to individual receivers. This customary method of delivering on quay has prevailed for many years without objection under charters under which the receiver is bound to take from alongside at his risk and expense.

In respect of lighters, the custom which is agreed in this case has been proved in actual cases, and will be found stated in the judgment. The lighters receive the bill of lading parcels, quantities and marks. The receiver provides the lighters but no men to receive the cargo. The ship's men at the ship's expense hand or lower the timber in slings into the lighters. Releasing the slings, they move and stow the timber so as to fill the lighters with reasonable stowage. The receiver has nothing to do with the matter until the barge is loaded, when he takes it away.

Apart from authority, I should have held that these customs defined the duty of discharge or delivery at the port which the shipowner had contracted to perform; that the stack and the barge were respectively "alongside" the ship, and that the receiver had only to remove the stack or barge when completely erected or loaded alongside. The custom seems to me an eminently reasonable and businesslike arrangement, as is evidenced by its working without objection for so many years. It enables the ship to be quickly discharged; it avoids friction and delay by two different gangs of men working in a confined space, and by numbers of receivers each coming, or delaying to come, to receive their parcels.

It is said, however, that the decisions of the House of Lords in The Turid (supra) and W. N. Hillas and Co., Limited v. Rederi Aktiebolaget Acolus (supra) have disturbed this working arrangement. I take those decisions to lay down that the ship cannot be compelled to bear the expense of work in removing cargo to a place which is not "alongside" in the ordinary meaning of that term, and that custom is not available to make such a place "alongside." I should myself have held differently, and should have thought that the custom of the port could make a place "alongside" which was not ordinarily "alongside," just as custom can make twelve mean thirteen, or a hundred mean a hundred and twenty. But it is clear from the decision of the House of Lords that I was wrong in that view. It remains, therefore, to ascertain what facts the House of Lords was considering when it held that such places could not be made "alongside" by custom.

The import of timber into the port of Yarmouth has given rise to a great deal of litigation—see The Nifa ([1892] P. 411) and The Turid (supra) and a number of County Court cases. Anyone who has seen the Yarmouth river will understand why. The banks of the river slope so that the ship cannot lie near the bank and remain afloat, and cargo may not be deposited on the edge of the quay or bank. The result is that a considerable stretch of water and then of land intervenes between the ship's rail and the first place where the cargo can be deposited. In The Nifa case (supra) there was 15ft. between the ship's rail and the quay edge, and 15ft. to 20ft. from the edge of the quay to the first place where the cargo could be stacked; 30ft. to 35ft. had to be traversed from the ship's rail to the cargo stack. In the case of The Turid (supra) the distance was 22ft. to 23ft. The custom of Yarmouth proposed to put the expense of bridging this by a stage, and a gang carrying over it, on the ship. The House of Lords, as I understand the decision, has held that a place at such a distance from the ship cannot be "alongside" it, and custom is not admissible to extend the meaning of the word "alongside" to such a state of facts. The position at Hull is rather more severe on the ship; a distance which may be from 30ft. to 60ft. has to be covered before the cargo is placed upon bogies or near to the railway line on which the bogies run, and the custom of Hull proposes to put the cost of bridging this space on the shipowner. Again, I understand the House of Lords to have decided that a space 30ft. to 60ft. off cannot be "alongside" the steamer or be made so by custom. Following these decisions in the case of Aktieselskabet Dampskibsselskabet Primula (In Liquidation) v. George Horsley and Co., Limited (40 The Times L.R. 11) relating to Sunderland, where the shore crane with a very wide range discharged on to a railway line, and then the goods were moved still farther off, sometimes up to 87ft. from the ship, it was held that this again could not be "alongside" the ship, even by custom. In a similar case relating to West Hartlepool and Sunderland no custom was proved, but no timber was stacked within 4ft. of the edge of the quay and the stacks went back 40ft. or 50ft. from this 4ft.

The difference in London, where a custom is admitted, is that the stack begins quite close to the ship's side overhanging the edge of the quay, and extends back 30ft., being a little more than the length of timbers which are delivered by the custom at right angles to the ship's side, and which, therefore, when entirely clear of the ship's rail reach nearly to the end of the stack. I see no difficulty in holding that such a stack of which one edge almost touches the ship, and which leaves no space of land, and no appreciable space of water between the ship's side and the edge of the stack, is "alongside" the ship without any extension of the term "alongside" by custom. I understood the objection of the shipowner was not to his gang's doing the work, which was obviously very convenient to him, but to his bearing the expense of it. Indeed, as I have said, he had been both doing the work and bearing the expense of it for 25 years under this charter without objection. There has been litigation in London as to the discharge into lighters over side and the work to be done by the shipowner. In 1895, in Petersen v. Freebody and Co. (11 The Times L.R., 459; [1895] 2 Q.B., 294) no custom of the port was proved, and it was held that the receiving of logs of timber was a joint operation; the shipowner must put the end of the log so that the receiver could get hold of it, and the receiver must then help the ship to get the log out of the ship and into the lighter. The "alongside" clause was in the charter.

In 1897, in Aktieselskab Helios v. Ekman and Co. ([1897] 2 Q.B., 83), where also there was an "alongside" clause in the charter, a custom was proved that the receivers need have no men in the barge, but that the shipowner was bound to have men there to release the slings and stow the barges, though the exact extent of the stowage was not determined. The custom was upheld as explaining the customary mode of delivery which the shipowner had to perform.

In 1910, in Glasgow Navigation Co. v. Howard (26 The Times L.R., 247) the custom was further defined, after an exhaustive hearing of witnesses. The shipowner was held bound to do the whole work of stowing the barge to a reasonable extent, the receiver not being required to have any men in the barge. When the barge provided by the receiver is stowed fully, the receiver takes it away. The barge is alongside and all the timber in it is treated as alongside, though the shipowner has to move it after the slings are released. All these cases were cited to the House of Lords in The Turid (supra) and were treated as distinguishable and as explaining the customary method of discharge or delivery.

In these circumstances, the learned Judge below has declined to interfere with decisions which the House of Lords has treated as not affected by their decision in The Turid (supra) and has dismissed the claim of the shipowner to recover the expenses of his work in the barge. I agree with this decision and am not disposed to interfere with a custom which the House of Lords has not treated as affected by their decision, and which is quite explicable as defining what the ship must by custom do to deliver or discharge in the Port of London in a barge which is alongside the ship.

But the learned Judge has thought himself bound by the decision of the House of Lords to interfere with the long-established practice of delivery on to the quay in the Port of London, which has never before been questioned under this charter, though delivery into lighters has been questioned.

The Judge has decided that the receiver must bear the cost of work on the quay, after the timber is within the consignee's reach in the ship's slings. I am not sure that he has decided who is bound to do the work, only who is to pay for the work; and I think the shipowner rather wants to do the work, in order to release his ship more quickly.

The counsel for the shipowner at once argue that the two decisions of the Judge are inconsistent. If the ship need not pay for the work on the quay after the timber is slung overboard, why need it pay for the work in the barge after the timber is lowered into the barge in slings? I think the two decisions are inconsistent, and that the result is that the decision as to work on the quay cannot stand. Both the timber in the barge and the timber on the quay are, in my opinion, in London "alongside" the ship. One side of the barge is some way from the ship, but the other is touching the ship; the same is true of the stack. The work to be done by the ship appears to me to be on the quay, as it has been held to be in the barge, explained by the customary method of delivery or discharge in London.

In these circumstances, in my opinion the decision below as to work on the quay must be reversed; the custom of London held applicable to the Merblanc charter, and the shipowner held bound to do the work specified in the custom at his own expense. I have the more satisfaction in coming to this conclusion as it upholds the method in which shipowners and receivers have done work on the quay under this custom for over 25 years without objection, because I think it is a way of discharging the ship with businesslike advantages to both parties.

The cross-appeal of the ship must be dismissed with costs; the appeal of the receivers allowed, the judgment against them set aside, and judgment entered for them in the action with costs here and below.

LORD JUSTICE GREER.—I agree that the defendants' appeal should be allowed, and the plaintiffs' cross-appeal dismissed, with the usual consequences as regards costs.

The facts of the case are fully stated by Mr. Justice Wright in his judgment, and they have been conveniently summarized by Lord Justice Scrutton in the judgment which he has just read. The only fact to which I desire to call special attention is, that the relevant term of the charterparty incorporated in the bill of lading is a term that applies to the cargo as a whole, and not to each separate piece of wood that is lifted out of the hold of the ship. The words are : "The cargo to be brought to and taken from alongside the steamer at charterer's risk and expense as customary."

In the case of the Oresund (Rederi Aktiebolaget Acolus v. W. N. Hillas and Co., Limited (41 The Times L.R., 546), which was originally tried by me, and went through this Court (42 The Times L.R., 69) to the House of Lords (43 The Times L.R., 67), I used these words in giving judgment (41 The Times L.R., at p. 549) : "To put the goods over the rail is thus the prima facie limit of the obligation of the ship to discharge and deliver the cargo. If there be nothing in the charterparty about the consignee taking from alongside, it may well be that a custom such as is alleged in this case might impose the further duty of delivering into bogies 18½ft. from the ship's side. It has been decided that the ship's obligations, even where there is an alongside clause, may be extended and the receiver's duties diminished by an established custom of the port (Aktieselskab Helios v. Ekman and Co. ([1897] 2 Q.B., 83) and Glasgow Navigation Company v. Howard (26 The Times L.R., 247)), so long as the added duties of the ship are being performed while the goods are still alongside. But if the added duties of the ship imposed by the custom extend to taking the goods beyond a place that can properly be described as alongside, the custom is inconsistent with the contract made by the express words of the charterparty and is not binding on the parties to the contract." I see no reason to alter the view thus expressed as to the law applicable to cases like the present.

I think the point to be decided in the present case is whether, when the cargo had, in accordance with the custom of the port, been placed in a position extending from the quay edge to about 30ft. from the quay edge, it was still in a position that could reasonably be said to be "alongside" the ship ? I think if anyone had been asked where the cargo of the Fernhill was after discharge, he would not have been misusing the English language if he had said, as to the part on the quay, that it was alongside the ship on the quay, and as to the part discharged into lighters it was alongside the ship in lighters. In my judgment this case, so far as it is concerned with the part of the cargo discharged on to the quay, is distinguishable from The Turid (38 The Times L.R., 423 ; [1922] 1 A.C., 297), on the ground that in that case no portion of the cargo was placed on the quay at a less distance than eight yards from the rail of the ship. As Lord Sumner says in the concluding part of his judgment, 13ft. of water plus 10ft. of quay is too far away from the ship's side to be within the meaning of the words "alongside the steamer."

In the other case, W. N. Hillas and Co., Limited v. Rederi Aktiebolaget Acolus (supra), the custom involved the carriage of the whole of the cargo at least 18½ft. to the bogies and loading it in the bogies and it was held by all the Courts that when in the bogies at this distance from the ship's side the cargo could not be said to be "alongside the steamer."

In my judgment the facts of this case take it outside the decisions of the House of Lords in the two cases referred to.

As regards the part of the cargo delivered into lighters, I agree with my Lord that the case is within the decisions in Aktieselskab Helios v. Ekman and Co. (supra) and Glasgow Navigation Company v. Howard (supra), and that the learned Judge was right in his decision with regard to the cargo so delivered, but wrong in his decision with regard to the part delivered on the quay.

I only desire to add that I am not myself satisfied that there is any inconsistency between the decisions in The Turid (supra) and W. N. Hillas and Co., Limited v. Rederi Aktiebolaget Acolus (supra) and the cases where it has been held that the customary meaning of a dozen in a particular trade can be proved to be thirteen, and the customary meaning of 100 may be proved to be 120. Those are cases in which the customary meaning of a word was established, and as pointed out in my judgment in W. N. Hillas and Co., Limited v. Rederi Aktiebolaget Acolus (supra) and by the Lord Chancellor in the House of Lords, the attempt to prove a customary meaning of the word "alongside" entirely failed. It seems to me difficult to establish a customary meaning of the word "alongside" in a charterparty which involves the possibility of discharge at a variety of different ports, a customary meaning which will vary according to the port which may afterwards be selected as the port of discharge. The word "alongside" would then be like the sailor who is said to have a wife at every port. It would in effect be wedded to a different meaning with regard to each of the ports included in the words of the charterparty as the ports to which the charterer might order the vessel. In any event, it is right to say that neither in The Turid (supra) nor in W. N. Hillas and Co., Limited v. Rederi Aktiebolaget Acolus (supra) was it proved that the word "alongside" in contracts of affreightment such as those involved in those cases had acquired a customary meaning.

With this qualification I agree with my Lord's judgment, not only as regards its findings, but also with the reasons given by him and the observations made in the course of his judgment.

LORD JUSTICE SANKEY.—By the combined effect of thirty-one bills of lading, dated on various dates from September 29 to October 14, 1926, and a charterparty dated September 13, the plaintiffs, as owners of the s.s. Fernhill, agreed to deliver certain pieces of deals, battens, and boards at the Surrey Commercial Dock, London, the charter providing that the cargo was to be brought to and taken from alongside the steamer at charterers' risk and expense, as customary.

The defendants were the indorsees of the said bills of lading and receivers of the cargo in question. I shall refer in the course of this judgment to the plaintiffs as the ship and the defendants as the receivers.

The vessel duly arrived at the Surrey Commercial Dock and moored alongside the quay, part of the cargo in question being discharged into lighters and part being discharged on to the quay.

There has been for many years a custom of the Port of London (Surrey Commercial Dock), which was agreed as follows, with regard to the discharge of wood goods on to the quay. The goods are discharged from the steamer by the ship's stevedores with the ship's tackle, and stacked by the stevedores on to the quay, without sorting to bill of lading sizes or marks—the first pieces discharged are used to make a stage projecting over the quay for about 6ft. towards the side of the steamer, and as the cargo is discharged a stack is made varying in size with the quantity discharged on to the quay, but generally not exceeding the length of the steamer and extending back about 30ft. from the edge of the stage. The timber is later carried away from the stack by the Port of London Authority, and by them sorted to bill of lading sizes and marks and piled in the usual place for storing timber.

The ship's stevedores' charges for discharging the cargo and stacking it on the quay are paid by the shipowner, and the Port of London Authority's charges for carrying the cargo from the quay, sorting and piling are paid by the consignees.

With regard to the discharge into lighters, the custom was stated to be as set out in the case of Glasgow Navigation Company v. Howard Brothers and Co. (26 The Times L.R., 247 ; 15 Com Cas., 88) : "By the custom and practice of the Port of London in the case of cargoes of lumber (including both Baltic and pitch pine lumber) the receiver, instead of being liable to receive the goods from the ship's tackle alongside into craft, is liable only to provide sufficient craft alongside ready to receive the goods, and is under no obligation to have any men thereon to receive the goods from the ship's tackle or to stow the goods therein, and the shipowner is bound to do the whole work of delivering the goods into barges, whether dock company's barges or outside barges, and of stowing the goods therein in the reasonable and ordinary manner, so that the goods may not be damaged or imperilled, and so that the barges may be loaded to the usual and reasonable extent and may be safely and properly navigable."

Disputes arose between the parties as to whether the expense caused by these operations should fall upon the ship or should fall upon the receivers. There have been a great number of cases before the Courts dealing with both these points, which may be conveniently classified as quay cases and barge cases. With regard to the quay cases there have been two recent decisions of the House of Lords—namely, The Turid (38 The Times L.R., 423; [1922] 1 A.C., 397) and W. N. Hillas and Co., Limited v. Rederi Aktiebolaget Acolus (43 The Times L.R., 67). The former was concerned with unloading at Yarmouth, the latter with unloading at Hull.

With regard to the barge cases there have been several in connexion with unloading in London—for example, Petersen v. Freebody and Co. (11 The Times L.R., 459 ; [1895] 2 Q.B., 294) ; Aktieselskab Helios v. Ekman and Co. ([1897] 2 Q.B., 83) ; Glasgow Navigation Company v. Howard (supra). In this case the learned Judge has decided that in respect of the discharge on to the quay the cargo is alongside when it is available for release from the ship's slings, if discharged by the ship's tackle, and if discharged, as was the first portion of the deck cargo in this case, by being handed from the vessel, when it is laid with one end on the quay and the other resting against the ship. It is from this point, he continues in his judgment, that, in the case of cargo landed on the quay, the obligation of the receiver to take from alongside begins, and therefore all expense from that moment is expense which, by the contract, the receiver has to bear. From that part of the decision the receivers appeal.

In respect of the discharge into barges, the learned Judge has decided that it is the duty of the ship to move the cargo and put and stow it in the barge, and that the ship must bear the expense of doing so. From that the ship appeals.

I now deal with both points. The transaction of loading or unloading a ship is a composite one, and is performed by a joint operation of the ship and the receiver; the one delivers and the other receives the cargo, and in respect of the delivery and the receiving the law imposes obligations upon the parties. The principles are, perhaps, best stated in Lord Esher's classic judgment in Petersen v. Freebody and Co. (supra).

Although, however, as an abstract question, his decision is simple, when it comes to practical matters difficulties arise. In many charters, as in this one, a duty is imposed upon the charterer to take the cargo from alongside at his own risk and expense, as customary. In some ports a vessel cannot get close to the quay; for example, at Yarmouth she is moored at a distance of some feet from the quay. (See The Nifa [1892] P., 411, and The Turid, supra). Again, in some ports the cargo is taken from the ship and placed on a spot a little distance from the edge of the quay, and questions have arisen as to who is to bear the expense of carrying the cargo from the ship itself over an intervening space of water to the quay, and from the edge of the quay over an intervening space of land to the spot where it is usual to stack it. In many ports a custom has grown up with regard to this matter.

The decision in The Turid (supra), the leading case of the quay cases, which dealt with the custom of the port of Yarmouth, where the vessel could not come nearer than 13ft. out from the quay, was that a custom imposing upon the shipowners the obligation of making a stage between the ship and the quay, and then of carrying the timber over that stage to the quay, and then over another space of about 10ft. between the edge of the quay and the spot where the timber was stacked, was invalid, as inconsistent with the provisions of the charterparty, which was in the same form as in the present case, namely, that the cargo should be taken from alongside the steamer at charterers' risk and expense.

It would not be profitable to go through all the other cases, as they are dealt with in the House of Lords in the case of The Turid (supra), which was approved in The Acolus case (supra). As far as the quay discharge is concerned, in my opinion the question at stake here is whether, on the facts, the decision in The Turid (supra) is applicable. It must be taken that the ratio decidendi of The Turid (supra) was that you cannot have the custom to explain and so enlarge the meaning of the word "alongside." I think, however, that before you apply the law you must carefully consider the facts.

At Yarmouth (The Turid, supra) the cargo has to be carried from the ship over a space of water to the quayside, and from the edge of the quay over a space of land to a place where it is stacked. At Hull (The Acolus case, supra) it has to be carried over a space of land to the spot where it was stacked. These intervening spaces range between distances of 10ft. and 70ft.

In the present case there is no such intervening space; the vessel is moored close to the quay, and although the cargo is discharged, at first some little distance from the quayside, when the discharge is finally completed the stack composed of the cargo is lying, not only absolutely at the edge of the quay against which the ship is moored, but some of it projects over the ship's rail. There is, therefore, no intervening space, either of water or land, between the ship's rail and the place where the cargo as a cargo is placed. On the facts, therefore, this case is entirely different from The Turid (supra), and I can see no distinction between this case and the barge cases.

The spot upon which the timber was unloaded in this case is comparable to the barge. It was actually alongside the steamer, as was the barge. No intervening space of water or of land, as was the fact in the quay cases, was between the ship and the unloading spot, just as there was no intervening space of water or land in the barge cases. I cannot see that the ship in this case had more to do than it was decided she was liable to do in the barge cases. Lord Sumner says in The Turid (38 The Times L.R., at p. 429; [1922] 1 A.C. at p. 416): "The fact is the steamer is the starting point. It is from her side that the extension is to be measured, which ultimately reaches the customary spot, and when that extension involves 13ft. of water, bridged by a staging, and at least 10ft. of quay, traversed by porters, I think the spot is too far away." That is not the fact in the present case.

For these reasons I am of the opinion that the custom is not inconsistent with the terms of the charterparty, that it is valid and that the appeal should be allowed, and I now turn to the question of the cross-appeal.

As far as the barge discharge is concerned, just as The Turid (supra) is the leading case on the question of the quay delivery so Glasgow Navigation Company v. Howard (supra) is the leading case on the question of barge delivery, although it must be remembered that in that case what was fought was the custom and not the point that the custom contradicted the charter. It was pointed out that in the decision of Aktieselskabet Helios v. Ekman and Co. (supra) the judgment did not apparently impose upon the shipowner a duty to stow the cargo in the barge, as distinguished from merely placing it there, and that the barge cases should be decided in the same way as the quay cases, but in my view the learned Judge in the Court below was right in the conclusion he arrived at on this point.

The Lord Chancellor in The Turid (supra) described the barge cases as easily distinguishable from the quay cases, and the barge cases upon which the receivers rely and which are in their favour were all before the House of Lords in The Turid (supra) and were not disapproved of.

In my view, if the barge cases are to be brought into a line with the decision in The Turid (supra) in the way suggested by the learned counsel for the ship, that is a matter which must be determined by their Lordships' House.

I think the cross-appeal should be dismissed.

Court of Appeal.
(Lord Hanworth, M.R., Scrutton, Lawrence, Greer, Sankey, and Russell, L.JJ.) 1928. June 18.

HYMAN v. HYMAN.

Divorce—Maintenance—Deed of separation—Covenant by husband to provide allowance—Covenant by wife not to sue for further support, alimony, or maintenance—Decree absolute for dissolution granted to wife on the ground of husband's adultery—Petition by her for maintenance—Covenant pleaded in bar—Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925 (15 and 16 Geo., V., c. 49), s. 190.

A woman who in a deed of separation covenants in consideration of certain benefits not to claim from her husband in the future maintenance or alimony and is afterwards granted a decree absolute of divorce, is not debarred from petitioning for maintenance after the dissolution of marriage, notwithstanding that the deed contained no provision for its termination on the marriage being dissolved.

So held, per Lord Hanworth, M.R., Scrutton, Greer, and Sankey, L.JJ.—Lawrence and Russell, L.JJ., dissenting.

These were two appeals, the first from an order of Mr. Justice Hill (44 The Times L.R., 466), and the second from an order of the President (Lord Merrivale), (44 The Times L.R., 463). The two appeals, which involved the same question of law, were first heard by three of the Lords Justices and judgment was reserved; but in view of the general importance of the questions raised it was decided that the appeals should be reheard before the full Court of six Judges.

Both appeals raised the issue whether a wife who had entered into a deed of separation under which she covenanted not to endeavour to compel her husband "to allow her any alimony or maintenance" further than certain agreed sums in respect of maintenance, could, on a petition for divorce being presented or granted, claim to treat the previous agreement as ended and claim other sums, or such sums as the Court might allow.

HYMAN v. HYMAN.

In the first case, Mrs. Hyman, the petitioner, was granted a decree nisi of divorce on January 25, 1927, and she petitioned for maintenance. Her husband set up in bar the plea that in a deed of separation dated September 19, 1919, the petitioner covenanted that neither she nor any person on her behalf would at any time thereafter endeavour to compel him "to allow her any alimony or maintenance" further than the £20 a week and two sums of £200 and £2,000 provided in the deed. The husband set up the deed of separation with this covenant in bar, on the ground that he had complied with all his covenants therein, and he asked for a declaration that the deed was a valid answer to the petition for maintenance.

* Reported by G. T. Whitfield-Hayes, T. W. Morgan, and H. C. Garsia, Esqs., Barristers-at-Law.

The deed contained no provision for its termination on the marriage being dissolved.

The matter was ordered to be tried as a separate issue.

Mr. Justice Hill decided that he was bound to follow the decision of the President in Hughes v. Hughes (supra), which had been given on the previous day, and to hold that the divorce proceedings had terminated the previous relationship and that the covenant in the deed was no bar. He therefore gave judgment for the petitioner. The husband appealed.

Sir Herbert Cunliffe, K.C., and Mr. H. Durley Grazebrook appeared for the appellant; Sir W. Schwabe, K.C., and Mr. G. Tyndale for the petitioner.

Sir Herbert Cunliffe, for the appellant, said that an agreement of the kind contained in the separation deed was not to be treated as a mere scrap of paper, but should be upheld as binding on the parties. On the authorities it was quite clearly established that in cases of judicial separation such an agreement was binding, and it had never before been decided that it would not be binding on the parties to it in the case of divorce. It had been suggested in some judgments that there might be a difference in the case of divorce, but such expressions of judicial opinion were merely obiter, and it would be curious if wives could "contract out" of their rights in one case and not in the other.

The onus of establishing that the agreement was not binding was on the wife, and it was not for the husband to prove that it was binding. Admittedly, if one of the parties to this agreement, either in terms or by conduct, repudiated it, that would release the other party and enable him or her to come to the Court to ask for an order. There had been no such conduct in the present case. The husband had carried out all his obligations under the deed, and there was no conduct on his part which could be said to amount to a repudiation. Further, there was in the deed nothing which limited it to the duration of the matrimonial tie, either expressly or by implication, and in the absence of express words or a necessary implication so limiting it, no such term ought to be implied. See Charlesworth v. Holt (L.R. 9 Ex., 38).

Lord Justice Russell said that if that decision were right, the foundation of the President's judgment was gone.

The Master of the Rolls.—It is not binding on this Court.

Sir Herbert Cunliffe.—But the reasoning of of that case is very sound.

Counsel then referred to F. A. Tamplin Steamship Company, Limited v. Anglo-Mexican Petroleum Products Company, Limited (32 The Times L.R., 667; [1916] 2 A.C., 397, per Lord Parker at p. 422.)

On the question of the binding character of an agreement of the kind in a case of judicial separation, counsel referred to Besant v. Wood (12 Ch.D., 605); Marshall v. Marshall (5 P.D., 19); Gandy v. Gandy (7 P.D., 168); Morrall v. Morrall (6 P.D., 98). The legal principle on which such an agreement could be set aside was that there had been conduct which amounted to a repudiation of the agreement, and that there must have been conduct on the part of the husband which disentitled him to the protection of the separation deed.

Lord Justice Scrutton referred to Benyon v. Benyon and O'Callaghan (1 P.D., 447).

Referring to Bishop v. Bishop and Judkins v. Judkins (13 The Times L.R., 366; [1897] P., 138), Sir Herbert Cunliffe said that these cases showed that there was no real foundation for the suggestion that, as regards the point at issue, there was any real difference between cases of judicial separation and cases of divorce. To enable a wife to flout her covenants there must be something in the nature of a vital change, altering the whole position of the parties, or else there must be conduct by the husband which was tantamount to a repudiation of the agreement.

It was said that in the case of judicial separation a wife could "contract out" of her claims for maintenance, not because any statute said that she could, but because no statute said she could not; and exactly the same reasoning applied to cases of divorce. In Halsbury's Laws of England (Vol. II., p. 404) such contracting out agreements were said to be good unless they were opposed to public policy.

Sir Walter Schwabe, for the petitioner, said that "maintenance" in the deed had a different signification from "permanent maintenance," as used in the Divorce Court. He relied on two submissions: (1) that by statute the Court had power to grant maintenance on any terms which it might think just; and (2) that it was not open to the parties, by antecedent agreement, to say that they had deprived the Court of that power. It was held in Bishop v. Bishop (supra) that the power to grant maintenance was very wide indeed, and it would not be right for any Court to seek to narrow it.

The object of the parties to the deed was not to prevent the Court from awarding such permanent maintenance as it thought proper. The short way of deciding this case was to say that Morrall v. Morrall (supra) directly applied. That decision was accepted in Gandy v. Gandy (supra) and Bishop v. Bishop (supra).

It was the alteration of status caused by the breaking of the marriage tie that was treated as freeing the wife from her obligation not to ask for further maintenance.

If the proper interpretation of the covenant in the deed of separation in this case was that the Court should not in the event of subsequent divorce have power to grant permanent maintenance, then the agreement was against public policy and void. That was supported by what was said by Lord Justice Lindley in Bishop v. Bishop (supra, at p. 164), in delivering the judgment of the Court.

Lastly, it had been suggested that, if the Court held that the covenant of the wife was not binding, then equally the deed of separation could not bind the husband or a guarantor under the deed. That point was not open for decision on the trial of the preliminary issue.

Mr. Tyndale followed on the same side, and argued that, on construction, "maintenance" was used in the deed of separation in a non-technical sense as meaning "any form of support."

Mr. Grazebrook, in reply, said that some stress had been laid on the fact that in the covenant in the deed of separation "maintenance," and not "permanent maintenance," was referred to. "Maintenance" was, however, a perfectly proper description of what was obtained after divorce. "Permanent maintenance" was no longer very permanent, as there had been a right since 1917 for the wife to apply for an increase. Further, there was no foundation for saying that there was in the deed of separation anything amounting to leave or licence to commit adultery. Again, there had been no change of circumstances. The existence of the adultery was continuous both before and after the separation.

Their LORDSHIPS reserved judgment.

HUGHES v. HUGHES.

The hearing of this appeal was then proceeded with.

Mr. Clifford Mortimer and Mr. A. Richard Ellis appeared for the appellant; Sir James O'Connor, K.C., and Mr. J. W. Morris for the petitioner.

Mr. MORTIMER said that the marriage in this case took place in 1892, and on July 27, 1903, the wife presented a petition in Ireland for divorce a mensa et thoro, which was settled. On January 14, 1920, she again petitioned in Ireland for divorce a mensa et thoro, and on November 15, 1920, two deeds were executed in settlement of that petition. In one of them the wife covenanted that she would not "at any time hereafter commence or prosecute any action or other proceeding for compelling the said George Edgar Hughes to cohabit with her, the said Lilian Garner Hughes, or to allow her any support, maintenance, or alimony." This deed contained no provision for its termination on the marriage being dissolved.

On September 25, 1926, the wife petitioned for divorce in this country, the husband having become domiciled here. Orders were made for decree nisi and decree absolute, and on November 15, 1927, the wife presented a petition for permanent maintenance.

On January 6, 1928, the husband took out a summons to stay the proceedings on the ground that the wife's covenant acted as a bar. The President (Lord Merrivale) held that that was not so. It was submitted that the appeal should be allowed. The wife did, on the construction of the deed, covenant not to apply for permanent maintenance, and the President's decision to the contrary could not stand.

The question was whether the covenant was enforceable against the wife after divorce. Reliance had been placed on the width of the statutory provisions for permanent maintenance after dissolution of marriage.

Dissolution of marriage was an entirely new remedy, and it was necessary in providing for permanent maintenance to state what general matters should be taken into account. There was, therefore, no ground for saying that there was wider jurisdiction to disregard a wife's covenant not to apply for maintenance in granting permanent maintenance after divorce than there would have been on an application for alimony after judicial separation. Until the Supreme Court of Judicature Act, 1873, the question whether the covenant was a bar would not have come before the Divorce Court, as the husband would have applied in Chancery for an injunction to prevent the wife from proceeding with an application for maintenance.

There was certainly no power in the Court to set aside the wife's covenant under the power given to vary the application of settled property originally conferred by section 5 of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1859.

In Williams v. Baily (L.R., 2 Eq., 731) it was decided in a case of judicial separation that a covenant not to apply for alimony pendente lite was not illegal. Further provisions in deeds of separation were held not to be put an end to by divorce (Worsley v. Worsley (L.R., 1 P. and D., 648) and Charlesworth v. Holt (supra)). Again, in Besant v. Wood (supra) and Marshall v. Marshall (supra) it was held that there was nothing illegal in a wife's covenanting not to apply for restitution of conjugal rights.

It had been decided that no covenant by a spouse in a deed of separation could limit the power of the Court to make an order for the custody or maintenance of the children. It had also been established that if there was what amounted to repudiation of the agreement then the other party was no longer bound by it. With those limitations, a covenant in a deed of separation not to sue for alimony or maintenance was a covenant which remained binding notwithstanding a subsequent dissolution of the marriage.

In Benyon v. Benyon and O'Callaghan (supra) Sir James Hannen applied the same reasoning as he did in Morrall v. Morrall (supra) and Gandy v. Gandy (supra), and it was the wrong reasoning. It was that adultery created a different set of circumstances and that the wife was not, therefore, bound. The Court of Appeal in Gandy v. Gandy (supra) made short work of all the reasons given by Sir James Hannen for his decision. It was true that Morrall v. Morrall (supra) was not then under appeal, but he (counsel) suggested that the decision of the Court of Appeal in Gandy v. Gandy (supra) cut away the ground of the decision in Morrall v. Morrall (supra).

In Rose v. Rose (8 P.D., 98) a wife condoned cruelty and covenanted not to raise it in any subsequent proceedings. That was contrary to the whole doctrine of condonation. Condonation was always treated as conditional forgiveness and the offence revived on the commission of any further matrimonial offence. But the Court of Appeal held that the wife was bound by her covenant. Bishop v. Bishop (supra) was distinguishable because there was in that case no covenant not to bring proceedings for permanent maintenance. The Court did not then consider the effect of a covenant against having recourse to the Court.

Lastly, there was no ground for saying that the covenant not to have recourse to the Court for permanent maintenance was void as being against public policy.

SIR JAMES O'CONNOR, for the petitioner, said that it was admitted that no agreement could oust the jurisdiction of the Court so far as decrees for judicial separation and divorce were concerned. Could it be said that an agreement could oust most of the immediate consequences? The matters of divorce, maintenance, and provisions for the children were all inextricably mixed: Bishop v. Bishop (supra). A covenant not to sue for a further sum in the case of misconduct was bad, and yet it was suggested that a covenant not to do so in any event was good. Must it not be treated as bad, unless it could be construed as a covenant which was inapplicable in the case of divorce?

The present case was exactly covered by Bishop v. Bishop (supra). It made no difference that there was in that case no covenant not to sue for alimony.

The covenant by the wife not to have recourse to the Court for maintenance was against public policy. The authorities on this question were collected and discussed in In re Hope Johnstone (20 The Times L.R., 282; [1904] 1 Ch., 470, at p. 474). They showed, in principle, that, if the covenant in this case were made expressly to apply to a future divorce, it would be void. Lastly, Gandy v. Gandy (supra) had been wrongly decided by the Court of Appeal, but this Court could depart from its previous decision, Webster v. Ashton-under-Lyne Overseers (L.R., 8 C.P. 306).

Mr. MORTIMER, in reply, said that he admitted that his contentions rested on Gandy v. Gandy (supra) having been rightly decided by the Court of Appeal. He suggested that this Court would not readily depart from that decision, especially as it had stood unquestioned for so many years. If Gandy v. Gandy (supra) stood, it disposed of the argument that the wife's covenant here was against public policy.

The following considered judgments were delivered.

The MASTER OF THE ROLLS :—Hyman v. Hyman comes before this Court on appeal from an order of Mr. Justice Hill made on March 27, 1928, on a preliminary issue which had been directed to be tried, the question being whether or not the petition by the wife for permanent maintenance on the dissolution of her marriage ought to be dismissed on the ground that any such proceedings taken by the wife are a breach of a covenant on her part not to endeavour to compel her husband to allow her alimony beyond the sum provided in a deed of separation entered into between the spouses on September 19, 1919. Mr. Justice Hill decided that the petitioner was not precluded from prosecuting her claim. In coming to this decision he relied upon the decision given by the President on the previous day in the case of Hughes v. Hughes. This appeal is prosecuted in order to bring that decision to the consideration of this Court.

In the case of Hughes v. Hughes an appeal was entered from the decision of the President already referred to, which had determined that the petitioner was at liberty to proceed in her petition for maintenance, and we have taken steps to hear that appeal before giving the decision of the Court in Hyman v. Hyman. This judgment will therefore deal with both appeals. The cases being of difficulty and importance, they have been re-argued before the full Court. It is necessary to state the facts in each separately, for there are some differences that may be important.

HYMAN V. HYMAN.

The marriage took place on September 14, 1912. There were no children of the marriage. In 1919 differences arose between the husband and the wife, and on September 19, 1919, a deed of separation was entered into whereby the husband "for himself, his executors and administrators" agreed to pay his wife immediately two lump sums which do not concern this case and covenanted "during the life of the said May Hyman to pay or cause to be paid to the said May Hyman . . . the weekly sum of £20 free of income-tax on the Monday of every week, without any deduction whatsoever, for her separate use and benefit and for her maintenance." The wife covenanted "that she would not molest or disturb the said Maurice Percy Hyman by any means, either by taking out citation or process or by instituting any action in England or elsewhere, or in any other manner compel the said Maurice Percy Hyman to cohabit with the said May Hyman or endeavour to enforce any restitution of conjugal rights or to compel the said Maurice Percy Hyman to allow her any alimony or maintenance" further than the said weekly sum of £20 and the lump sums already mentioned.

On January 11, 1926, the wife presented a petition praying for the dissolution of the marriage on the ground of her husband's adultery. This charge was admitted, and on January 25, 1927, a decree nisi was pronounced. On February 7, 1927, the wife presented a petition for permanent maintenance under section 190 of the Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925, and alleged in the petition that the respondent (the present appellant) was possessed of large means. In his answer the respondent relied upon the covenant not to take proceedings to compel him to allow her alimony (above set out) and after some steps in the proceedings the order was made on October 31, 1927, directing the preliminary issue to be tried, and staying meanwhile all further proceedings on the question of maintenance. The hearing of the issue was begun before Mr. Justice Hill on February 10, 1928, but his decision was not given until March 27, immediately after the President's decision in Hughes v. Hughes, and in the meantime, on February 27, 1928, the decree nisi had been made absolute.

HUGHES V. HUGHES.

The spouses were married on June 8, 1892, in Ireland, where the husband was then domiciled. On July 27, 1903, the wife presented a petition in the Irish Court for divorce a mensa et thoro, and on June 8, 1904, the proceedings were compromised and determined by an agreement entered into between the husband and the wife, whereby the parties agreed to live separate and apart and the husband agreed to pay the wife £50 a year during her life by half-yearly payments and charged £25, part of this annuity, upon a house and premises at Dalkey in the County of Dublin; and the wife covenanted "not to commence or prosecute any action or other proceeding for compelling the said G. E. Hughes to cohabit with her or to allow her any support, maintenance or alimony except the said annual sum of £50."

On January 14, 1920, the wife presented in the Irish Court a second petition for divorce a mensa et thoro which was compromised and determined by a deed executed on November 15, 1920. The terms—which were carried into effect—were that the husband was to assign the house and premises at Dalkey to his wife absolutely, and the wife released the husband from the payment of the annuity of £50, and also covenanted that she would not commence or prosecute any action or other proceeding "for compelling the said G. E. Hughes to cohabit with her or to allow her any support, maintenance or alimony." In 1922 the husband left Ireland and acquired a domicile in England; and on September 25, 1926, the wife presented a petition for divorce in the English Court for dissolution of the marriage on the ground of adultery committed since 1923. This petition was heard on May 4, 1927. There was no defence, and a decree nisi was granted which was made absolute on November 14, 1927.

On November 15, 1927, a petition for permanent maintenance under section 190 of the Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925, was presented by the wife. Thereupon a summons was taken out on the part of the husband to dismiss the petition on the ground that its presentation was prevented by the covenant contained in the deed of November 15, 1920. The Registrar held in favour of the husband and dismissed the petition for maintenance. The wife appealed, and on March 26, 1928, in a considered judgment, the President reversed the decision of the Registrar and held that the petitioner was at liberty to proceed on her petition. From this judgment the husband now appeals to this Court.

In both cases, therefore, the proceedings to obtain an order for permanent alimony have been taken under section 190, already referred to, in defiance of a covenant not to institute proceedings to compel the husband to allow the wife any alimony or maintenance otherwise than had already been provided; and in neither case is any misconduct, in regard to breach of the terms of the covenants entered into on his part, charged against the husband.

The question to be determined is whether such a covenant in a deed of separation against taking further proceedings for maintenance or permanent alimony binds an innocent wife when, by the means of subsequent proceedings, the marriage has been dissolved by decree absolute.

The judgment of the learned President appears to take note of the particular circumstances under which the covenant of the wife in Hughes v. Hughes came to be entered into. It was in a deed compromising a suit for divorce a mensa et thoro, entered into between parties who were domiciled in Ireland, where there is no procedure leading to a divorce through the means of the Law Courts, and where, if a divorce is to be obtained, it must be through the means that prevailed in England before the Matrimonial Causes Act of 1857 was passed, namely, by an Act of Parliament. He held therefore that no covenant in such a deed could have contemplated the complete severance of the relation of husband and wife which has now supervened, and that the wife cannot be held to have covenanted not to do what she now seeks to do. He held that by such a covenant she is not debarred from seeking relief "under a statute applicable to her present plight" not contemplated previously. He adds that in his opinion if there were an express undertaking by a wife in this country that she would not sue her husband for maintenance, such a bargain would be evidence of collusion if he should be guilty of subsequent adultery; and, looking forward, I think he expresses an intention that he would not enforce it against her. The comment, however, appears to me to remain good—that the basis of the decision in the case of Hughes v. Hughes does not cover that of Hyman v. Hyman where the difference between the law as to divorce in England and Ireland is not relevant.

In reviewing the cases which have been cited to us in the argument, it is not unimportant to note that agreements providing for the prospective separation of the spouses have been held consistently to be invalid. See Westmeath v. Salisbury (5 Bligh's New Rep., 339), Cartwright v. Cartwright (3 De G.M. & G., 982), In re Hope Johnstone (20 The Times L.R., 282; [1904] 1 Ch., 470), Harrison v. Harrison (26 The Times L.R., 29; [1910] 1 K.B., 35, at p. 40). The principle of these decisions appears to be that provision for the disruption of the association in married life ought to be discouraged. But a deed of separation entered into at the time when the separation takes place and regulating the terms on which the spouses are to live apart is good. See the judgment of Lord Westbury in Hunt v. Hunt (4 De G.F. & J., 221—following Wilson v. Wilson, 5 H.L. Cas., 40)—where a covenant by a husband that he would not compel his wife to cohabit or live with him was enforced, and an injunction granted to prevent the husband from continuing proceedings for the restitution of conjugal rights.

In Marshall v. Marshall (5 P.D., 19) a wife was held bound by her covenant not to sue her husband for restitution of conjugal rights, contained in a deed of separation, and a suit instituted by her in breach of her covenant was dismissed. Sir James Hannen followed Hunt v. Hunt (supra) and applied it to prevent a wife from taking proceedings. In Besant v. Wood (12 Ch.D., 605), which was decided shortly after Marshall v. Marshall (supra) (which is referred to in it) Sir George Jessel took the same course, and also held that the husband was not disabled from enforcing the covenant of his wife by reason of trifling breaches of covenant on his part.

The recognition of covenants in deeds of separation was carried to a high point in Charlesworth v. Holt (L.R. 9 Ex. 38), where the Court of Exchequer enforced a covenant on the part of a husband to pay an annuity for his wife's support "during their joint lives and so long as they should live separate and apart," notwithstanding that the marriage had been dissolved subsequently in consequence of the wife's adultery. The Court construed the covenant as absolute in its terms. There were no terms limiting the liability to the period during which the marriage remained undissolved. It is to be observed, however, that the action in that case was brought by the trustees with whom the covenant was entered into, and who brought their action for non-payment to them. The plea setting forth the wife's adultery, and the dissolution of the marriage in consequence of it, was held bad, as affording no answer to the action by the trustees, for the liability of the husband was not limited by the terms of the deed to the duration of the marriage tie. It was thus held that his liability to the trustees was not determined. Whether that case would be, or ought to be, now decided in the same way appears to me to be open to grave question. It was decided in 1873, some fifteen years after the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1857, came into operation, and the decision appears to conflict with more recent decisions.

Three cases which involved the question as to the effect of a deed of separation upon the rights of the spouses to apply for permanent alimony came before Sir James Hannen at short intervals of time, and in all of them he decided that the deed did not prevent an order for permanent maintenance from being made on the usual basis. In Benyon v. Benyon (1 P.D., 447) the petitioner, who was the husband, had accepted a covenant by his wife in the deed of separation between them, dated December 30, 1872, to pay to him £100 a year. Afterwards the marriage was dissolved by a decree made absolute on July 31, 1874; and on December 2, 1874, the husband petitioned the Court for an order for a larger payment out of his wife's income under 22 and 23 Victoria, Chapter 61, section 5, which is now replaced by section 192 of the Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925. Sir James Hannen decided that he was to be paid out of his wife's income £300 per annum for his life. The objection was taken that after a sum had been fixed for his maintenance the husband was not at liberty to come to the Court and ask for a variation of the settlement and payment of an increased sum. The learned Judge overruled that objection, on grounds which he affirmed later in his careful judgment in Gandy v. Gandy (7 P.D., 77), and relied upon the change of conditions between the time when husband and wife live apart under the agreement, and the time when they are no longer husband and wife. It is true that there was no covenant by the husband in Benyon v. Benyon (supra) not to take proceedings to compel an allowance of a larger sum, but there was such a covenant in Gandy v. Gandy (supra), and Sir James Hannen decided the latter case and followed his previous decision in Benyon v. Benyon (supra) on reasoning which does not lay stress upon the presence or absence of such a covenant. After Benyon v. Benyon (supra) Morrall v. Morrall (6 P.D., 98) was decided in 1881. The wife had covenanted in a deed of separation to accept certain sums as a provision for her support, and not to sue her husband for any further maintenance. Afterwards the marriage was dissolved on the ground of the husband's adultery. I have had the papers in that case brought from the Registry, as the report of the case is incomplete in some particulars. The adultery was committed with the wife's niece and so was "incestuous," giving the wife a right under section 27 of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1857, to seek relief upon the ground of that adultery alone. The deed of separation was dated August 1, 1879, and the adultery charged was subsequent to the deed—in the later part of August and in the following months. There were, however, no facts which rendered the case peculiar as to the husband's misconduct, save only that the adultery was committed with a woman within the prohibited degrees of consanguinity or affinity to the husband. Sir James Hannen held that the wife was entitled to the usual order for maintenance in spite of her covenant in the deed, because a state of things arose "not in contemplation when the deed was executed, and the wife is not restrained by the deed. Circumstances now justify her in bringing a suit for dissolution of marriage, and she is entitled to all the incidents of that suit."

Then came Gandy v. Gandy (supra) in 1882, where there was a separation on the terms of a deed and there was a covenant in it by the wife not to take proceedings for a larger allowance of alimony than that provided by the deed. The husband subsequently committed adultery and the wife obtained a decree for judicial separation and asked for increased alimony. Sir James Hannen applied his observations in Benyon v. Benyon (supra), mutatis mutandis, to the case before him—namely, that the considerations which may have led to the acceptance of a smaller sum in a deed of separation did not disentitle the spouse to proceed to enforce a larger claim based upon new circumstances not contemplated when the deed was entered into. And he adds (7 P.D., at p. 82): "I held in Morrall v. Morrall (supra) that the deed was executed on the basis of the facts which existed at its date, and that the subsequent adultery of the respondent created a different state of facts, which was not in contemplation of the parties when entering into the deed, and that therefore the petitioner was no longer bound by it." This judgment was reversed in the Court of Appeal (7 P.D., 168). In the judgments attention is called to the fact that the decree of the Court was for a judicial separation, based no doubt on the husband's adultery after the separation deed had been entered into, but the decree was for a judicial separation and not for the dissolution of the marriage. Lord Justice Lindley propounded the question before the Court as being whether there had been any sufficient reasons given for holding the wife discharged from her covenant not to sue for further alimony. Further he added (7 P.D., at p. 175):—"This being only a suit for judicial separation, the power of the Divorce Court over these deeds is much less than it would be after a decree for dissolution of marriage. It is a much more restricted jurisdiction and power, and it appears to me that the cases, of which Morrall v. Morrall (supra) is one, where the Divorce Court has dealt with separation deeds after decrees for dissolution of marriage, are rather misleading, when they are applied, or sought to be applied, in a case where the Court has no such extensive jurisdiction."

It must be observed that, although Morrall v. Morrall (supra) is thus referred to, no suggestion is made that it was wrongly decided. The Lord Justice holds that it is not pertinent to a case of judicial separation. No comment is made that the reasoning of Sir James Hannen was wrong when he held, in the passage which I have already quoted, that a different state of facts arose out of the subsequent adultery of the husband, over which the separation deed exercised no restrictive power. I note that observations to the same effect as to the attitude of the Court of Appeal to Morrall v. Morrall (supra) were made by Sir Francis Jeune in Bishop v. Bishop and Judkins v. Judkins (13 The Times L.R., 366; [1897] P., 138, at pp. 144 and 145).

In Wilkinson v. Wilkinson (69 L.T., 459), decided in 1893, Sir F. Jeune made an order for permanent maintenance, and neglected a term in a deed on the same ground as expressed in Morrall v. Morrall (supra), that the wife was entitled to what follows from divorce.

I return now to the cases of Bishop v. Bishop and Judkins v. Judkins (supra), but I may, by way of preface, say that I do not think that sections 191 and 192 of the Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925, replacing the similar sections in the previous Acts, touch the present question or afford any solution of it. The argument that the principle of these restrictive agreements is "contrary to public policy" does not weigh with me, for the reasons given by Sir George Jessel (Master of the Rolls) in Gandy v. Gandy (supra), and there is much force in the observation made by counsel that public policy requires that contracts should be kept and covenants fulfilled.

In Bishop v. Bishop (supra) there was an agreement made between the parties on March 20, 1894, at the time when a petition by the wife for dissolution of the marriage was by consent dismissed, whereby the wife "agrees to accept £130 per annum by way of permanent maintenance, this sum to include the maintenance of the child. The said allowance to be paid by Mr. Walter Harry Bishop, the respondent, by monthly payments during their joint lives. This allowance to be paid in any event, whether they remain married or whether the marriage should hereafter be dissolved." There was no express covenant not to take proceedings to compel payment of any further sum for maintenance. Afterwards, in 1895, a petition was presented by the wife for the dissolution of the marriage on the ground of later adultery and desertion, and on November 19, 1895, she was granted a decree nisi, which was made absolute on June 8, 1896. Afterwards she presented a petition for permanent maintenance, to which the husband made answer by pleading the agreement of March, 1894. The Registrar reported that the agreement was a bar to the petition and the matter came before Sir Francis Jeune, by way of appeal, on a motion to vary the report. The cases with which I have dealt were discussed. The President pointed out (page 144) that the reasoning on which Gandy v. Gandy (supra) turned in the Court of Appeal was "the difference between the power of the Court in judicial separation and in dissolution of marriage," and added that in his opinion the decision in Gandy v. Gandy (supra) "appears to me not to reverse, but to approve, the decision in Morrall v. Morrall" (supra). He therefore held that the Court could set aside any previous agreement between the parties and do complete justice between them in the matter, and ordered the inquiry as to the husband's means to proceed.

Judkins v. Judkins (supra) came before Mr. Justice Gorell Barnes. In that case there was a separation deed made on July 30, 1892, under which the husband agreed to pay the wife a yearly sum of £150, in addition to the sum to which she was entitled under her marriage settlement, and sums for the maintenance of the children of the marriage; but it did not contain any express covenant by the wife not to sue the husband for any further allowance or alimony than the £150 a year. In 1896 the wife obtained a decree for judicial separation on the ground of the adultery of the husband subsequent to the deed; and, upon the refusal by the Registrar of an application for permanent alimony and maintenance for the children of the marriage because of the terms of the deed, the matter came before the Judge. The case was one of judicial separation only, and not, as in Bishop v. Bishop (supra), of divorce. Mr. Justice Gorell Barnes reviewed the authorities and considered the effect of Morrall v. Morrall (supra) and Gandy v. Gandy (supra), but, even though the case was one of judicial separation only, he decided that he was not bound by Gandy v. Gandy (supra), and ordered the petition to proceed. His judgment turned in part on the absence of any covenant by the wife restraining her from seeking increased alimony, but his judgment cannot be set aside entirely upon that distinction, for he examines the authorities carefully, and incidentally calls attention to Tress v. Tress (12 P.D., 128), where Mr. Justice Hannen is reported to have said that the authority of Gandy v. Gandy (supra), was much shaken by what occurred when it came before the Court of Appeal the second time (30 Ch. D. 57). The basis of the first judgment in Gandy v. Gandy (supra), was explained by Lord Justice Bowen when it was before the Court of Appeal on the second occasion (see 30 Ch. D., at page 81)—in terms which make the case of little authority or assistance in the cases now before the Court.

In the Court of Appeal it was argued in both Bishop v. Bishop and Judkins v. Judkins (supra) that a new state of facts had arisen, since the agreements of separation had been entered into. In Bishop v. Bishop (supra) the wife had obtained a decree for dissolution of the marriage, and in Judkins v. Judkins (supra) a decree for a judicial separation had been made. All the cases were cited and considered. Lord Justice Lindley delivered the written judgment of the Court, which included Lord Justice A. L. Smith and Lord Justice Rigby. The two appeals in Gandy v. Gandy (supra) were reconciled; the later decision being justified by the new state of facts which had arisen in the course of the three years which had elapsed since the earlier decision, during which an order had been made giving the custody of the two youngest daughters to the wife, and the husband refused to support them. Lord Justice Lindley said it was very important to consider whether the Divorce Court had decreed a judicial separation or a dissolution of marriage, and in his summary of the effect of the first decision of Gandy v. Gandy (supra) stated expressly ([1897] P., at p. 162) that, "nothing was decided respecting any of the statutory powers of the Divorce Court in suits for dissolution of marriage," and laid it down ([1897] P., at p. 163) that Bishop v. Bishop (supra) "must turn on the power of the Divorce Court on a dissolution of marriage to compel a husband to provide for his divorced wife, and to make orders for the maintenance and education of the children." He then proceeds to consider the relevant sections of the statutes, and particularly the provisions now embodied in section 190 of the Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925. He definitely rejected the argument on behalf of the husband that all these matters—(the powers of the Court)—are to be disregarded and attention is only to be paid to the terms of the separation deed. "This cannot be right" is the unequivocal statement of the Court, to which is added—"The foregoing statutory powers amply justify the order under appeal," and so, on the ground "that the . . . statutory powers to which the Court has referred are ample to justify the order appealed from," the appeal in Bishop v. Bishop (supra) was dismissed.

The appeal in Judkins v. Judkins (supra) was likewise dismissed, but that case did not involve considerations so germane to the one before us as did Bishop v. Bishop (supra). I read this judgment, which is binding upon this Court, as explaining and limiting the effect of Gandy v. Gandy (supra), and pronouncing in clear terms that the statutory powers of the Court are not fettered by a covenant in an agreement for separation. Morrall v. Morrall (supra), which was brought to the attention of the Court, was not only not dissented from, but in effect approved.

Just as an agreement between husband and wife providing for a future separation was held void, so also it is not possible by a covenant in a deed of separation to bar a suit for judicial separation or for divorce. The Court is charged under the original Acts, and the Consolidation Act, to be satisfied in divorce suits that the case has been proved, that there has not been connivance or collusion for the purpose of obtaining a divorce "contrary to the justice of the case," that there has not been condonation; and that its interference is justified—see the historical survey of its jurisdiction given in Churchward v. Churchward (11 The Times L.R., 69; [1895] P., 7). The Court cannot forgo its duties, and it cannot be bound by an estoppel between the parties—"for the jurisdiction in matters of divorce is not affected by consent. No admission of cruelty or adultery, however formal, can bind the Court. The public interest does not allow parties to obtain divorce by consent, and the analogy of ordinary actions cannot be applied." See Harriman v. Harriman (25 The Times L.R., 291; [1909] P. 123, at pp. 131 and 132) per Lord Cozens-Hardy and also per Lord Justice Kennedy (at p. 156).

By parity of reasoning, a provision or stipulation attempting to shorten the arm of the Court in the exercise of its statutory powers by means of a covenant in a separation deed, when subsequently a marriage is dissolved by a decree absolute, is also ineffective. As Sir James Hannen said in Morrall v. Morrall (supra) the successful spouse is entitled to all the incidents of the suit and the Court will not allow its powers to be prevented.

The result is that, upon a decree being made absolute for the dissolution of the marriage, the effect of the deed of separation is gone, for the reason stated by Mr. Justice Gorell Barnes in Bishop v. Bishop ([1897] P., at p. 156), "that the parties are no longer living apart by agreement, but by the decree of the Court." Thus the wife is released from her restrictive covenant, and can proceed in the usual way to have it decided what sum she is to receive from her husband for permanent maintenance. What he is to pay must be determined according to what is "deemed to be reasonable" by the Divorce Court, under section 190, and the terms of the deed as to the sum agreed for maintenance may be considered in reaching a decision as to what sum he should be ordered to pay, for the Court is to have regard not only to the ability of her husband, but also to the conduct of the parties, in deeming what is reasonable. It is unnecessary and premature at the present stage to decide whether any term should be imposed upon the wife as was done in Reid v. Reid (42 The Times L.R., 30; [1926] P., 1).

For these reasons I am of opinion that both appeals should be dismissed with costs.

LORD JUSTICE SCRUTTON.—These two cases raise an important question as to the powers of the Divorce Court to grant maintenance after a decree absolute for divorce. Section 190 of the Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925, reproducing earlier statutes, provides that the Court may, if it thinks fit, on any decree for divorce secure to the wife such a gross or annual sum, or monthly or weekly payment, as it thinks reasonable, having regard to the wife's fortune, the ability of the husband and the conduct of the parties. Section 192 empowers the Court, where there are settlements, to vary the application of the property settled for the benefit of the children of the marriage or the parties thereto. Section 193 enables the Court, in any proceeding for divorce, to make monetary provision for the children of the marriage.

The question intended to be raised by these appeals is whether it is a sufficient ground, without any further inquiry into the circumstances, to stop the Court from exercising its statutory powers as to grants of maintenance after a decree absolute for divorce, to prove a contract in a separation deed between husband and wife for good consideration that the wife shall not in future make any application for maintenance in addition to or in substitution for the provisions, if any, contained in the agreement. This Court in these proceedings is not deciding what effect, if any, the Divorce Court should give to the previous agreement, when it comes to consider what order for maintenance, if any, it should make, after considering all the circumstances of the case, including the previous agreement. Nor is this Court considering whether, if the Divorce Court grants maintenance, it should make any order as to the continued validity of the deed of separation, as was done in Reid v. Reid (42 The Times L.R. 30; [1926] P., 1). The question is simply: does the contract in the separation deed not to take any further proceedings for maintenance, in itself and without more inquiry, bar the Court from hearing an application for maintenance after a decree for divorce, based on adultery subsequent to the separation deed?

I approach the matter from the point of view of the statutory authority of the Court, not of the private agreement of the parties. The Divorce Court is entrusted with a jurisdiction of national importance. The stability of the marriage tie, and the terms on which it should be dissolved, involve far wider considerations than the will or consent of the parties to the marriage. The Court does not, as other Courts do, act on mere consents or defaults of pleading, or mere admissions by the parties; nor does it readily act on uncorroborated confessions. When the full Court of Appeal in Harriman v. Harriman (25 The Times L.R., 291; [1909] P.,123) discussed the effect of estoppel of the parties on the jurisdiction of the Court, Lord Cozens-Hardy said ([1909] P., at p. 131): "The jurisdiction in matters of divorce is not affected by consent. No admission of cruelty or adultery, however formal, can bind the Court. The public interest does not allow parties to obtain divorce by consent, and the analogy of ordinary actions cannot be applied." (See also per Lord Justice Fletcher Moulton at page 142 and Lord Justice Farwell at page 144). In the King's Bench Division, if default is made in delivering a defence, the plaintiff is entitled to judgment on the allegations in the statement of claim, which are taken to be admitted without proof. In the Divorce Division the petitioner must prove his case, though the respondent does not defend. Many agreements between husband and wife will not be recognized, because they are contrary to public policy. An agreement to separate in three years' time, an agreement not to take divorce proceedings for future adultery, will not be enforced or recognized by the Court. Collusive or condoned adultery will not be a foundation for a petition for divorce. The alteration of the status of marriage involves considerations far beyond the private agreement of the parties. I entirely agree with the judgment of the Court of Appeal in Bishop v. Bishop and Judkins v. Judkins (13 The Times L.R., 366; [1897] P., 138), where it is said (at p. 164): "As regards permanent maintenance, section 32 of the Act of 1857 is very wide indeed, and it would not be right for this or any Court to put a narrow construction upon it, or to fetter in any way the Court or Judge entrusted with its application in cases of divorce. The section says that regard is to be had to the wife's fortune, to the ability of the husband, and to the conduct of the parties. The appellant contends that all these matters are to be disregarded, and attention is only to be paid to the terms of the separation deed. This cannot be right." A similar instance of the way in which the Court deals with private agreements affecting their jurisdiction is to be found in their attitude to arbitration clauses. Parties agree to refer all their disputes to arbitration in an agreed form. In breach of this agreement one party, instead of concurring in an arbitration, issues a writ. The Courts do not allow the private agreement to oust their jurisdiction, but consider in the light of all the circumstances, including the agreement of the parties and the importance of maintaining agreements, how the dispute can best be disposed of, and either stay or do not stay the action according to their views on the point. Cases like Scott v. Avery (5 H.L.C., 811) are only an apparent exception, for, as explained in Board of Trade v. Cayzer, Irvine and Co., Limited (43 The Times L.R., 625; [1927] A.C., 610, at p. 617), the parties have agreed that until agreed arbitrators have given a decision, there shall be no cause of action and no action shall lie in any Court whatever. This is not ousting the Courts of their jurisdiction, because they have no jurisdiction whatever, and no cause of action accrues, until arbitrators have given their decision.

Now it is agreed in the present case that there is no agreement of the parties which does, or could, stop the wife from asking for divorce in respect of adultery subsequent to the date of the separation deed. The Court has then full jurisdiction to dissolve the marriage. Dissolving the marriage, the Court has then the statutory power and duty of providing, at the expense of the adulterous husband, such maintenance for the woman who ceases to be a wife, and the children who have no longer a married couple to depend on, as the Court thinks proper after considering all the circumstances. If the private agreement of the parties before the adultery complained of cannot stop the proceedings for divorce, I do not understand how, without more, it can stop the incidental but necessary consequences of divorce, proper maintenance for the wife and children.

Assume a separation agreement with no provision for payment to the wife, but a covenant that in no circumstances shall she apply for maintenance: I do not understand on principle how that mere fact prevents the Court from exercising its statutory power. Indeed it is agreed that it cannot stop an application for maintenance for the children who have not contracted, even though the application is made by the wife who has contracted; and even though she has contracted not to ask for maintenance for the children. On principle, therefore, I should decide that the jurisdiction of the Court to grant proper maintenance is not excluded by the mere fact that the parties have made an agreement, before the adultery complained of, that the wife shall not apply for maintenance.

The authorities, such as they are, were discussed at great length before us. Four Presidents of the Divorce Division have, for varying reasons, all taken the view that in a case of divorce the agreement of the parties before the adultery complained of not to apply for maintenance, is not enough in itself to stop the Courts from granting maintenance under their statutory power. Sir James Hannen, in Benyon v. Benyon (1 P.D., 447, at p. 451) grounds his view on the change of circumstances. In Morrall v. Morrall (6 P.D., 98, at p. 100), he rests on two matters, "a state of things not in contemplation when the deed was executed," and that the grant of maintenance is incidental to a successful suit for dissolution of marriage, which the wife is entitled to bring. (See also Brown v. Brown and Shelton (L.R., 3 P. and D., 202)). This latter view seems to me a very cogent argument. I will deal with the earlier view later. Sir Francis Jeune, in Bishop v. Bishop (13 The Times L.R., 366: [1897] P., 138), where there was a covenant in the deed for maintenance for the wife, whether before or after dissolution of marriage, and a dissolution was ordered for subsequent adultery and desertion, granted maintenance partly on the ground of power to vary settlements, partly on the ground of public policy, partly on the ground that a child was not fully provided for. As stated later, this decision was affirmed by the Court of Appeal. Mr. Justice Gorell Barnes, afterwards President, in Judkins v. Judkins (13 The Times L.R., 366; [1897] P., 138, at p. 151), granted maintenance in a case of judicial separation after a separation deed providing for payments for maintenance, but with no covenant not to sue for further alimony, and ordered an increase of alimony after considering all the previous authorities. Lastly, Lord Merrivale, in the present case of Hughes v. Hughes, where the wife has received a house under a deed of separation and has covenanted not to sue for further maintenance, but has obtained a divorce for adultery subsequent to the separation, has granted the wife further maintenance. He has done so, as I understand, on the ground that the wife's covenant only applied while she was a wife, and ceased to operate when she was a divorced woman through the acts of her husband. It was said that this was contrary to Charlesworth v. Holt (L.R., 9 Ex., 38), decided in 1873, where it was held that in the absence of express words the husband's obligation in a separation deed to pay maintenance was not discharged by the dissolution of the marriage through the wife's adultery. It is not necessary to decide it, but since 1873 the doctrine of termination of the obligations of a contract, by the destruction of some state of things which was a fundamental though implied condition of the contract, has been much extended. It is enough to refer to the Coronation cases, and to the discussion of the whole matter in Metropolitan Water Board v. Dick, Kerr and Co. (34 The Times L.R., 113; [1918] A.C., 119). F. A. Tamplin Steamship Company, Limited v. Anglo-Mexican Petroleum Products Company, Limited, (32 The Times L.R., 677; [1916] 2 A.C., 397) was cited to us for the views of Lord Parker; but I think counsel had not followed its subsequent history, and the curious position of the judgments therein, the real majority of the Court being opposed to Lord Parker's views of the law (see Scrutton on Charterparties, 12th Edition, pp. 112 and 116, and the subsequent decision of Bank Line, Limited v. Capel and Co., 35 The Times L.R., 150; [1919] A.C., 435), and other cases proceed on different lines. I doubt very much whether Charlesworth v. Holt (supra) would now be decided in the same way, and whether the continued existence of the marriage tie would not be treated as an implied fundamental condition of the continuance of the obligations of the deed.

If this point should hereafter be discussed in an action based on a deed the decision in Wasteneys v. Wasteneys ([1900] A.C., 446) will of course have to be considered, with a reservation that that case also was before the development of the law in the Coronation cases and in the frustration cases during and after the War.

There remains to consider how far the Court of Appeal decisions have modified the practice of the Divorce Court as stated by its four Presidents. The two appeal decisions in Gandy v. Gandy (7 P.D., 168 and 30 Ch.D., 57) leave the authority of that case in a very unsatisfactory state. By a deed of separation, the wife and husband agreed (1) that the wife should not be entitled to the custody of the two younger children, but that the father should maintain them and settle to what school they should go, and where they should live; (2) that the husband should pay the wife an allowance of £250 a year for herself and the two elder daughters; (3) that the wife should not apply for further alimony. After the deed the husband committed fresh adultery. The wife thereupon applied for a judicial separation, and applied for and obtained, contrary to the provisions of the deed, the custody of the two younger children. She then applied for further alimony. Sir James Hannen held that the deed contained an implied dum casta clause, and granted her further alimony. He might have said, but did not, that as he had jurisdiction to grant judicial separation he had jurisdiction, if he thought just, to make orders ancillary on such a decree. The Court of Appeal held that a dum casta clause could not be implied and, being under the impression that the husband did not dispute his liability to maintain the younger children, thought that there was no change of circumstances, and dismissed the wife's petition. The husband then alleged that, as the custody given under the separation deed had been changed, he was not under liability to maintain the younger children. One of the children by her next friend brought a Chancery action to enforce the deed; Vice-Chancellor Bacon made a decree in her favour; the Court of Appeal, on appreciating how the change of custody had altered the situation, held (1) that neither the younger nor the elder children could enforce the deed; (2) that the wife could sue on it, and that in view of the change of custody, and the attitude of the husband, she should be allowed to present a petition for further alimony in spite of her covenant in the deed. She did so, and Mr. Justice Gorell Barnes, in Judkins v. Judkins (supra) states that the Divorce Court granted the wife on her application £750 alimony, being an increase of £500 on the amount named in the deed, and the Court of Appeal stayed the Chancery proceedings. The judgments of the Court distinguished proceedings for divorce from proceedings for judicial separation. Morrall v. Morrall (supra) is referred to without approval by Lord Justice Cotton and Lord Justice Lindley as based on an order dissolving the marriage. Even in judicial separation the wife was allowed to apply for and obtain an order for increased alimony, based no doubt on a change of circumstances as to the children, but also on an increase of her liability under the order for judicial separation, giving her the custody of and the duty to maintain the children, contrary to the deed. I should myself have thought the right of the Court to make orders for alimony contrary to the deed followed from and was incidental to their statutory right to make an order for judicial separation. But in any event it appears impossible to extract any restriction of the powers to grant maintenance, after an order dissolving the marriage, from Gandy v. Gandy (supra), in view of the express reservation of these powers, without disapproval of Morrall v. Morrall (supra) by the Court.

There remains the decision of the Court in the two cases of Bishop v. Bishop and Judkins v. Judkins (supra). Bishop v. Bishop (supra) was a case of an application for maintenance after a dissolution of marriage based on adultery, subject to a separation agreement containing a clause for payment of maintenance, but no covenant not to ask for further maintenance. Judkins v. Judkins (supra) was an application for maintenance after a decree for judicial separation based on adultery subsequent to a separation deed which contained a covenant to pay maintenance, but no covenant by the wife not to ask for further maintenance. The effect of the decision in Gandy v. Gandy (supra) was carefully considered, and the Court of Appeal held that nothing was decided in Gandy v. Gandy (supra) as to the statutory powers of the Court in suits for dissolution of marriage. Certainly nothing was decided in Bishop v. Bishop (supra) limiting that power. Morrall v. Morrall (supra) was not doubted in any way. The passage already referred to in the judgment of the Court ([1897] P., at p. 164) says that the contention cannot be right that attention is only to be paid to the terms of the separation deed, and not to the wife's fortune, the ability of the husband, and the conduct of the parties. But the contention which "cannot be right" is the contention of the appellants in the present cases. They allege that on the attention of the Court being called to a covenant by the wife, before the adultery complained of, not to ask for further maintenance, the Court should at once hold its hand and give no consideration to the other matters which by statute they ought to consider. I think their contention is wrong, that there is nothing in the two Court of Appeal decisions to impugn the practice of the four experienced Presidents of the Divorce Division already referred to, and that such practice is correct in principle for the reasons which I have stated.

I repeat that nothing in this decision fetters the discretion of the Court as to what effect they should give to the separation deed, when they come to consider the matters which they are directed by statute to consider, including "the conduct of the parties." I only decide that the mere fact of a covenant in a separation deed not to ask for further maintenance does not in itself and without more oust the jurisdiction of the Court to consider an application for further maintenance. The appeals in my opinion should be dismissed with costs.

Lord Justice Lawrence.—Hyman v. Hyman.—The two main questions which arise on this appeal are:—First, whether on the true construction of the separation deed the covenant by the wife not to endeavour to compel the husband to allow her any alimony or maintenance further than the agreed allowance of £20 a week is limited in duration to the existence of the marriage tie, or continues after the dissolution of that tie in the lifetime of the spouses; and secondly whether, if on the construction of the deed the covenant extends beyond the existence of the marriage tie, it binds the wife in the event of her obtaining a decree for divorce, or whether in that event she is released from her obligation and the Court is at liberty to disregard her covenant. Although these two questions are, in my opinion, separate and distinct questions, counsel for the wife seem to me to have shown a tendency to mix them up and confuse the one with the other. I propose to deal first with the construction of the deed. It contains a covenant to pay the agreed allowance to the wife during her life and a covenant by the wife that neither she nor any person on her behalf would at any time thereafter endeavour to compel the husband to allow her any further maintenance or alimony.

These two covenants are, in my opinion, reciprocal, the obvious intention of the parties, as gathered from the deed, being that, so long as the husband remains liable under his covenant to pay the agreed allowance, the wife will not endeavour to compel him to allow her any further alimony or maintenance. The only provision contained in the deed terminating the operation of these two covenants is in case the husband and the wife should at any time thereafter resume cohabitation. The deed contains no provision that the parties should live apart in chastity and no such provision will be implied. Therefore the husband's covenant to pay the agreed allowance remains operative notwithstanding the subsequent adultery of the wife (see Fearon v. Earl of Aylesford, 1 The Times L.R., 68; 14 Q.B.D., 792), and the wife's covenant not to endeavour to compel the husband to make her a further allowance remains operative notwithstanding the subsequent adultery of the husband (see Gandy v. Gandy, 7 P.D., 168).

There is no provision in the deed (such as is not uncommonly contained in separation deeds) terminating the operation of these two covenants in the event of a dissolution of the marriage, and it would in my opinion be contrary to well settled principles to imply any such provision in the present case.

Lord Parker in F. A. Tamplin Steamship Company, Limited v. Anglo-Mexican Petroleum Products Company, Limited (32 The Times L.R., 677; [1916] 2 A.C., 397) points out that the principle underlying all cases in which a contract has been held to determine, upon the happening of some event which frustrates the object which the parties have in view, is a principle of contract law depending upon some condition to be implied in the contract itself, and that it is impossible to imply any such condition if it be inconsistent with the express provisions of the contract, or with the intention of the parties as gathered from those provisions, and, further, that it is more difficult to imply a condition subsequent defeating the contract when it is partly performed than a condition precedent before its execution has commenced.

In the present case the separation deed was clearly intended to remain operative after the dissolution of the marriage tie, as in the event of the husband predeceasing the wife his covenant to pay the allowance remains binding on his estate during the remainder of her life. It cannot therefore be said that the deed was based on the continued existence of the marriage tie. Both the husband's covenant and the wife's covenant are absolute in terms, and there is no provision in the deed terminating either of them except the single condition in case of the resumption of co-habitation. This express condition, in my opinion, negatives an implied term that either of the covenants should terminate in some other event not specified in the deed, such as the dissolution of the marriage tie by a decree for divorce. Either the omission of such a provision was intentional or else (as I think may probably have been the case here) it was due to the fact that a divorce was not in the contemplation of the parties. In either case, however, the parties cannot, in my opinion, be considered as having intended that such a provision should be implied. The principle that no condition will be implied restricting liability under a covenant absolute in terms on the happening of an event not in the contemplation of the parties was considered in the Court of Appeal in Fearon v. Earl of Aylesford (supra). There the parties had entered into a deed of separation which did not contain a dum casta clause, and the husband contended that such a clause ought to be implied, as otherwise the deed would be against public policy. Sir William Baliol Brett (the Master of the Rolls) (14 Q.B.D., at p. 799), says: "Now I entirely agree that when a covenant is made between two persons in plain terms, from which the only inference to be drawn is that they intended what they have said, it is a most dangerous doctrine to introduce into that covenant, unless one is forced to do it by almost inevitable necessity, another covenant which, everybody must know, the parties did not intend to introduce, on the ground that, unless it be introduced, the contract between the parties is against public policy," and Lord Justice Cotton after referring to the fact that, although a dum casta clause was not by any means unusual in separation deeds, yet it had not been inserted in the deed in that case, proceeds as follows (14 Q.B.D., at p. 807): "It is very true that we cannot suppose the parties here to have had in their minds that there would be unchastity on the part of the wife, but they have omitted to make a provision for that which was not in their minds, namely, the fact of her leading an unchaste life. There have been decisions during the last fifty years . . . that adultery alone on the part of the wife is not an answer to her claim to be paid her annuity; and in my opinion this fact shows that the parties cannot be considered as having intended that the provisions against unchastity should be implied." Lord Justice Lindley stated that he was of the same opinion, and in the result the Court declined to imply a provision restricting the liability of the husband under his covenant to so long as the wife should remain chaste.

The same principle has been applied in cases where it has been sought to imply a provision in separation deeds restricting the liability of the husband, under a covenant absolute in terms, to such time as the marriage tie should be subsisting and should not have been dissolved by a decree for divorce, for example the cases of Goslin v. Clark (12 C.B., N.S., 681) and Charlesworth v. Holt (L.R., 9 Ex., 38).

In Goslin v. Clark (supra) the separation deed was executed before the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1857, had been passed, and therefore before the Court had power to grant a decree for divorce. After the Act had become law, the husband obtained a divorce on the ground of his wife's adultery, committed before the separation deed, and then contended that his liability under his covenant to pay her an annuity during her life had terminated, on the ground that a provision ought to be implied in the deed restricting his liability to such time as the marriage tie remained undissolved. The Court of Common Pleas decided against the husband's contention. Mr. Justice Williams, after referring to the terms of the covenant and pointing out that the husband, having covenanted for himself, his executors and administrators, did not contemplate that the annuity should be only commensurate with the period during which the wife was fulfilling the character of his wife, because it was to continue when she should become his widow, when his obligation to support her would be at an end, proceeds as follows: "The Divorce Act 20 and 21 Victoria, chapter 85, not having then passed, the notion of a dissolution of the marriage must have been altogether out of the mind of the defendant. The intention was that the wife should have an annuity of £100 for the term of her life, provided she complied with the condition imposed and led a chaste and moral life. We cannot allow the husband by his own act to absolve himself from his engagement."

In Charlesworth v. Holt (supra) the husband covenanted to pay to the trustees of the deed an annuity for his wife's support "during their joint lives and so long as they should live separate and apart." The trustees brought an action for arrears of the annuity, and the husband, who had obtained a divorce on the ground of his wife's subsequent adultery, defended the claim, on the ground that his covenant was impliedly limited to the subsistence of the marriage tie, and that, as that tie had been dissolved by a decree for divorce, he was no longer liable. The Court of Exchequer decided against the husband. Chief Baron Kelly says (L.R., 9 Ex. at p., 40): "The husband might in this case have introduced express words limiting his liability to the period during which Lucy Holt remained his wife. But there are no such words, and Mr. Holker has not satisfied me that any words are used which necessarily imply that the covenant is only to be binding during the continuance of the marriage tie. It is impossible for the Court to add such a term to the contract. If the contract were to be so construed, it would be possible for the husband, by giving grounds to his wife for a petition for divorce against him, to put an end to his liability. Suppose, for example, he were guilty of adultery and desertion, and the wife obtained a decree for dissolution, he would be freed by means of his own misconduct. We certainly ought not, unless constrained by express words or clear implication, so to interpret the contract." Baron Bramwell in giving judgment to the same effect says (inter alia): "It is plain that a divorce was not in the contemplation of either party; but I nevertheless see nothing to restrict the operation of the defendant's covenant, except the single condition that Lucy Holt and himself shall be living separate and apart."

The decision in Fearon v. Earl of Aylesford (supra) shows that no provision restricting the husband's liability under a covenant absolute in terms will be implied on the ground that the covenant, unless so restricted, would or might be against public policy. And the same cases of Goslin v. Clark (supra) and Charlesworth v. Holt (supra) show that no provision restricting the husband's liability under a covenant absolute in terms will be implied on the ground that such covenant, when contained in a separation deed, ought to be construed as being commensurate only with the period during which the wife is fulfilling the character of wife.

In my judgment, the principle upon which these cases were decided applies equally to a covenant by a wife not to sue the husband for further maintenance, and accordingly no provision restricting the operation of such a covenant, if absolute in terms, ought to be implied either on the ground that, unless so restricted, the covenant might be against public policy, or on the ground that the covenant ought to be construed as being commensurate only with the period during which the husband is fulfilling the character of husband; for the reasons stated, that, on the true construction of the separation deed in the present case, the wife's covenant not to endeavour to compel the husband to allow her any further maintenance is not, either expressly or implicitly, limited in duration to the existence of the marriage tie, and accordingly that as a matter of construction the covenant continues operative after the dissolution of that tie in the lifetime of the spouses.

I now turn to the second question in the case—namely, whether the covenant so construed ceases to be binding on the wife on her obtaining a divorce, and whether the Court in such an event is at liberty to disregard it. This question is one of general importance, not only because the covenant in question is a common form covenant inserted in almost every separation deed from the earliest times, but also because since the passing of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1923, a wife can obtain a divorce on the ground of her husband's adultery alone. If (as counsel for the wife in the present case have strenuously contended) a wife is precluded from entering into a binding contract not to apply for further maintenance during the rest of her life, she will be placed at a serious disadvantage when bargaining for an allowance from her husband, who is not likely to make her a generous allowance, or an allowance during the whole of her life, if after a divorce she could disregard her obligations under the deed and use the allowance which the husband has agreed to make as a means of obtaining a larger allowance from the Court.

The only two grounds urged before the Court in support of the wife's contention on this point are, first, that the covenant is against public policy, and therefore unenforceable, and, secondly, that it constitutes an interference with the discretionary powers conferred on the Court in case of a decree for divorce, and that therefore the Court can and ought to disregard it.

Before dealing more in detail with each of these grounds it is necessary to mention certain facts in Hyman v. Hyman which have a direct bearing on the question under consideration. At the date of the separation deed, adultery alone on the part of the husband did not furnish a valid ground for a decree for divorce at the instance of the wife, and it was not until four years later when the Act of 1923 was passed that the wife acquired the right to divorce her husband for adultery alone. The circumstances under which the deed of separation was executed have not changed. At the date of the deed the husband was living in adultery with the same woman as the one with whom he was proved to have committed the acts of adultery which formed the foundation of the decree for divorce. The only alteration which had taken place subsequently to the deed was the passing of the Act which granted the new remedy of divorce to the wife. The divorce proceedings were, in the opinion of the learned Judge who made the decree for divorce, taken by the wife with the object of enabling her to apply to the Court for increased maintenance under section 190 of the Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925.

The position, therefore, is that the wife, after having accepted the benefits of the deed (which besides the weekly allowance of £20 included the payment to her of two substantial sums of money) is now seeking, by reason of her own act, to which the husband is not a consenting party, to deprive him of the benefit of her covenant, on the sole ground of his subsequent acts of adultery with the same woman with whom he was living in adultery when the deed was executed, which acts, but for the passing of the statute of 1923, would not have furnished any valid reason for releasing his wife from her covenant.

Next it is to be observed that the wife is not asking the Court to exercise any of its powers in relation to the custody, maintenance, or education of any children of the marriage. It seems to me obvious that no agreement between the spouses purporting to affect the rights or interests of children would bind the children, or operate to prevent any application from being made on their behalf to the Court to exercise its powers in their favour. Nor is the wife asking the Court to exercise its power to vary settlements. Even if the deed of separation be a settlement within the meaning of section 192 of the Act, the Court could not in the present case make any order varying such settlement which would benefit the wife, as the scope of that section is limited to a variation of the application of the property settled, the whole of which she has received and is still receiving, and the Court is not empowered either to strike out the wife's covenant not to sue for further alimony or maintenance or to compel the husband to bring any further property into settlement.

It is also to be observed that the husband has not committed any breach of his obligations under the deed, nor has he done any other act which would disentitle him to enforce the wife's covenant in a Court of Equity.

To deal now with the question whether the wife's covenant is against public policy, it is, of course, well settled that all provisions, whether made before or after marriage, for a future separation of the spouses or for a future dissolution of the marriage contract are void on the ground of public policy. "It is forbidden to provide for the possible dissolution of the marriage contract, which the policy of the law is to preserve intact and inviolate" (per Vice-Chancellor Page Wood in H. v. W. (3 K. and J., 382)). To allow validity to provisions for a future separation would be to allow the parties in effect to make the contract of marriage determinable on conditions fixed beforehand by themselves (see Pollock on Contracts, 9th Edition, page 378). This principle is applicable both to provisions for a future separation, judicial or other, and to provisions for a future divorce. On the other hand, it is equally well settled that a contract providing for and arranging the terms of an immediate separation is good and enforceable. It is made to meet a state of things which, however undesirable in itself, has in fact become inevitable (see Pollock on Contracts, 9th Edition, page 377). It has, however, never been decided whether express provisions contained in a separation deed for what is to happen in the event of a future judicial separation or of a future divorce are or are not void as against public policy, but the Court of Appeal in Bishop v. Bishop (13 The Times L.R., 366; [1897] P. 138) considered such provisions to be of doubtful validity.

If therefore the deed in the present case had contained an express covenant that in the event of the wife thereafter obtaining a divorce she should not apply for any further maintenance, it might be that such a covenant would be held to be void as against public policy, and as coming within the first of the principles to which I have referred, but I express no opinion on this point as it does not arise in the present case. It was not and could not be suggested that in the present case the deed was framed and designed with the express object of regulating the affairs of the spouses in the event of a future divorce. The most that can be said here is that the parties have not inserted a provision terminating the wife's covenant on a future dissolution of the marriage, and I fail to see that there is anything against public policy in not inserting such a provision or in holding the wife to the clear terms of her bargain. In my opinion, the contention that the wife's covenant is void because it amounts in effect to a licence to the husband to commit adultery cannot successfully be maintained, in view of the authorities which I have mentioned. The grounds stated by Lord Justice Cotton in Fearon v. Earl of Aylesford (14 Q.B.D., at p. 808) for rejecting the contention that a husband's covenant to pay an annuity, continuing after the wife's adultery, would be contrary to public policy and therefore void, apply with equal force to the similar contention in respect of the wife's covenant in the present case. In the result, for the reasons stated, I am of opinion that the contention that the wife's covenant in the present case is against public policy, and therefore unenforceable, is not well founded.

There remains the question whether the Court is at liberty to disregard the wife's covenant because it constitutes an attempted interference with the powers conferred on the Divorce Court. In presenting their argument on this question, counsel for the wife seem to me to have lost sight of the distinction between a contract not to invoke the aid of the Court and a contract purporting to control or regulate the mode in which the Court should exercise its powers after its aid has been properly invoked. Before the Judicature Acts it was the common practice of the Courts of Equity to grant injunctions restraining proceedings in Courts of Common Law and in the Divorce Court in breach of covenant. This practice was altered by section 24 (5) of the Supreme Court of Judicature Act, 1873, which provided that no injunction restraining proceedings in the High Court was in future to be granted, but every matter of equity on which an injunction against the prosecution of any such proceedings might formerly have been obtained might be relied upon by way of defence. This section was re-enacted by section 41 of the Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925. The question therefore resolves itself into whether before the Supreme Court of Judicature Act, 1873, a Court of Equity would have granted an injunction to restrain the wife from applying to the Divorce Court for further maintenance in breach of her covenant. If it would have done so, it is, in my opinion, the plain duty of the Divorce Court to give effect to her covenant by declining to entertain her application.

If the wife's covenant on the true construction of the separation deed is not limited in duration to the existence of the marriage tie, and if the covenant is not void as being against public policy, I have the greatest difficulty in appreciating on what grounds a Court of Equity could formerly have refused to enforce it by injunction, or on what grounds the Divorce Court can now refuse to give effect to it. Section 190 of the Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925, confers powers on the Divorce Court to grant maintenance to a wife on a decree for divorce or nullity of marriage and to grant alimony to a wife on a decree for restitution of conjugal rights or judicial separation. Obviously the Divorce Court can only exercise these powers on being applied to for that purpose by the wife, who is the only person interested in procuring the Court to exercise these powers which are conferred solely for her benefit. In the absence of any contract to the contrary, the wife is free to make an application for maintenance on obtaining a divorce, or not to make such an application, just as she pleases. No third party can make such an application on her behalf, unless she is under some disability, and neither the Court nor any third party can compel her to make such an application. Then why is not the wife at liberty to contract not to make such an application? One strange result of holding that she is precluded from making such a contract would be that she could not, after having presented a petition for maintenance, compromise the proceedings, but would have to prosecute them to judgment. Another result would be that a wife could not, between the decree nisi and the decree absolute, come to an agreement with the husband on the question of maintenance, a course which counsel for the husband asserted was often adopted in practice.

If, contrary to my opinion, the Divorce Court could exercise its powers under section 190 without any application for that purpose being made to it by the wife, the wife's covenant in the present case does not purport to prevent the Court from so doing, as the covenant only prevents the wife from taking any steps herself to obtain an order for further maintenance. That, however, is not the question which the Court is considering on this appeal. Here the sole question is whether the wife, having contracted not to endeavour to compel the husband to make her any further allowance, and having, in direct breach of that covenant, presented a petition to the Divorce Court with the avowed object of endeavouring to obtain an order compelling the husband to make her a further allowance, ought to be allowed to proceed with that petition. Assuming the validity of the covenant, such a proceeding would, in my opinion, undoubtedly have been restrained by a Court of Equity before the Supreme Court of Judicature Act, 1873, and, therefore, the Divorce Court ought not to allow the petition to proceed.

The grounds on which the Courts of Equity formerly acted when enforcing covenants of this nature rest, in my opinion, on well-established principles—namely, first, that any person who is competent to enter into a binding contract may agree to renounce the advantage of a statutory provision made solely for his or her individual benefit; and, secondly, that no person is entitled to accept the benefits of a contract and repudiate the obligations. These principles have been applied by Courts of Equity to contracts renouncing advantages conferred by the Matrimonial Causes Acts.

In Hunt v. Hunt (4 De G.F. and J., 221), Lord Westbury, after stating that separation deeds are to be treated as ordinary contracts capable of being enforced at common law, decided that it was the duty of a Court of Equity to interfere by its injunction and restrain the breach of a covenant by a husband not to institute a suit for the restitution of conjugal rights, on the ground that the power conferred on the husband to institute such a suit was a private remedy and a private right belonging to the husband which he could contract to renounce.

In Williams v. Baily (L.R., 2 Eq., 731) the Court declined to grant an interlocutory injunction to restrain the wife, who had presented a petition for a judicial separation, from proceeding with an application for alimony pendente lite in breach of a covenant in a separation deed (which covenant was in practically identical terms with the covenant in the present case) entered into by trustees on behalf of the wife, on the sole ground that it was not shown to the satisfaction of the Court that the wife had acted on the deed so as to preclude herself from taking the proceedings. The Court accordingly directed the motion to stand over until the hearing of the cause but required the wife to give an undertaking to deal with any alimony which she might be awarded as that Court should direct. The reason why the undertaking was exacted seems clear. The Vice-Chancellor had refused interlocutory relief, but the right to the injunction might be established at the trial. Meanwhile, the wife might have obtained an order for alimony which she ought not to have applied for. It was necessary, therefore, to put her under the terms of the undertaking. In delivering his judgment, Vice-Chancellor Page Wood stated the principles upon which Courts of Equity act in cases of this kind in no uncertain terms as follows:—"There can be no doubt that deeds of this description are perfectly valid, nor can there be any doubt that they can be enforced against the wife, who is not entitled to 'approbate and reprobate,' or, in other words, to accept the benefits and repudiate the obligations."

In Besant v. Wood (12 Ch.D., 605) the Master of the Rolls held that a wife had the right to contract to live apart from her husband, and that the husband could enforce such a contract against her, and accordingly granted an injunction to restrain the wife from applying to the Divorce Court for a decree for restitution of conjugal rights in violation of a covenant on her behalf contained in a separation deed. The basis of this decision was that the right conferred on a married woman to institute a suit for restitution of conjugal rights involves a right not only to compromise after she has commenced a suit, but also to compromise before the litigation has begun, and that, therefore, her contract not to institute such a suit was valid and enforceable.

In Marshall v. Marshall (5 P.D., 19), Sir James Hannen dismissed the wife's suit for restitution of conjugal rights, brought by her in breach of a covenant contained in a separation deed, on the ground that, before the Supreme Court of Judicature Act, 1873, a Court of Equity would have granted an injunction to restrain the wife from taking such proceedings.

In Rose v. Rose (8 P.D., 98) the Master of the Rolls stated: "As was pointed out in Besant v. Wood (supra), unless a married woman was allowed to contract herself out of her rights in the Divorce Court, no proceedings in that Court could ever be compromised, but must be fought out to the end."

In the case of Morrall v. Morrall (6 P.D., 98), which was much relied upon by counsel for the wife, Sir James Hannen held that a wife who had obtained a decree for divorce on the ground of her husband's incestuous adultery was entitled to apply for and obtain the usual order for permanent maintenance, notwithstanding that she had by a separation deed agreed to accept certain sums of money and not to sue her husband for any further maintenance. The reasons given by the learned President for his decision were that a state of things had arisen which was not in the contemplation of the parties when the deed was executed; that the separation deed was not a licence to the husband to commit adultery, incestuous or other, and that, while the deed continued, the wife was entitled to no more than what was stipulated for by it, but that when it had been established that the husband had been guilty of incestuous adultery she was no longer restrained by the deed. These reasons are, in my opinion, unconvincing. They are based, first, on an implied condition in the separation deed terminating the wife's covenant in the event of the husband's committing incestuous adultery, and, secondly, on the wife's covenant being in effect a licence to the husband to commit adultery. I shall have to revert to this decision later but desire to state here that both of these reasons are in my opinion unsound and would not formerly have furnished any ground in a Court of Equity for the refusal of an injunction.

Then came the first case of Gandy v. Gandy (7 P.D., 77). In that case the separation deed contained a covenant that the wife would not take any proceedings to compel the husband to allow her any further alimony beyond an agreed sum. The husband subsequently committed adultery, and the wife obtained a decree for judicial separation and thereupon applied to the Court for increased alimony. Sir James Hannen held that the subsequent adultery of the husband deprived him of the right to have the restraining provisions of the deed enforced. The grounds upon which the learned President based his decisions were those stated by him in Morrall v. Morrall (supra) which, after consideration, he reaffirmed, observing that to hold otherwise would make the contract extend to a state of things not in the contemplation of the parties, and moreover would amount to a licence to the husband to commit adultery for the rest of his life without subjecting himself to any liabilities beyond those imposed by the deed. The learned President added that, in all cases such as that, it was implied in the contract contained in the deed that it had reference only to the parties being separated, without more, and not to their living apart in the state of adultery, and that the deed must be construed as an agreement that the parties should live apart in chastity. It is quite plain from the judgment delivered by the learned President that he drew no distinction between the case where the wife had obtained a decree for divorce and the case where she had obtained a decree for judicial separation, and that, in his opinion, the same reasons applied to the one as to the other.

The first case of Gandy v. Gandy went to the Court of Appeal (7 P.D., 168), and the learned President's decision was unanimously reversed. The Master of the Rolls, Sir George Jessel, in the course of his judgment, after pointing out that it was settled law that the husband's covenant was not affected by his subsequent adultery, and that the Legislature had not given the Court power to vary settlements in cases of judicial separation as it had done in cases of divorce, and that therefore the separation deed remained binding, proceeded to consider the question whether the Court could interfere with the contract except when one of the parties had so acted as to disentitle him to rely upon the contract at all. As regards the President's opinion that it would be against public policy if the wife's covenant were to be held to continue after the decree for judicial separation, the Master of the Rolls, after remarking that there was no reason more dangerous to give, stated his reasons for arriving at the conclusion that a continuance of the wife's obligations under her covenant would not be against public policy. The Master of the Rolls further arrived at the conclusion that the adultery of the husband did not amount to misconduct on his part so affecting the position of the wife as to entitle her to repudiate the contract into which she had entered. There is in this judgment only one passage which in my opinion is open to criticism—namely, that in which the learned Judge says that "in the case of dissolution of marriage the Court has had conferred upon it the right to vary . . . settlements, and to deal with them in any way which may be thought just and expedient." This statement is too wide, as the Court's power, as I have already pointed out, is strictly confined to a variation of the application of the settled property, but it was obiter and does not affect the principles upon which the judgment was founded. Lord Justice Cotton, after pointing out that the wife's application was clearly contrary to one of the covenants contained in the separation deed, stated that the question to be considered might be put in two ways: whether the covenant could under the circumstances be disregarded, or whether a Court of Equity would in the circumstances have enforced the covenant against the wife. The learned Lord Justice stated that he could not agree with the President's conclusion that the separation deed ought to be read as containing an implied condition that it should be operative so long as the parties lived chastely, nor with the conclusion that to hold that the husband was right would be to say that the deed contemplated and allowed adultery on the part of the husband. In speaking of Morrall v. Morrall (supra) the learned Lord Justice said that it might well be that the gross misconduct of the husband in that case might prevent the husband from relying on the deed, and render it just that the wife's covenant should be disregarded by the Court. In my opinion the decision in Morrall v. Morrall (supra) cannot be supported on that ground. The learned President in deciding that case did not lay stress on the incestuous character of the adultery, except as affording a ground for divorce. There were no facts there which would warrant the conclusion that the husband had been guilty of such gross misconduct as would disentitle him to enforce the wife's covenant in a Court of Equity. Lord Justice Lindley said that the question might be put in this shape: whether there had been any sufficient reason given for holding the wife discharged from her covenant not to sue for further alimony. After pointing out that prima facie she was bound by her covenant, which was a perfectly good covenant, and stating that the order appealed from set aside that covenant, the learned Lord Justice came to the conclusion that this was not right, and that mere adultery by the husband was not sufficient to deprive him of the benefit of the stipulation as to alimony. The learned Lord Justice in the course of his judgment further said that the cases, of which Morrall v. Morrall (supra) was one, where the Divorce Court had dealt with separation deeds after decrees for dissolution, were rather misleading when they were sought to be applied to a case where the Court had no such extensive jurisdiction. From this dictum it would appear as if Lord Justice Lindley had fallen into the same error as the Master of the Rolls as to the scope of the Court's power to vary settlements, and to have thought that Morrall v. Morrall (supra) was a case where the Court either had made, or could have made, an order for an increased allowance in exercise of the more extensive jurisdiction of varying settlements conferred upon it in the case of divorce.

The conclusions of the Court of Appeal in the first case of Gandy v. Gandy (supra), therefore, may be summarised as follows: that a wife's covenant not to endeavour to compel the husband to allow her any further alimony or maintenance is a valid covenant binding on her; that no dum casta clause will be implied in a separation deed, and consequently that the husband can enforce the covenant, notwithstanding his subsequent adultery which does not amount to such gross misconduct on his part as to disentitle him to relief in a Court of Equity; and that the fact that the wife has obtained a decree for judicial separation, with the result that the spouses are no longer living apart by agreement but by the decree of the Court, upon the making of which the Court has a statutory power to make such order for alimony as it thinks just, affords no ground for enabling the Court to disregard the wife's covenant.

In my judgment, these conclusions and the reasons upon which they are founded apply just as much to a case like the present where the wife has obtained a decree for divorce as they do to the case where the wife has obtained a decree for judicial separation.

Apart from the slight (and in my opinion wholly immaterial) difference in the expressions "as the Court may deem to be reasonable" and "as the Court thinks just" occurring respectively in subsections (1) and (4) of section 190 of the Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925, the only distinction between the powers conferred on the Court on a decree for divorce and on a decree for judicial separation is that in the case of divorce the matters which the Court is to take into account when ordering the husband to secure the maintenance, and the method in which the maintenance is to be secured, are stated, whereas in the case of judicial separation there are no such statements. This distinction is, in my opinion, accounted for by the fact that these subsections are in substance re-enactments of sections 17 and 32 of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1857, and that a decree for divorce was then an entirely new remedy conferred for the first time by that Act. The legislature, therefore, no doubt considered it advisable to state what matters the Court should take into account in providing for permanent maintenance, and how the order should be carried out, whereas in the case of a judicial separation (which was equivalent to a divorce a mensa et thoro) there was no such necessity, as the practice of the Ecclesiastical Courts as regards the matters to be taken into account in granting alimony (which matters are in fact the same as those which the Court is required to take into account in the case of divorce) was well established, and the jurisdiction in all matrimonial matters exercised by such Courts was transferred to the Divorce Court.

The express provisions in subsection (1) of section 190 that the Divorce Court is to have regard to certain specified matters when ordering the husband to secure maintenance for his wife, for whatever reason they may have been inserted, do not in my opinion affect the question whether a wife is entitled in breach of her contract to apply to the Divorce Court to exercise its power in her favour. Moreover it is to be noted that these provisions are not repeated in subsection (2) of section 190. Even assuming that they apply to an order made under that subsection I am of opinion that a Court of Equity would formerly have restrained the wife from making the application to the Divorce Court, notwithstanding that the Divorce Court was invested with a discretionary power to make or withhold an order in her favour, and notwithstanding that the legislature had indicated how that discretion was to be exercised and in what manner its order when made was to be carried out.

The fact that the Divorce Court has in cases of divorce the additional power to vary settlements has, in my opinion, no bearing on the question we have to decide, because, as already pointed out, the present case is not concerned with the exercise of that power.

I am further of the opinion that the decision of the Court of Appeal in the first case of Gandy v. Gandy (supra) entirely cuts away the grounds upon which Sir James Hannen based his judgments in Gandy v. Gandy (supra) and in Morrall v. Morrall (supra), and that the decision in the latter case cannot stand, in the face of the decision of the Court of Appeal in the former case.

I have already expressed my opinion on the dicta of the Master of the Rolls, Sir George Jessel, and Lord Justice Lindley that the decision of Morrall v. Morrall (supra) might be distinguished on the ground of the more extensive power to vary settlements conferred on the Court in case of divorce, and on the dictum of Lord Justice Cotton that Morrall v. Morrall (supra) might be supported on the ground of the gross nature of the conduct of the husband. It follows from what I have said about these dicta, that, in my judgment, the contention that the Court of Appeal in the first case of Gandy v. Gandy (supra) has approved of the decision in Morrall v. Morrall (supra) cannot be upheld.

It was, however, again suggested in the present case that the decision of the Court of Appeal in the first case of Gandy v. Gandy (supra) had been much shaken by what occurred in the second case of Gandy v. Gandy (30 Ch.D., 57) when the latter case came before the Court of Appeal. In my opinion, any doubt that there may at one time have been on this question was entirely dispelled and completely laid at rest by the clear and emphatic statement made by Lord Justice Lindley, when delivering the judgment of the Court of Appeal in Bishop v. Bishop (supra) which I will not repeat, but which affords a complete answer to the suggestion that the decision in the first case of Gandy v. Gandy (supra) is not to be relied on.

The actual decision in the second case of Gandy v. Gandy (supra) has, in my opinion, no direct bearing on the question to be decided in the present case. The ground upon which the Court allowed the wife to procced with her application for alimony in that case, notwithstanding her covenant, was that the husband had repudiated his obligations under the deed of separation by refusing to contribute to the maintenance and education of the two younger children, and that this repudiation operated to release the wife from her obligation not to apply for further maintenance. In the present case nothing of that kind has occurred.

The only other case which requires consideration is Bishop v. Bishop (supra). In that case the parties had signed an agreement whereby the wife agreed to accept a specified allowance by way of permanent maintenance, which allowance was to include the maintenance of the child of the marriage, the custody of which was given to the wife. It was expressly stipulated that the allowance was to be paid whether the parties remained married or whether the marriage should thereafter be dissolved. The agreement contained no stipulation by the wife not to sue for more than the agreed allowance. After the agreement the wife obtained a divorce on the ground of the husband's subsequent adultery and desertion, the decree giving the custody of the child to the wife, who then applied to the Court for maintenance for herself and for the child. Sir Francis Jeune, in holding that the separation agreement afforded no answer to the wife's application for maintenance, rested his decision mainly on the grounds relied upon by Sir James Hannen in Morrall v. Morrall (supra), which grounds, in Sir Francis Jeune's opinion, had been approved by the Court of Appeal in the first case of Gandy v. Gandy (supra). The learned President stated that it appeared to him that the Court of Appeal in the latter case had laid down that the power given to the Court to vary settlements on a divorce enabled the Court to set aside any previous agreement of the parties for the allowance to the wife, and to do complete justice in the matter. For the reasons which I have already stated, and which I will not repeat, I am of opinion that none of the grounds upon which Sir Francis Jeune rested his decision in Bishop v. Bishop (supra) can be supported, in view of the decision of the Court of Appeal in the first case of Gandy v. Gandy (supra).

In the Court of Appeal the decision of the learned President in Bishop v. Bishop (supra) was upheld, but on entirely different grounds. Lord Justice Lindley, who, during the respondent's argument, had pointed out that the only question was whether upon the construction of the agreement the wife had agreed not to apply for further maintenance, delivered the considered judgment of the Court. After clearing up the misunderstanding which appeared to have existed as to the effect of the decision in the second case of Gandy v. Gandy (supra) upon the decision in the the first case of Gandy v. Gandy (supra), the judgment proceeds to deal with the facts in Bishop v. Bishop (supra). It points out that the agreement contained no covenant not to sue for restitution of conjugal rights or for judicial separation or for a divorce; that it appeared from the agreement that the parties contemplated a divorce; that the agreement contained no covenant by the wife not to sue for more than the agreed allowance; and that the agreement provided that the wife should have the child and maintain her out of that allowance. It also points out that as the first case of Gandy v. Gandy (supra) was a case of judicial separation, and not of divorce, it was not in point, except in so far as it negatived any implied condition of continued chastity, and that the case in Bishop v. Bishop (supra) must turn on the power of the Divorce Court on a dissolution of a marriage to compel a husband to provide for his divorced wife and to make orders for the maintenance and education of the children. After considering the statutory powers conferred on the Court in this respect the judgment proceeds: "The appellant contends that all these matters are to be disregarded, and attention is only to be paid to the terms of the separation deed. This cannot be right." The judgment then referred to the express provision that the allowance was to continue, even in the event of a future dissolution of the marriage, and stated that the validity of the agreement in this respect was very questionable, and that it was doubtful whether an express covenant not to sue for increased alimony in the event of a divorce grounded on future misconduct could be recognized. It stated further that a covenant of such questionable validity certainly could not be implied, and that the wife could not be held to have precluded herself by her agreement from invoking the aid of the Court to obtain further maintenance. It further points out that no agreement between the parents could deprive the Court of its statutory powers relating to the custody, maintenance, and education of the children. It then explains that an exercise of the power conferred on the Court to vary settlements would be of no assistance to the wife, and concludes with the statement that the other powers conferred on the Court (which I understand to mean the powers to make an order for maintenance for the wife and for the maintenance and education of the child) were amply sufficient to justify the order which the learned President had made.

In my opinion, this case is distinguishable from the present in three essential particulars. First, the agreement contained no covenant by the wife not to sue for further maintenance. Secondly, the agreement contained an express provision that the allowance to the wife should continue after the dissolution of the marriage. Thirdly, the agreement provided that the allowance was to cover the maintenance of the child, whose interests were therefore directly affected. The decision of the Court of Appeal was, in my opinion, based entirely upon these three distinguishing features, all of which are absent from the present case. The Court, when referring to the questionable validity of the provision that the allowance to the wife should continue after the dissolution of marriage, did not, in my opinion, intend to cast any doubt on the principle that no condition will be implied terminating a covenant absolute in terms on an event not in the contemplation of the parties, whether that event be a divorce or judicial separation or merely unchastity, or on the decisions in such cases as Goslin v. Clark (supra), Charlesworth v. Holt (supra), Fearon v. Earl of Aylesford (supra), and the first case of Gandy v. Gandy (supra). The judgment in Bishop v. Bishop (supra) must be read in view of the fact that the Court was there concerned with an express provision as to what was to happen in case of a future divorce, which provision, although contained in a valid separation agreement, might, in the opinion of the Court, offend against public policy as an agreement during marriage designed and framed with the object of regulating the affairs of the spouses on a future dissolution of the marriage and be void on that ground. In the special circumstances of that case the Court declined to imply a covenant by the wife that she should not sue for further maintenance in the event of a future divorce, the validity of which covenant, if expressed in those terms, would, in the opinion of the Court, have been as much open to doubt on the ground of public policy as the express agreement by the husband to pay the allowance after a future divorce.

In the absence, therefore, of an agreement, either express or implied, by the wife not to sue for further maintenance, the Court held that the wife was free to apply to the Court, and that the Court was free to entertain her application. The only question which then arose was whether the Court, in exercising its power to award maintenance to the wife, was bound by the amount which the husband had agreed to allow to the wife; in other words, whether it was bound to have regard only to the terms of the separation agreement, or whether it was free to take into consideration the other matters to which the Act requires the Court to have regard. The Court held that in exercising its powers, which the wife had not by her agreement precluded herself from invoking, it was not fettered by the terms of the agreement, as contended for by the husband, and was not bound to have regard only to the terms of the agreement, but could also have regard to the other matters referred to in the Act. The Court also held that the amount of the maintenance affected the interests of the child, and that this was an additional reason why the wife should not be held disentitled to apply for further maintenance.

If the Court had been of opinion, or had intended to decide, that a wife could not bind herself not to apply for further maintenance in the event of her obtaining a divorce, I find it difficult to understand why the Court did not say so, instead of going into the whole matter and laying such strong emphasis on the absence of an agreement on the part of the wife not to apply for further maintenance and considering the question whether such an agreement ought to be implied. The short answer to the whole of the arguments advanced on behalf of the husband would have been that the wife could not preclude herself from applying to the Court for maintenance after she has obtained a decree for divorce, and, therefore, that it was wholly immaterial to consider whether or not she had by the particular agreement in that case purported to do so.

If the view which I have expressed as to the effect of the decision of the Court of Appeal in Bishop v. Bishop (supra) be right, it follows that it does not assist the wife's contention in the present case, which, in my opinion, falls to be decided on the principles upon which the Court of Appeal acted in deciding the first case of Gandy v. Gandy (supra).

In my judgment it is entirely contrary to equitable principles that a wife, after having accepted the benefits of a separation deed, should be allowed to repudiate her obligations under it, whether such repudiation takes place because she has obtained a decree for judicial separation or because she has obtained a decree for divorce. In either event it seems to me that she is both approbating and reprobating the deed, a proceeding against which Courts of Equity have always set their faces.

In the result, for the reasons which I have stated, I am of opinion that the appeal ought to be allowed, and that the wife's petition for maintenance ought to be dismissed.

HUGHES v. HUGHES.

The facts of this case differ in certain respects from those in Hyman v. Hyman. The spouses were resident in Ireland and the deed containing the covenant in question was executed to carry out a compromise of proceedings instituted by the wife in the High Court of Justice in Ireland for a divorce a mensa et thoro. The Irish Court had no jurisdiction to grant a divorce a vinculo, and the only method by which such a divorce could be obtained whilst the parties were resident in that country was by Act of Parliament. The consideration moving from the husband consisted of an absolute assignment of a leasehold house to the wife. The deed provided that the wife should have the custody and control of the four children of the marriage, of whom however two would appear to have been of the age of 21 years and upwards and the remaining two of the respective ages of 20 years and 16 years. At the date of the divorce in England, therefore, all the children of the marriage were of full age and the wife is not on the present occasion seeking to invoke the powers conferred on the Court relating to the custody, maintenance, and education of children.

The covenant by the wife is absolute in terms: viz.:—that she or any person for her or on her behalf should not and would not at any time thereafter commence or prosecute any action or other proceeding for compelling the husband to allow her any support, maintenance or alimony. There is nothing in the deed to suggest that the parties contemplated a dissolution of the marriage by a decree for divorce, and in the circumstances the proper inference, in my opinion, is that such an event was not contemplated by either of the parties when the deed was executed. The deed, however, contains provisions relating to the estate of each of the spouses in the event of the dissolution of the marriage tie by the death of the one in the lifetime of the other.

The judgment of the learned President is based entirely upon the construction of the deed. According to the learned President's view, the wife's covenant, on the true construction of the deed, lasted only as long as the marriage tie existed, and terminated on the dissolution of that tie by a decree for divorce. With the greatest respect for the view thus taken by the learned President, I am unable to agree with it. The covenant is absolute in terms and the deed contains no express provision for its termination. The absence of any such provision renders one of the reasons (viz.:—that based on the maxim expressio unius est exclusio alterius) stated in my judgment in Hyman v. Hyman for not implying any such provision in the event of a divorce inapplicable to the present case, but I am of opinion that the other reasons expressed in my judgment in that case are equally applicable here, and afford amply sufficient grounds for not making any such implication. Moreover it would, in my opinion, be more difficult to imply a condition subsequent defeating the wife's covenant in the present case because such a condition, besides being (as in Hyman v. Hyman) inconsistent with the express terms of the deed, and with the intention of the parties as gathered from its provisions, ought not to be implied where the husband has performed the whole of his part of the deed.

As appears from my judgment in Hyman v. Hyman, I have the misfortune also to differ from the learned President's statement that the Lords Justices in Bishop v. Bishop (supra) did not appear to have doubted that in a case of divorce Sir James Hannen's view in Morrall v. Morrall (supra) would have been correct.

In my opinion, the differences between the facts here and the facts in Hyman v. Hyman are not sufficient to prevent the reasons upon which my judgment in the latter case is based from applying to the present case.

It is not disputed that the wife was competent to enter into the covenant. The covenant is absolute in terms, and no condition terminating it in an event not in the contemplation of the parties ought to be implied. The wife ought not to be permitted to approbate and reprobate. The covenant is not against public policy and does not constitute an attempt to fetter the discretion of the Court. The Court, therefore, is not at liberty to disregard the covenant, even although the husband has committed adultery and the wife has obtained a divorce.

For the reasons stated in this judgment and in my judgment in Hyman v. Hyman, therefore, I am of opinion that the appeal should be allowed and the wife's petition for maintenance should be dismissed.

LORD JUSTICE GREER: The question involved in these appeals may be shortly stated as follows:—

Is it competent to the parties to a deed of separation between husband and wife to prevent the Court, when decreeing a divorce, from exercising the jurisdiction conferred by section 190 of the Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925, by agreeing that the wife will not prosecute any action or proceeding for compelling her husband to allow her support, maintenance, or alimony.

In stating the question, I have used the words contained in the separation deed in Hughes v. Hughes. The words used in the separation deed in Hyman v. Hyman are not identical, but are to the same effect.

It is true that in form the agreements do not purport to limit the powers of the Court, but only restrain the wife from seeking the aid of the Court. The distinction drawn by the appellants between an agreement expressly purporting to limit the powers of the Court and an agreement restraining a litigant from doing that which, under the rules of practice, is necessary before the Court can exercise its power, has, in my opinion, no substance. The effect of the covenants in these cases is exactly the same as it would have been if the parties had expressly stipulated that when making a decree of divorce the Court should not have the power to make an order for maintenance. If you lock the door of the Court and take away the key, you prevent the Court from exercising its powers just as effectively as if you leave the door open and agree that, when you get into Court, the Court shall not exercise its powers.

Before I deal with the effect of previous decisions, I think it useful to call attention to several considerations which appear to be pertinent to the problem which we have to solve.

Section 190 of the Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925, which reproduces the provisions of earlier statutes, does not of its own force require any application for maintenance to be made by the wife, but expressly gives power to the Court "on any decree for divorce," to make an order securing to the wife an annual sum of money, or an order for the payment by the husband of a monthly or weekly sum for her maintenance and support. So far as the statute is concerned, an order for maintenance might be made by the Court on any successful petition for divorce by a wife, whether the wife asked for it or not. But Rule 65 of the Matrimonial Causes Rules provides that application for maintenance shall be made by a separate petition. Rules of practice are only machinery to enable the Court to exercise its powers in a manner convenient to the efficient despatch of its business. While the rule remains as it is, if a wife agrees not to petition for maintenance, she thereby, in effect, agrees to deprive the Court of the powers expressly given to it "on any decree of divorce."

A decree of divorce is, in its nature, a judgment in rem. It does more than affect the rights of the parties inter se. It alters their status, and profoundly affects their relation to third parties. Before divorce, a husband is liable for his wife's torts, he is liable in certain circumstances on her contracts for necessaries, and if she becomes a pauper he is liable to recoup to the guardians the expense of her maintenance. Further, though married people can lawfully enter into separation deeds and thereby modify their rights, inter se, they cannot by agreement become divorced persons. But when they are duly divorced by the Court they have all the rights and liabilities of unmarried persons, and it is a matter of great public interest that an adequate provision should be made by the Court for the maintenance of the wife and children of the marriage. In giving judgment in Harriman v. Harriman (25 The Times L.R., 291; [1909] P., 123, at p. 143) Lord Justice Farwell said: "The Act of 1857 abolished the old ecclesiastical jurisdiction (section 2) and created a new civil tribunal with new powers, including a power to dissolve marriages altogether; but this power, trenching as it did on the binding sanctity of the marriage tie, and affecting, therefore, not only the parties to the suit, but also their children (if any) and society generally, was limited by the Act, especially by sections 29, 30, and 31."

These observations seem to me in principle to apply just as much to the incidental powers conferred on the Court, when granting a decree of divorce, as they do to the limitations imposed on the Court. It is, in my judgment, in the public interest that the Court should be able to secure to the wife such sum by way of maintenance as should seem reasonable, having regard to her fortune, the ability of the husband, and the conduct of the parties, without being restrained by any agreement they have made while they had the status of married persons.

Apart from authority, I should have no hesitation in holding that the Divorce Court is entitled to consider in each of these cases under appeal the wife's petition for maintenance, and, on the hearing of the petition, to grant such sum by way of maintenance as the Court deems reasonable, notwithstanding the wife's covenant in the deed of separation not to ask for any maintenance beyond the sum provided for in the deed. Section 190 gives the Court its power to order maintenance, as I have pointed out, "on any decree of divorce," and it is not permissible to read into the section some such words as "unless otherwise agreed by the parties." If the appellants' argument is right, a wife, who had agreed to live separate from her husband and to do without maintenance, might unexpectedly find herself without any means when she obtained a decree of divorce, while her husband had meantime acquired a substantial fortune. It would be unfortunate, indeed, in the interests of justice and in the public interest, if the Court could not, in those circumstances, disregard an agreement made in other circumstances, but was thereby disabled from making a reasonable order for the maintenance of the wife, the need for the divorce having been occasioned by the husband's misconduct. But it is said that there is authority, by which this Court ought to hold itself bound, that a wife who has, during the continuance of the marriage bond, entered into an agreement, in words which are wide enough to include the joint lives of the parties, not to seek an order for maintenance, is bound by that agreement after she has obtained a divorce, and the Court cannot grant maintenance at any larger sum than she agreed to accept. In my opinion, there is no binding authority for this proposition, and the weight of authority is the other way.

The appellants relied chiefly on the decisions in Charlesworth v. Holt (L.R., 9 Ex., 38), and Gandy v. Gandy (7 P.D., 168). In Charlesworth v. Holt (supra) it was held that the trustees of a separation deed, in which the husband covenanted to pay an annuity to the trustees for the wife's support during their joint lives and so long as they should continue to live separate and apart, could sue on the deed, notwithstanding the fact that the wife had been divorced by her husband. The point was raised by demurrer to a plea by the defendant setting up, as a defence to a claim by the trustees for money due under the deed, the wife's subsequent adultery, and the dissolution of the marriage. The Court held the plea bad, as there were no express words limiting the husband's obligation to the period during which the marriage subsisted. I think this case is an authority for the proposition that a covenant, such as there was in the separation deeds under consideration in these appeals, is to be construed as applying between the parties after a divorce on the ground of adultery. This was not a decision of a Court of Appeal, and would not be binding on this Court if it were a recent case; but it was decided nearly 55 years ago, and many deeds of separation must have been entered into since then upon the assumption that a covenant in a separation deed to pay or accept an agreed sum for maintenance would be construed as applying between the parties, after a divorce, in the absence of any order made by the Divorce Court under its statutory powers. The case was not cited to the learned President in Hughes v. Hughes—if it had been, he might possibly have given a different reason for his judgment than that which appears in the transcript. I think this Court would hesitate for a long time before it overruled a case which was decided so long ago as was Charlesworth v. Holt (supra). But the case has no bearing on the question we have to decide in these appeals, which are concerned not so much with the construction of the covenants in the deeds as with the extent of the powers conferred by statute on the Court when decreeing a divorce.

In Gandy v. Gandy (supra) it was held that a covenant by a wife in a separation deed not to sue for increased alimony beyond that provided for by the deed was binding on her, notwithstanding the fact that the husband had committed adultery, and that she had obtained a decree for judicial separation. The Master of the Rolls, Sir George Jessel, and Lord Justice Lindley expressly distinguished the case, which was one of judicial separation, from a case arising on the dissolution of a marriage. The subsequent history of the litigation in Gandy v. Gandy (supra) is peculiar, and I doubt whether even in a case of judicial separation the first case of Gandy v. Gandy (supra) can now be regarded as an authority. The parties came before the Court of Appeal again (see 30 Ch.D., 57), and as a result of the situation created by the fact that the husband contended that, having by the decree of the Court lost the custody of his children, he was no longer liable to pay for their maintenance and education, the Court gave the wife liberty to apply again to the Divorce Court for increased alimony, and adjourned the hearing of the appeal until she had done so. The subsequent history of the case is stated by Mr. Justice Gorell Barnes in Judkins v. Judkins (13 The Times L.R., 366 ; [1897] P. 138, at p. 155). On the wife's second application for maintenance the President allowed her permanent alimony at the rate of £750 per annum, being £500 more than the amount agreed in the separation deed, credit to be given for the annual payment made under the deed. A final order was then made by the Court of Appeal, staying the Chancery proceedings. Mr. Justice Gorell Barnes concludes his account of the litigation in Gandy v. Gandy (supra) in these words:—"The result of all this litigation in Gandy v. Gandy (supra) was that the wife obtained about £500 a year more than the deed gave her as permanent alimony. I cannot ascertain exactly how this increase was fixed; but it may have been in order to maintain the two youngest children. At the same time the final order does in terms give permanent alimony beyond that which was covenanted to be paid by the deed."

Gandy v. Gandy (supra), therefore, cannot be regarded as an authority that even in a case of judicial separation the Court cannot under any circumstances override the agreement of the parties as to the amount to be paid for maintenance. The second case of Gandy v. Gandy (supra) did not, as was suggested by the appellants' counsel, depend on the wife being freed from her contract by the husband's repudiation of it. A contention by a party to a contract, that his liability to make a payment under the contract has come to an end, is not a repudiation of the contract.

Be this as it may, Gandy v. Gandy (supra) has, in my judgment, no application to the case where the marriage is dissolved by a decree of divorce. Whatever proposition of law can be extracted from it only applies to a case of judicial separation, and it ought not to be applied to the wholly different situation created by a divorce. The decisions of Sir James Hannen in Morrall v. Morrall (6 P.D., 98) and of Sir Francis Jeune and the Court of Appeal in Bishop v. Bishop (13 The Times L.R., 366 ; [1897] P., 138) were given in cases where there was a decree of divorce, and they afford ample authority for deciding these appeals in the present respondents' favour. The law, in my opinion, is correctly stated by the President, Sir James Hannen, in Morrall v. Morrall (supra) in these words:—"Circumstances now justify her (the wife) in bringing a suit for dissolution of marriage, and she is entitled to all the incidents of that suit, and amongst them to an allowance based upon her husband's actual income."

The wife's covenant in Morrall v. Morrall (supra) was that she would not at any time thereafter commence or prosecute any suit or other proceeding for compelling her husband to allow her any support or maintenance or alimony whatsoever, except the sum provided for in her separation deed. The Court held, for the reasons stated, that the deed afforded no answer to a petition for maintenance. The case was mentioned without dissent by Lord Justice Cotton and Lord Justice Lindley in the first case of Gandy v. Gandy (supra) in the Court of Appeal. It was cited to the Court of Appeal in the argument in Bishop v. Bishop (supra) but no observations were made about it in the judgment.

In Bishop v. Bishop (supra) at the trial of a petition for divorce the parties consented to have the petition dismissed, the petitioner agreeing to accept £130 per annum by way of maintenance, to include the maintenance of the child, of which she was to have the custody. There was no express covenant not to sue for further maintenance but, in my opinion, the agreement must be construed in the same way as covenants relating to permanent maintenance in separation deeds, and, apart from any order made by the Court on a dissolution of the marriage, the petitioner would have been bound by her promise to accept £130 per annum by way of permanent maintenance, and could not have sued for anything more. When the petitioner, having obtained a decree of divorce, asked for an order for more than £130 per annum, the President, Sir Francis Jeune, held that the agreement did not afford any answer to her petition, and his judgment was upheld by the Court of Appeal. It is quite clear that the Court of Appeal considered that though the agreement contemplated the continuation of the agreed allowance, and consequently of the obligation of the wife to accept it, in the event of a future dissolution of the marriage, they thought that the Court had power to override that agreement and award her a larger allowance, if, when the petition came on for hearing, it was considered reasonable, on the grounds mentioned in section 190, that she should have permanent maintenance at a higher rate than she had agreed to accept. It seems to me to follow that if the Court has power to award to a wife a higher allowance than that which she has agreed to accept, it has also power to consider her petition and make a proper order for maintenance, notwithstanding her agreement that she will not ask for such an order.

For these reasons, and those stated in the judgment of Lord Justice Scrutton, I think the judgments appealed from were right, and the appeals should be dismissed with costs.

Two points are taken by the respondent: (1) That the words of the covenant do not cover the present case and do not estop the wife. (2) That, if the words do not cover the present case, the covenant is illegal and cannot be relied upon, as there is no power to contract out of the Act of Parliament—viz., section 190 of the Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925, which empowers the Divorce Court, if it thinks fit, on any decree for divorce or nullity of marriage, to order that the husband shall secure to the wife such gross sum of money or annual sum of money as the Court may deem to be reasonable. In the case of Hughes v. Hughes, the President, on the construction of a somewhat similar covenant, said: "The decisive question here . . . is whether the present applicant has covenanted not to do the thing which she now seeks to do. In my opinion, she has not. She covenanted, as a wife, against making, as a wife, any claim upon her husband, for support, maintenance, or alimony. That is to say, she covenanted not to proceed in a Court, having jurisdiction in such matters, to require as against her husband the provision for her livelihood for which in his marital capacity he would during their marriage prima facie be liable. She is not so proceeding. She is no longer a wife." Before dealing specifically with the above two points, it will be convenient to examine the statutes and decided cases applicable to them.

Originally the law relating to matrimonial causes was largely dealt with by the ecclesiastical authorities and Parliament, but in 1857, by the Matrimonial Causes Act of that year, a Court was constituted with exclusive jurisdiction over matters matrimonial in England, and is known as the Divorce Court. The Act created two new remedies. By section 7 powers were given to the Court to pronounce a decree for judicial separation in lieu of the old decree for a divorce a mensa et thoro, and, by section 17, further powers were given, where the application was by the wife, to make any order for alimony which should be deemed just. By section 31 powers were given to the Court to pronounce a decree for dissolution of marriage, and by section 32 the Court was further empowered to grant alimony. An examination of the statutes will show that, at the very beginning, a clear line was drawn between the right to obtain, and the results of obtaining, the said two remedies. The reason is not far to seek. In the case of judicial separation the marriage tie was not broken; in the case of divorce it was, and it is not difficult to understand why, in such circumstances, such a difference should have been made between the two.

Whether certain situations were overlooked in the new venture of 1857, or whether it became the policy of Parliament to increase the jurisdiction in divorce, is a question upon which it is not necessary to speculate; but certainly the jurisdiction in divorce, as distinguished from the jurisdiction in judicial separation, was, from time to time, enlarged.

By the Matrimonial Causes Act of 1859, section 5, power was given to the courts in inquire into the existence of ante-nuptial or post-nuptial settlements in cases of nullity of marriage or dissolution of marriage. Section 4 of that Act, when dealing with the custody of children, included cases of judicial separation, nullity of marriage, and dissolution of marriage. Section 3 of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1878, again enlarged the jurisdiction of the Court by making section 5 of the Act of 1859 applicable, notwithstanding that there were no children of the marriage.

It will thus be seen that, from time to time, the distinction between judicial separation and divorce was preserved, and the jurisdiction of the Court in the latter enhanced. It is not, therefore, surprising that, in the cases from time to time decided, the Courts should not only draw a distinction between judicial separation and divorce, but should act upon such a distinction in coming to their decisions.

After several re-enacting statutes, the law was consolidated by the Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act of 1925. It may perhaps be a little unfortunate that the sections dealing with alimony in judicial separation and in divorce were not kept entirely separate, but were, possibly for the sake of convenience, thrown together in section 190, although in different subsections, but that does not alter the distinction which still remains and which is fundamental, that the remedies and the results of the remedies are upon entirely different bases, viz., in one the continuance, and in the other the dissolution, of the marriage.

I now turn to the cases. There have been decisions not only in the Divorce Court, but in the Courts of Chancery and the Courts of Common Law, but, speaking for myself, I think those two latter Courts should be extremely cautious in doing anything to interfere with the practice of the Divorce Court, which for many years has had a peculiar jurisdiction and a large experience in cases arising between husband and wife. Normally in suits coming before the Chancery or King's Bench Judges, the Court is considering only the rights of the parties inter se. The Divorce Court is dealing with changes in the status of the parties, and considerations of public and national interest arise. In ordinary cases before a Chancery or King's Bench Court a defendant is at liberty to consent to judgment for the plaintiff with costs; no such liberty is permitted to a respondent in a divorce case ; indeed, collusion is an absolute bar to a dissolution of marriage. We were much pressed by the learned counsel for the appellants with the the case of Charlesworth v. Holt (L.R. 9 Ex. 38). There, by a separation deed, the defendant covenanted with trustees to pay them an annuity for his wife's support during his and his wife's joint lives and so long as they should live separate and apart. In an action by the trustees for arrears of the annuity it was held that a plea setting forth the deed and alleging the wife's subsequent adultery, and the dissolution of the marriage in consequence, was bad, there being no express words limiting the defendant's obligation to the period during which the marriage tie subsisted. That case was not cited to the learned President, but it is to be observed that it was a suit by the trustees. The decision is not binding on this Court, and it is no authority upon the question whether the Divorce Court has, or has not, jurisdiction in such a case as the present. It is a decision of a Court of Common Law, and moreover, in my view, that case would, even in a Court of Common Law, be differently decided now, in view of the decisions in the Coronation and frustration cases. Two decisions of the Court of Chancery may be referred to ; Besant v. Wood in 1879 (12 Ch. D., 605), where the Master of the Rolls, Sir George Jessel, at p. 622, expresses the opinion that a married woman may compromise by agreeing to live separate on terms as regards maintenance for herself, although he adds that that contract, like all other contracts, if not against public policy, is one which may be upheld and enforced; and Gandy v. Gandy (30 Ch. D., 57), which is a sequel to the other case of Gandy v. Gandy (7 P.D. 168). As some criticism was made in the course of the appellants' argument with regard to the phrase "variation of settlement" in reference to section 192 of the Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act of 1925, when considering the gradual increase of the power of the Divorce Court, I should point out that Sir George Jessel said in Gandy v. Gandy (30 Ch. D. at p. 72) that the Legislature has not thought fit in the case of judicial separation to give the same powers to the Court that it has given in the case of dissolution of marriage. The headnote of the report of Gandy v. Gandy (supra) in the Probate Division, where it says (7 P.D. 168) that the Court has not, as it has in the case of a decree for dissolution, power to alter the separation deed, possibly goes too far, but I do not propose, however, to dwell long upon that case. It was a case where judicial separation and not divorce was involved, and I cannot help thinking that the Court of Appeal when it gave its decision did not contemplate the facts which were presented to it when it gave its decision three years later as reported in 30 Chancery Division. It is sufficient to refer to Lord Justice Lindley's explanation of it in Bishop v. Bishop (13 The Times L.R. 366; [1897] P. 138, at p. 162). I pass over other cases not connected with divorce, because, as it appears to me, the considerations which apply to divorce are different; namely, Marshall v. Marshall (5 P.D. 19). which was a suit for restitution of conjugal rights, as also was Tress v. Tress (12 P.D. 128). The case of Aldridge v. Aldridge (13 P.D. 210) was, it is true, a nullity case, but in nullity the marriage is not void, but only voidable at the instance of the aggrieved party.

To pass to a case which is concerned with divorce, Morrall v. Morrall (6 P.D. 98) would appear to be a decision in favour of the respondents in the present cases, although I cannot help thinking that the reasons given by Sir James Hannen were reasons which have been disapproved by the Court of Appeal, and a similar remark applies to the decision of Benyon v. Benyon (1 P.D. 447).

I doubt, however, if it is possible to say that there can never be a case where a change of circumstances would operate to induce the Court to declare that a deed is no longer binding. Finally, it is necessary to refer to the case of Bishop v. Bishop (supra). It is true that the covenant in that case and the case of Judkins v. Judkins, which is reported with it, were rather different from the covenant now under consideration, there being no express covenant by the wife not to sue for increased alimony in the event of a divorce decree grounded on future misconduct in the one case, and no covenant by the wife not to sue for an increase in the other, but the reasoning in those two cases is in favour of the respondents in the present cases.

To sum up, a review of the authorities leads me to the conclusion that the point to be decided is an open one and comes before this Court for the first time. There are in the cases dicta which can doubtless be relied upon by either side, although it appears that the Divorce Court has always struggled to maintain what Parliament had undoubtedly given to it—namely, a large and unfettered power to decree alimony in divorce cases.

I now pass to the two points which fall for decision.

(1) Does this covenant cover the present case ? Speaking for myself, I agree with the President's reasoning in Hughes v. Hughes, that the covenant does not apply in the present circumstances. In my view it only operates so long as the relationship of husband and wife exists between the parties, but the decision in Charlesworth v. Holt (supra) may make it difficult to decide the matter upon this ground, although I think it is correct. I, therefore, turn to the second point.

(2) Was there a power to contract out of this Act of Parliament ? If not, the clause is invalid. Now the covenant must be strictly construed. It is not, nor indeed can it be, a covenant not to petition for a divorce. It is a covenant that the Divorce Judge, in the event of the wife's coming before him for a divorce, shall not have the powers which Parliament says he is to have in such cases. It does not, indeed, go so far as to say that he may hear the case but not determine it, but it does seek to prevent the Judge from exercising those powers which Parliament says he is to have when pronouncing a decree, and without which it does not appear to me that he can do justice between the parties. It is not logical that he should be bound, when he decrees a divorce, by stipulations agreed between the parties as applicable to, and binding in, entirely different circumstances; neither is it, in my opinion, permissible for the parties to a contract to say that the Judge shall be so fettered in his discretion. It is impossible to fetter the discretion where there are children of the marriage—divorce, children, alimony, are inextricably mixed up together, and the jurisdiction of the Divorce Court refers to delicate matters which cannot be treated as one would treat a contract for the sale of goods, or a suit for specific performance. As above pointed out, the parties to a marriage contract are not at liberty to do as they like with regard to the contract. There are public and national interests to be considered. The cases on public policy are conveniently collected in In re Hope Johnstone (20 The Times L.R. 282 ; [1904] 1 Ch. 470), where the learned Judge quotes Vice-Chancellor Wood in H. v. W. (3 K. and J. 382, at p. 387) as saying: "It is forbidden to provide for the possible dissolution of the marriage contract, which the policy of the law is to preserve intact and inviolate." Over and above that I read Lord Justice Lindley as saying, in Bishop v. Bishop (supra), at p. 164 : "We are not aware of any authority since the Divorce Act which shows that a covenant by a husband or wife not to sue the other for a divorce grounded on future misconduct is valid, and we doubt whether an express covenant not to sue for increased alimony in the event of such a divorce could be recognized."

In my view, a consideration of the statutes, coupled with the doubts expressed by Lord Justice Lindley, clearly points to a covenant of this character being invalid, and it is impossible for parties so to contract out of this Act of Parliament.

I can see no distinction in law between this case and that of Hughes v. Hughes, and both appeals should, I think, be dismissed with costs.

Lord Justice Russell.—These two cases raise for determination the same point, which may thus be stated: Is a contract by a wife (made at arm's length and for valuable consideration) by which she agreed not to take proceedings to compel her husband to allow her support, maintenance, or alimony, or to allow her any alimony or maintenance beyond a stipulated amount, binding upon the wife after she has obtained a decree absolute for divorce; or is it still open to her to petition for maintenance under section 190 of the Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925 ? (His Lordship stated the facts in Hughes v. Hughes, and continued.)

The judgment of the President, as I read it, disposed of the matter on one short ground which he described as the "decisive question." He held that the petitioner, in applying for maintenance, was committing no breach of her covenant, because the covenant only related to a claim by her as a wife against the covenantee as her husband. It is true that he proceeds then to refer to Morrall v. Morrall (6 P.D., 98) and Bishop v. Bishop (13 The Times L.R., 366 ; [1897] P., 138) as not weakening the petitioner's right to apply under section 190, but his decision rests, I think, entirely upon the view that the covenant ceases to apply after the relationship of husband and wife has come to an end. I am unable to take this view. The words of the covenant contradict it; the bargain is that she will not "at any time hereafter" commence proceedings, and the benefit which she obtains in substitution is the assignment of property to be enjoyed by her at all times thereafter, whether the relationship of husband and wife continues to exist or not. Nor is there any ground for the view that the indenture of November 15, 1920, is of such a nature that all its provisions automatically cease to operate in the event of a dissolution of the marriage. It is a deed of separation and Charlesworth v. Holt (L.R., 9 Ex., 38) is sufficient authority to show that, in the absence of express words in the deed, liability under a covenant contained therein survives the dissolution of the marriage of the parties to the deed. See also the decision of this Court in Clifford v. Clifford (9 P.D., 76). In my opinion, the judgment of the President cannot be supported upon what I conceive to be its sole foundation.

There remain, however, for consideration certain other important contentions which were urged in argument. It was said that, even assuming that the petitioner's application for permanent maintenance was a breach of the covenant, her covenant did not bind her, by reason of the fact that she had obtained a decree for divorce founded upon the respondent's adultery subsequent to the date of the deed. Further, it was said that the covenant was bad, as being a covenant against public policy; this upon the theory that a covenant by a wife in a separation deed not to ask at any time thereafter for further maintenance or support is either an agreement entered in contemplation of divorce, or is equivalent to a licence to the husband to commit adultery. To deal with these points requires an examination of certain relevant authorities.

In Gandy v. Gandy (7 P.D., 168) the precise point arose in the Court of Appeal in connexion with a decree for judicial separation. In the Court below (7 P.D., 77) the President (Sir James Hannen) had decided that a wife, who had obtained a decree of judicial separation by reason of adultery committed by her husband subsequently to the execution of a separation deed, was not bound by a covenant therein contained. The covenant was a covenant by the trustees with the husband that the wife would not, nor any person on her behalf, thereafter commence any proceedings against the husband for alimony except as aforesaid ; that is to say, beyond £252 per annum which the husband had covenanted to pay to the trustees during the life of the wife for the use of the wife and two of her daughters. The President held that, notwithstanding the deed, the wife could apply for and obtain permanent alimony under 20 and 21 Victoria, chapter 85, section 17. The grounds of the decision appear to have been, (1) that the subsequent adultery created a state of facts not in the contemplation of the parties at the date of the deed; (2) that the subsequent adultery deprived the husband of the right to have the restraining provisions enforced ; (3) that the deed should be construed as an agreement to live apart in chastity; and (4) that any other decision would be prejudicial to morality, as holding that the husband obtained by the deed a licence to commit adultery, without subjecting himself to any liabilities beyond those imposed by the deed. Sir James Hannen decided Gandy v. Gandy (supra) in the year 1882. Before that he had already decided two cases of a somewhat similar nature—namely, Benyon v. Benyon (1 P.D., 447) in 1876 and Morrall v. Morrall (supra) in 1881. Benyon v. Benyon (supra) is not very relevant here. It was a case where the Court examined the powers which are now contained in sections 192 and 193 of the Act of 1925 in favour of a husband and child. There was no covenant by the husband not to apply for more than the allowance provided by the separation deed. Morrall v. Morrall (supra), however, is of great importance because Sir James Hannen there decided that a covenant in a separation deed not to sue for further maintenance was not binding upon a wife who had obtained a decree of divorce founded on the husband's incestuous adultery committed after the date of the deed. In deciding both Morrall v. Morrall (supra) and Gandy v. Gandy (supra), Sir James Hannen acted upon the view that subsequent adultery by the husband created a new state of facts which deprived him of the right to enforce the covenant not to sue. There was no appeal in Morrall v. Morrall (supra). In Gandy v. Gandy (supra), however, the husband appealed; and, as I read the judgments in the Court of Appeal, the grounds upon which Sir James Hannen based his decisions in Morrall v. Morrall (supra) and Gandy v. Gandy (supra) can no longer stand. Sir George Jessel and Lord Justice Cotton and Lord Justice Lindley all agreed that the subsequent adultery of the husband did not deprive him of the benefit of the stipulation as to alimony. In particular Lord Justice Cotton uses (7 P.D., at p. 174) the following language : "But the learned Judge seems to have decided the matter on principles that would lead to the conclusion that the deed was bad altogether at law (which it is not), because he said this deed must be read as containing an implied condition that it shall be operative so long as the parties shall live chastely, and that to hold that the present appellant was right would be to say that this deed contemplated and allowed adultery on the part of the husband. I cannot agree with such a conclusion" ; and Sir George Jessel (at p. 172) expresses himself thus : "I see that the learned Judge put it on the ground of public policy. I have explained more than once, and especially in a case which has been referred to by the learned Judge himself of Besant v. Wood (12 Ch.D., 605), that there is no reason more dangerous to give, and no reason on which such difference of opinion exists, as public policy. He has said, 'If you do not allow the wife to ask for increased alimony in such a case as this, you allow the husband to commit adultery with impunity.' I am by no means prepared to say that this remark is correct. It is not impunity merely because he is not obliged to pay more money. I do not consider that payment of alimony is the only punishment for adultery if the word 'punishment' should be used in connexion with it. No doubt he may be to some extent relieved from that liability, but the contract is one by which he is compelled to pay an amount having regard to his then state of fortune, which might have been much larger then than that at the date of the decree for separation, for his fortune might have diminished instead of increasing. It appears to me a very strong thing to say that by his committing an act which does not affect the wife either directly or indirectly her rights to participate in his fortune should be altered." It is true that reference is made in the judgments to the fact that the case was one of judicial separation, and not of dissolution of marriage, but the object of such references appears from the context to be to point out that in the event of divorce the Court has powers in regard to settlements (which include separation deeds) which would be unaffected by any stipulations between the spouses as to alimony or maintenance. These powers (which are those now included in section 192 of the Act of 1925) are not, however, either available or relevant in either of the cases now under the consideration of this Court.

A somewhat similar matter arose later for consideration in the Court of Appeal in the case of Bishop v. Bishop (supra). That case resembled the present cases in that the marriage had been dissolved ; it differed from the present cases, however, in that in Bishop v. Bishop (supra) there was no covenant not to apply for further maintenance. The facts were as follows : The wife had petitioned for divorce, but compromised the proceedings by an agreement dated March 20, 1894, which ran thus : "The petitioner agrees to accept £130 per annum by way of permanent maintenance, this sum to include the maintenance of the child. The said allowance to be paid by Mr. Walter Harry Bishop, the respondent, by monthly payments during their joint lives. This allowance to be paid in any event, whether they remain married or whether the marriage should hereafter be dissolved. Mrs. Edith Bishop, the petitioner, is to have the custody of the child." It was an agreement that a certain sum should be payable for permanent maintenance during the joint lives, to include maintenance of the child, and to be payable even after a divorce. In July, 1895, the wife filed a petition for divorce, and obtained a decree nisi which was made absolute on June 8, 1896. She then applied for (1) permanent maintenance for herself and (2) provision for the maintenance and education of the child. Sir Francis Jeune allowed the matter to proceed, apparently taking the view that the decision in Gandy v. Gandy (supra) had been virtually set aside by the later decision of the Court of Appeal in Gandy v. Gandy (30 Ch.D., 57), and also that the decision in Gandy v. Gandy (7 P.D., 168) in substance approved of the decision of Sir James Hannen in Morrall v. Morrall (supra). In the Court of Appeal the nature and scope of the earlier decision in Gandy v. Gandy (supra) is stated. It is made quite clear, (1) that the Court of Appeal had never gone back from that decision ; (2) that the reason why an order for increased alimony was eventually made was that the subsequent repudiation by the husband of his obligations under the separation deed had freed the wife from her covenant not to sue (see [1897] P., at p. 161) ; (3) that, apart from special cases relieving the wife from her covenant, the Divorce Court had no power to disregard it (see [1897] P., at p. 162); (4) that nothing was decided in Gandy v. Gandy (supra) respecting the statutory powers of the Divorce Court in suits for dissolution of marriage or as to the power to make orders respecting the custody, maintenance and educaton of children. The actual decision in Bishop v. Bishop (supra) was that the appeal from Sir Francis Jeune's order be dismissed, but not at all upon the grounds upon which he based his decision. As I read the judgment of the Court of Appeal in Bishop v. Bishop (supra) its foundation is this :—There was no covenant by the wife not to sue, nor could such a covenant be implied. In no view could the agreement preclude an application on behalf of the child. Gandy v. Gandy (supra) (being a case of judicial separation) was not in point except in one respect. The case must turn solely (there being no covenant not to sue) on the powers of the Divorce Court on dissolution to compel a husband to provide for his former wife, and to make orders for the maintenance and education of the children. As regards the former, these were not fettered by the existence of the agreement in Bishop v. Bishop (supra), i.e., the mere fact that the parties had in the separation agreement fixed a figure as being the proper sum to cover the future, could not prevent the Court from having regard to the wife's fortune, the husband's ability, and the conduct of the parties, and, if deemed proper, from fixing a different and higher sum. As regards the latter powers, no agreement between the parents could deprive the children of the benefit of the Court's jurisdiction. That, in my opinion is the foundation of Bishop v. Bishop (supra). In other words, the only decision in Bishop v. Bishop (supra) is that, where there is no bargain for value by the wife releasing her personal rights to permanent maintenance under the statute, those rights are not destroyed by a separation deed which fixes a sum for maintenance and provides that it shall be payable even after divorce. It was argued before us that Bishop v. Bishop (supra) covered the present cases, because the agreement in Bishop v. Bishop (supra) was so worded as to involve an agreement by the wife not to apply for further maintenance. To say this is to shut one's eyes to the language used in the judgment. The case is expressly stated to be decided upon the footing that no such agreement by the wife, express or implied, did exist. The words at pages 164 and 165 are explicit: "There is no express covenant to that effect in the present case; and a covenant of such very questionable validity certainly cannot be implied. In other words, the wife cannot be held to have precluded herself by her agreement from invoking the aid of the Court to obtain further maintenance in the events which have happened." Unless the English language bears some meaning unknown to me, there is no decision in Bishop v. Bishop (supra) that such a bargain as I have mentioned above is, or would be, unenforceable against the wife after a divorce.

There is no doubt a suggestion (at page 164) that such an agreement may be invalid. This suggestion is, however, only an obiter dictum, with which I will deal hereafter. For the moment I am content to say that Bishop v. Bishop (supra) leaves us free in our consideration of the present case.

The really relevant authorities for the decision of the present case are Morrall v. Morrall (supra) and the first case of Gandy v. Gandy (supra); for it appears to me that, while the appellants cannot succeed unless the former case is overruled, the respondents must fail unless Gandy v. Gandy (supra) is either departed from or distinguished. The grounds upon which the first case of Gandy v. Gandy (supra) was decided destroy completely the foundations upon which Morrall v. Morrall (supra) was built. Sir James Hannen had relied upon the same line of reasoning as appears to have influenced him in Gandy v. Gandy (supra). The judgment in Morrall v. Morrall (supra) is meagre, but it rests only on change of circumstances, namely, misconduct by the husband subsequent to the separation deed, with the four alleged consequences which I have enumerated earlier as the grounds of the decision in Gandy v. Gandy (supra). Morrall v. Morrall (supra) was cited and considered by the Court of Appeal in the first case of Gandy v. Gandy (supra), with the result that it was stated to be a decision which might be supported only upon the ground that the husband's conduct (namely, incestuous adultery) was such as to amount to repudiation by him of the whole contract. I confess that I feel difficulty in justifying the decision upon that ground. Morrall v. Morrall (supra) was again cited to the Courts in Bishop v. Bishop (supra); but although Sir Francis Jeune had said in his judgment that the Court of Appeal in Gandy v. Gandy (supra) had approved of Morrall v. Morrall (supra), the Court of Appeal in Bishop v. Bishop (supra) maintained an eloquent silence in regard to that decision. I cannot find that Morrall v. Morrall (supra) has ever in terms been approved in this Court. On the other hand, although the reasons for the decision have been disapproved, the decision itself has not been overruled. The truth is that the identical case (namely, a covenant in a separation deed not to sue for further maintenance followed by divorce) has not arisen in this Court until now. It now arises and must be decided; but we are unfettered as to Morrall v. Morrall (supra) if we think it ought to be overruled.

The authority which does bind this Court is the first case of Gandy v. Gandy (supra), and unless it can be distinguished on some material point it governs the present case. The outstanding point of distinction is, of course, that in Gandy v. Gandy (supra) the marriage had not been dissolved. I deviate for a moment to deal with a point raised in the argument. It was stated or suggested that in some way the authority of the first case of Gandy v. Gandy (supra) had been overruled or discredited or shaken by the decision of the Court of Appeal in the later case of Gandy v. Gandy (30 Ch.D., 57). This theory has cropped up here and there in judgments of various Presidents, but I thought that it had been disposed of for ever by the judgment of the Court of Appeal in Bishop v. Bishop (supra). What happened seems reasonably clear. Having held his wife to her covenant by the first decision, the husband subsequently refused to make payments for the maintenance of the children. Rightly or wrongly, the Court of Appeal in the second case of Gandy v. Gandy (supra) considered that the refusal by the husband operated to release the wife from her obligation not to sue, and they made an order in the following terms: "It now appearing that the husband declines to contribute to the maintenance and education of the two youngest children, stay the proceedings under the judgment of Vice-Chancellor Bacon till further order, with liberty to the wife, if she is so advised, to present a fresh petition to the Divorce Court for increased alimony, with liberty to either side to apply to restore this appeal to the paper." In the result, the wife presented her fresh petition and obtained a much larger sum for her maintenance than was provided by the separation deed. That decision in no way overrules, discredits, shakes, or throws the slightest doubt on the correctness of the decision in the first case of Gandy v. Gandy (supra). I am content to recall to mind (without repeating it) the emphatic language of the judgment in Bishop v. Bishop (supra) used for the purpose (but apparently without success) of making it for ever clear that the Court of Appeal had never gone back from that decision, and that the ground of the second decision was that the refusal of the husband freed the wife from her covenant.

Let me now return to the point of distinction—namely, that in the present case the separation deed has been followed by divorce. In Gandy v. Gandy (supra) it was only followed by judicial separation. In both cases there had been adultery by the husband.

Gandy v. Gandy (supra) has established that a wife is bound by her agreement not to enforce her statutory rights under section 190 (4) of the Act of 1925, notwithstanding her husband's subsequent misconduct. To quote the judgment in Bishop v. Bishop (supra), "in the first case of Gandy v. Gandy (supra) the Court held the wife bound by her agreement, there being no circumstances to relieve her from it, and no power in the Divorce Court to disregard her covenant." If that decision was correct, how does she become relieved of her agreement in the present case, and how does the Court acquire power in the present case to disregard her covenant? The only answer suggested is the word "divorce."

Is there anything in the nature of the rights conferred by section 190, subsection (1), of the Act of 1925 upon a wife different from the rights conferred upon her by subsection (4); and so essentially different that, while a bargain to release the latter will be enforced, as in Gandy v. Gandy (supra), a bargain to release the former should not? For myself, I cannot see why this should be so. The right under each subsection is a right conferred by statute for the personal benefit of an individual; in the latter case a wife living apart from her husband; in the former case a person whose status as wife has determined. I can see no valid reason why a contract entered into by such an individual whereby, in consideration of some other benefit received, that statutory benefit is released is not enforceable and should not be enforced. A wife can bargain away her right to consortium with her husband, Marshall v. Marshall (5 P.D., 19) and Besant v. Wood (supra). I do not see why she should not be allowed to bargain away or modify her personal right to support from her husband, whether during the continuance or after the dissolution of the marriage tie.

I put to counsel for the respondents, in argument, the question whether, after divorce obtained by a wife, and an order made for payment to the wife of an annual sum under section 190 (2) of the Act of 1925, the man and woman could, for valuable consideration, bargain not at any time thereafter to apply to the Court under section 196 of the Act of 1925 to vary the order made. It was admitted that such a contract would be valid and enforceable. In my opinion, the admission was correctly made, but it is quite irreconcilable with all the arguments of the respondents, except the argument of invalidity founded upon public policy.

I turn now to the argument founded on public policy. It is said that public policy requires that an agreement, such as was made in the present case, should be held to be illegal. Arguments which rest on so shifting and sandy a foundation as public policy require careful scrutiny—the more so when one is conscious that another element (which may equally well label itself public policy) comes into consideration on the other side—namely, freedom and observance of contract. There is, no doubt, a suggestion in Bishop v. Bishop (supra) that such an agreement may be invalid. This suggestion, however, is merely obiter, and the reasons for invalidity are not formulated. If the suggestion is based upon the theory of a licence for misconduct, it appears to me inconsistent with the statements in the Court of Appeal by Sir George Jessel and Lord Justice Cotton in Gandy v. Gandy (supra), which I have already read; and, indeed, inconsistent with the actual decision in that case, in which the bargain was upheld, after subsequent adultery by the husband. Moreover, upon its merits, the proposition does not commend itself to me—namely, that a bargain not to avail yourself of one of the by-products of a possible future divorce decree in consideration of your enjoying a fixed benefit from the date of the bargain onwards is tainted with illegality. The fixed benefit may turn out more or less than the Court would give under the statute; but I cannot see how such a bargain can reasonably be said to be a licence to commit adultery, or to encourage a dissolution of the marriage tie. The suggestion must be that the knowledge by a husband that the wife is bound to a fixed sum will kindle or fan the flame of passion and encourage him to embark upon a career of immorality. I decline to entertain any such far-fetched hypothesis.

The illegality point is also sought to be based upon the theory that this agreement is one executed in contemplation of divorce, and therefore illegal. Speaking for myself, I am not prepared to accept this general proposition. I do not see why the mere contemplation of that which the statute law of this country permits should be illegal. If the agreement goes further, and can truly be said to encourage a course of conduct or action which is against public policy, then, no doubt, the agreement would be illegal. But there is no trace of that here. There is immediate provision for the wife for all time, in consideration of which she gives her covenant not at any time to ask for more. Her covenant covers the whole of the future and all contingencies; it therefore covers, in fact (though not in express terms), the contingency of a divorce and the time subsequent to a divorce. To that extent only can the agreement here be said to be an agreement executed in contemplation of divorce. Is it, therefore, illegal? In my opinion, it is no more illegal than the common form clause in a separation deed which provides that the deed shall come to an end in the event of a divorce; and no more illegal than a covenant in a separation deed (which continues in operation after a divorce) that the husband shall pay an annual sum to the wife during the rest of her life. In the former case the parties are in terms contemplating the possibility of a divorce. In the latter case the covenant covers (though not in express terms) the contingency of a divorce and the time subsequent thereto. In my opinion, there is nothing illegal in the contract which we have here to consider.

When all is said and done, this fact emerges: that every argument adduced before us in support of the President's judgment is an argument which, if well-founded, would have been fatal to the husband on the first appeal in Gandy v. Gandy (supra). We are really asked to say that that decision was wrong, and that Morrall v. Morrall (supra) was right. In the view which I take, the true legal position is the exact reverse. Morrall v. Morrall (supra) was wrongly decided; the present appeal should be allowed, and the order of the Registrar restored.

In the other appeal of Hyman v. Hyman, the same principles apply. The provision for the wife in that case consisted of substantial lump sums paid down, and a weekly sum of £20, free of tax, during her life; the covenant by the wife was that neither she nor any other person on her behalf should at any time thereafter endeavour to compel the husband to allow her any alimony or maintenance further than the said weekly sum and the lump sums. There is no substantial difference in the relevant facts of the two cases. In Hyman v. Hyman Mr. Justice Hill simply followed the decision in the other case, as being a decision binding upon him, and given upon facts which were not capable of being distinguished. In my opinion the appeal in Hyman v. Hyman should also be allowed.

Insurance (Unemployment) — Domestic servants—Employment in hostel—Connexion of hostel with educational institution—Non-insurability—Unemployment Insurance Act, 1920 (10 and 11 Geo. V., c. 30), Sched. I., Part II. (b).

Domestic servants employed in a hostel which is so connected with an educational institution as to be part and parcel of that institution are not insurable under the Unemployment Insurance Act, 1920.

These three cases were an appeal and two references under the Unemployment Insurance Act, 1920.

The agreed facts in the first case were, inter alia, that the appellant, Miss Evelyn Minot, was the owner and occupier of Westbury, 1, Nightingale-lane, Clapham Common. The Girls' Public Day School Trust, Limited, held the premises on lease for many years down to 1922, during which time they were used solely as a hostel for students of the Clapham High School for Girls. In 1913 Miss Minot, who was head of the domestic department of the school, was appointed head of the hostel. She resigned in 1921 her position as head of the domestic department of the school, but continued to hold her appointment as head of the hostel. In 1922, with the knowledge and approval of the trust, she purchased the premises and was now owner and occupier as well as head of the hostel. From 1913 until the present time she had never received any remuneration from the trust for acting as head of the hostel, but had been entitled to retain for her own use any profit made and was liable for any loss. The school authorities, on behalf of the trust, admitted students, including students to be trained for teaching in the training department of the school, and arranged for their residence at the hostel, which was subject to regulations made by the council of the trust.

On November 4, 1927, the Minister of Labour decided that Mary Mackay, employed by Miss Minot as cook at the hostel, was an employed person within the meaning of the Unemployment Insurance Acts, 1920-1926, and on November 16, 1927, the Ministry stated that, in view of that decision, insurance contributions were payable in respect of her.

Against that decision Miss Minot now appealed on the ground, inter alia, that the cook was not employed in a trade or business carried on for the purpose of gain, and that she was, therefore, excepted by Schedule I., Part II. (b), of the Unemployment Insurance Act, 1920, as the hostel was part of the Clapham High School for Girls.

The two other cases were references by the Minister of Labour.

Mr. G. Edwardes Jones, K.C., and Mr. Gurney G. Beagley appeared for the appellant; Mr. C. W. Lilley for the Crown.

Mr. JONES said that the three cases were somewhat similar, and he supported the contention that the domestic servants were all excepted from the operation of the Act. He cited In re Application by David and others and In re Application by Bryant (38 The Times L.R., 11 ; [1922] 1 K.B., 172, at p. 184), known as the Rugby School case; In re North and Ingram (38 The Times L.R., 11; [1922] 1 K.B., 188); In re Wilkinson (38 The Times L.R., 254 ; [1922] 1 K.B., 584) ; In re Woollands, Limited ([1921] W.N., 247 ; and In re Selfridge and Co., Limited ([1922] W.N., 241).

He contended that residence in a hostel or boarding house which was conducted for educational purposes was as important a part of education as what was done in the school with which it was connected, and that where a hostel was controlled by the governing body of the school it did not matter whether the head of the hostel was a member of the school staff or not. The students in Miss Minot's hostel were being trained as teachers, and it was important that they should mix together. The hostel was part of the educational institution, and it came within the Rugby School decision (supra).

Mr. LILLEY said that there was no dispute that the duties of the servants were purely domestic. The difference between the three present cases was that Miss Minot was licensed, while the others were not ; she was not on the staff of the school, the others were. In the school cases cited the contracts were made between the parents of the students and the governors or the principals of the school. Here the contracts were made separately, and the girls, who were about 24 years of age, probably made their own arrangements. The hostels in question were no part of the corporate life of the school, and received no remuneration from the school.

Counsel added that the exception of domestic servants had given the Ministry of Labour more trouble than anything else. In university towns there were a large number of authorized lodgings where rules had to be observed. No one could argue that they were not carried on for the purpose of gain, and they were all to some extent under the control and discipline of the college authorities.

The hostels in the present cases were all distinct from the school, except that the authorities of the latter exercised some supervision. The hostels were, however, separate undertakings, and were no part of the school. If it were not for their connexion with the school they would be boarding houses simply, and the servants would certainly be insurable. The question was whether the connexion of the hostels with the school was close enough to bring them within the school cases which had been decided.

His LORDSHIP, in giving judgment, said that the three cases involved questions of fact, not law, of considerable difficulty. The difficulty was where to draw the line in administering the very difficult part of the Unemployment Insurance Act, 1920, which dealt with domestic servants. The scope of that Act was to except from insurability persons who were engaged in domestic service unless such servants were employed in a trade or business carried on for the purpose of gain. The commercial nature of the trade or business was in contemplation. The words "carried on for the purpose of gain" were inserted to emphasize the fact that only those persons were taken out of the original exception who were employed in commerce.

The present cases were those of domestic servants employed in hostels or boarding houses which were connected with or licensed by the Girls' Public Day School Trust, which was a body carrying on the day or high schools for girls which were so well known throughout the country.

He had previously decided in the Rugby School case (38 The Times L.R., 11; [1922] 1 K.B., 172) and in the North and Ingram case (38 The Times L.R., 11; [1922] 1 K.B., 188) that domestic servants employed in the boarding houses connected with public and private schools were not persons who were employed in a business carried on for the purpose of gain. Educational institutions and boarding houses connected therewith were not undertakings within the definition which he had given of business carried on for the purpose of gain. Starting from that principle, which he reaffirmed, the question in the present cases was whether the connexion between the school and the boarding houses was close enough to bring them within the cases already decided. In his opinion the proper answer was in the affirmative. There was such a nexus, owing to the management and control imposed on those hostels by the educational authorities, as to make them part and parcel of the educational institution with which they were connected and from which they derived their authority to take boarders. The domestic servants employed in those hostels or boarding houses were not, therefore, employed in a trade or business which was carried on for the purpose of gain, and were not insurable.

KISHAN SINGH v. THE KING-EMPEROR.*

India—Allahabad—Indian Penal Code.

The appellant was tried for murder by intentionally causing the death of another native. He was convicted by the Additional Sessions Judge and four assessors of culpable homicide not amounting to murder, and was sentenced to a term of rigorous imprisonment. The Government applied for a revision of the judgment and the High Court altered the conviction to one of murder and sentenced the appellant to death.

Held, that on an application for revision, as distinguished from an appeal, the High Court had no jurisdiction to convert the finding of an acquittal of murder into one of conviction and to sentence the man to death.

This was an appeal from a judgment of the High Court at Allahabad which, on an application for revision by the Local Government, convicted the appellant of murder under section 302 of the Indian Penal Code and sentenced him to death.

Mr. W. Wallach appeared for the appellant; Mr. Dunne, K.C., and Mr. Kenworthy Brown for the Indian Government.

SIR LANCELOT SANDERSON delivered their Lordships' judgment as follows:—

By his Majesty's Order in Council dated March 22, 1928, special leave to appeal against a judgment of the High Court of Judicature at Allahabad, dated October 31, 1927, was granted to the appellant.

On June 18, 1927, the appellant, Kishan Singh, was charged by a Magistrate of the First Class as follows:—

"That you on or about March 20, 1927, at Bharthwa did commit murder by intentionally causing the death of Kuber Singh and Shoran Singh and thereby committed an offence punishable under section 302 of the Indian Penal Code, and within the cognizance of the Court of Session.

"And I hereby direct that you be tried by the said Court on the said charge."

He was tried on the said charge by the Additional Sessions Judge of Aligarh, with the aid of four assessors, and on July 31, 1927, the learned Judge delivered his judgment. He recited the finding of the assessors as follows:—

"All the assessors are unanimously of the opinion that the accused was guilty under section 304, I.P. Code, and in their opinion the story about the rath was a false one and the accused had shot down Kuber Singh as he had seen him cohabiting with his own wife. They were also of opinion that both Shoran Singh and Kuber Singh were shot by Kishan Singh with his gun and the gandasa story was a got-up one and the gandasa was never used by the accused in order to kill Shoran Singh. They were also of the opinion that in the struggle which ensued between Kishan Singh and Shoran Singh the gun went off and shot Shoran Singh."

The learned Judge concluded his judgment by saying:—

"Agreeing with all the assessors I find the accused guilty under section 304, I.P.C., for committing both the said murders. I sentence him to three years' rigorous imprisonment for the murder of Kuber Singh under section 304, I.P.C., and I sentence him to five years' rigorous imprisonment for the murder of Shoran Singh with his gun under section 304, I.P.C.; both the sentences to run concurrently."

Although the learned Judge in the above-mentioned part of his judgment spoke of the "murder of Kuber Singh" and "the murder of Shoran Singh," it is clear that the sentence was passed under section 304 of the Indian Penal Code. That section deals with culpable homicide not amounting to murder, and it must therefore be taken for the purposes of this appeal that the offence of which the appellant was found guilty by the learned Judge was culpable homicide not amounting to murder.

The charge, as already stated, was that the appellant had committed an offence punishable under section 302 of the Indian Penal Code, viz., murder.

It is, however, provided by section 238 (2) of the Code of Criminal Procedure that when a person is charged with an offence and facts are proved which reduce it to a minor offence he may be convicted of the minor offence, although he is not charged with it.

It was, therefore, legitimate for the learned Judge to convict the appellant of the offence punishable under section 304 of the Indian Penal Code, viz., culpable homicide not amounting to murder, although there was no charge in respect of that offence framed against the appellant.

The learned Judge did not record an express finding of acquittal in respect of the charge of murder, but their Lordships are of opinion that the conclusion at which the learned Judge arrived amounted to an acquittal in respect of that charge.

The only charge framed against the appellant was one of murder; he certainly was not convicted of murder. On the contrary, he was found guilty of culpable homicide not amounting to murder.

The appeal, therefore, must be decided upon the assumption that the appellant was acquitted of the charge of murder, and that he was convicted of the offence punishable under section 304 of the Indian Penal Code.

On September 23, 1927, the Government advocate, on behalf of the Local Government, filed an application for revision of the judgment of the learned Additional Sessions Judge of Aligarh.

The grounds of the application were as follows:—

1. That on the evidence the accused should have been convicted under section 302, I.P.C.

2. That the sentence passed on the accused is inadequate.

The application concluded as follows:—

"It is therefore prayed that the conviction be allowed and the sentence passed on the accused be enhanced."

* Reported by SIR W. J. SOULSBY, Barrister-at-Law.

The learned counsel who appeared for the appellant argued that the word "altered" should be read instead of the word "allowed," whereas the learned counsel for the respondent suggested that the word "revision" should be read instead of the word "conviction."

It is not necessary to consider this matter further, for their Lordships are of opinion that, having regard to the terms of the first ground, there is no doubt but that the main object of the application for revision was to obtain a conviction of the accused in respect of the offence punishable under section 302 of the Indian Penal Code, viz., murder.

The application for revision was decided by the High Court of Judicature at Allahabad on October 31, 1927.

The learned Judges, having considered the evidence, came to the conclusion that there had been a miscarriage of justice in the trial Court. They accepted the application and directed that the conviction of the appellant, Kishan Singh, should be altered to a conviction under section 302 of the Indian Penal Code, and they sentenced him to death.

The main argument on which the learned counsel for the appellant relied was that the appellant had been acquitted by the Trial Judge of the charge of murder, that the Local Government had not appealed from the acquittal of the appellant in respect of that charge, as they might have done under section 417 of the Code of Criminal Procedure, 1898, that inasmuch as the Local Government had not appealed against the said acquittal, the learned Judges of the High Court should not have entertained the application for revision at the instance of the Local Government, and that in any event, even if it was open to the High Court to entertain the application for the purpose of enhancing the sentence in respect of the offence punishable under section 304 of the Indian Penal Code, of which the appellant had been convicted, the learned Judges had no jurisdiction to convert the finding of acquittal on the charge of murder into one of conviction.

As already stated, their Lordships are of opinion that the appellant was acquitted by the learned Judge who tried the case in respect of the charge of murder.

They are further of opinion that the Local Government could have appealed to the High Court against that acquittal in pursuance of the provisions of section 417 of the Code of Criminal Procedure.

It is clear that the Local Government did not appeal against the acquittal.

The procedure adopted by the Local Government was to present an application for revision.

The sections of the Code of Criminal Procedure which are material to the application for revision are 435 (1) and 439 (1), (4) and (5).

Section 435 (1) relates to the power to call for records of inferior Courts and is as follows:—

"435. (1) The High Court or any Sessions Judge or District Magistrate or any Sub-divisional Magistrate empowered by the Local Government in this behalf may call for and examine the record of any proceeding, before any inferior Criminal Court situate within the local limits of its or his jurisdiction for the purpose of satisfying itself or himself as to the correctness, legality or propriety of any finding, sentence or order recorded or passed, and as to the regularity of any proceedings of such inferior Court and may, when calling for such record, direct that the execution of any sentence be suspended and, if the accused is in confinement, that he be released on bail or on his own bond pending the examination of the record."

Section 439 relates to the High Court's powers of revision and subsections (1), (4) and (5) are as follows:—

"439. (1) In the case of any proceeding the record of which has been called for by itself or which has been reported for orders, or which otherwise comes to its knowledge, the High Court may, in its discretion, exercise any of the powers conferred on a Court of Appeal by sections 423, 426, 427 and 428 or on a Court by section 338, and may enhance the sentence; and when the Judges composing the Court of Revision are equally divided in opinion, the case shall be disposed of in manner provided by section 429.

"(4) Nothing in this section applies to an entry made under section 273, or shall be deemed to authorize a High Court to convert a finding of acquittal into one of conviction.

"(5) Where, under this Code, an appeal lies and no appeal is brought, no proceedings by way of revision shall be entertained at the instance of the party who could have appealed."

Their Lordships are of opinion that in view of the provision contained in section 439, subsection 4—that nothing in that section shall be deemed to authorize a High Court to convert a finding of acquittal into one of conviction—the learned Judges of the High Court, who were dealing only with the application for revision, had no jurisdiction to convert the learned Trial Judge's finding of acquittal on the charge of murder into one of conviction of murder.

Their Lordships' attention was drawn to a decision of the Madras High Court in In re K. Bali Reddi and Others (I.L.R., 37 Mad., 119), in which, amongst other matters, it was decided that section 439, subsection (4), must be construed as referring to cases where the trial has ended in a complete acquittal.

The reason of that decision was that any other construction would be inconsistent with the power to "alter the finding" given to the Court as a Court of Revision by virtue of its power to exercise the powers conferred on a Court of Appeal by section 423 (b).

It should be noted that the facts of the cited case are different from the facts of the present case, inasmuch as in the Madras case the accused had appealed to the High Court against their conviction under sections 147 and 304 of the Indian Penal Code, and the High Court, as a Court of Revision, had given them notice to show cause why they should not be convicted of murder and be sentenced for that offence.

It is not necessary on the present occasion for their Lordships to express any opinion whether the facts of the cited case would justify the decision at which the learned Judges arrived. Their Lordships, however, do think it necessary to say that if the learned Judges of the High Court of Madras intended to hold that the prohibition in section 439, subsection 4, refers only to a case where the trial has ended in a complete acquittal of the accused in respect of all charges or offences, and not to a case such as the present, where the accused has been acquitted of the charge of murder, but convicted of the minor offence of culpable homicide not amounting to murder, their Lordships are unable to agree with that part of their decision. The words of the subsection are clear and there can be no doubt as to their meaning. There is no justification for the qualification which the learned Judges in the cited case attached to the subsection.

The High Court of Allahabad, in the case of The Emperor v. Sheodarshan Singh (I.L.R. 44 All., 332) decided in 1922, and the High Court of Bombay in the case of The Emperor v. Shivputraya Durdundaya (I.L.R. 48 Bomb., 510), decided in 1924, dealing with the provisions of section 439 (4), arrived at a conclusion contrary to that of the Madras High Court in the case hereinbefore cited.

The head-note of the Allahabad case is as follows:—

"An accused person was charged with both murder and culpable homicide not amounting to murder. He was acquitted on the former charge and convicted on the latter. On a perusal of the sessions statement, notice was sent to the accused to show cause why he should not be convicted of murder and punished accordingly.

"Held, on return of the notice, that the High Court had no power, except through the medium of an appeal on behalf of the Local Government, to convert the acquittal into a conviction."

The learned Judges in giving judgment said as follows:—

"We cannot, however, change the conviction into a conviction for murder. Sheodarshan Singh was acquitted by the Sessions Judge of the offence of murder and we cannot in revision convert a finding of acquittal into one of conviction. The only method by which it would be possible to obtain a conviction of murder would be by an appeal by the Government against the acquittal."

Their Lordships are of opinion that the above is a correct statement of the law; it is indeed no more than a repetition of the provisions of the material sections of the Code of Criminal Procedure.

It was contended further by the learned counsel for the respondent that it was open to the High Court to entertain the application for revision at all events so far as it was an application that the sentence passed upon the appellant in respect of the offence, of which he had been convicted, should be enhanced; and he asked their Lordships to remit the case to the High Court of Allahabad in order that the application that the sentence in respect of the offence under section 304, Indian Penal Code, should be enhanced, might be heard and disposed of.

Their Lordships do not express any opinion on the facts of this case, or upon the decisions arrived at by the two Courts in India in respect thereof, or upon the adequacy of the sentence passed upon the appellant by the learned Judge who tried the case.

In the circumstances of this case, however, their Lordships have come to the conclusion that it would not be right to remit it to the High Court for further consideration solely upon the question whether the sentence in respect of the offence, of which the appellant was convicted, should be enhanced.

Finally, it was urged by the learned counsel on behalf of the respondent that even though the learned Judges of the High Court had no jurisdiction on the application for revision to convert the order of acquittal on the charge of murder into one of conviction, there had been no injustice done to the appellant, for the Local Government could have appealed to the High Court against the acquittal, that the time for appealing had not expired, and that the High Court upon such appeal would have had before it the same materials as were before the Court on the application for revision, and the appellant could and would have been convicted of murder.

Their Lordships cannot accept that argument.

They are of opinion that the learned Judges of the High Court in converting the finding of acquittal of the appellant on the charge of murder into one of conviction, and in sentencing him to death on the application for revision, were acting without jurisdiction, and in such circumstances it is impossible to hold that no injustice was done.

Their Lordships are of opinion that this case comes within the exception to the rule stated in the judgment of Lord Watson in In re Dillett (3 The Times L.R., 492; 12 App. Cas., 459, at p. 467).

This appeal, therefore, should be allowed, the judgment and order of the High Court should be set aside, and the judgment and order of the learned Additional Sessions Judge should be restored, and their Lordships will humbly advise his Majesty accordingly.

IN RE VISSER—QUEEN OF HOLLAND v. DRUKKER AND OTHERS.*

Conflict of Laws—Foreign revenue law—Whether enforceable.

The Court has no jurisdiction to entertain an action for the enforcement of the revenue law of a foreign State.

This was a motion on behalf of the defendant, Mr. Israel Zeegen, to strike out the statement of claim and to dismiss this action, in which her Majesty the Queen of Holland sought to recover from the defendants, who were alleged to be the legal personal representatives in England of Mr. David Visser, deceased, sums alleged to be due to the plaintiff by virtue of the fiscal laws of Holland, which imposed dues on the estates of deceased persons of Dutch nationality and domicile.

It was claimed that the plaintiff was a creditor of the deceased man's estate. For the defendants, it was contended that the English Courts did not take notice of the revenue laws of foreign States, and that foreign States could not sue for the recovery of taxes falling due under foreign law.

Mr. A. M. Latter, K.C., and Mr. Henry Johnston appeared for the defendant, Mr. Israel Zeegen, the applicant on the motion; Mr. C. A. Bennett, K.C., and Mr. Frank Gahan for the plaintiff, the respondent on the motion; Mr. James Wylie for the defendant, Mr. Maritz Drukker; and Mr. Wilfrid Hunt for the defendant, Mr. Willem Roosegaard Bisschopp.

Mr. Latter said that there was no precedent in English Courts for an action of this kind. The claim was to collect, in this country, succession duty accruing under Dutch law. Such a claim was quite contrary to the elementary rule of law that one country did not enforce the revenue laws of another: Municipal Council of Sydney v. Bull [or Cook] (25 The Times L.R., 6; [1909] 1 K.B., 7); Indian and General Investment Trust, Limited v. Borax Consolidated, Limited (36 The Times L.R., 125; [1920] 1 K.B., 539); Huntington v. Attrill (8 The Times L.R., 341; [1893] A.C., 150). Rule 54 in the fourth edition of Dicey's "Conflict of Laws" stated, at page 224:—

"The Court has no jurisdiction to entertain an action (1) for the enforcement, either directly or indirectly, of a penal, revenue, or political law of a foreign State, or (2) where the grounds of the action involve an Act of State."

Mr. Bennett referred to the cases cited by Mr. Latter, for the applicant, and also to Spiller v. Turner

* Reported by K. R. A. Hart, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

([1897] 1 Ch., 911); Cotton v. The King (30 The Times L.R., 71; [1914] A.C., 176); Emperor of Austria v. Day (3 de G. F. and J., 217); Holman v. Johnson (1 Cowper, 341); Planché v. Fletcher (1 Douglas, 251); Henry v. Sargeant (13 New Hampshire Reports, 321); Alves v. Hodgson (7 T.R., 241); Clegg v. Levy (3 Campbell, 166); and The Eva (37 The Times L.R., 920; [1921] P., 454). There was no direct authority for the proposition that the English Courts do not enforce the revenue laws of a foreign country.

Mr. LATTER replied. He was stopped by the Court.

MR. JUSTICE TOMLIN, in giving judgment, said that for the last 200 years, or, at any rate, since the time of Lord Hardwicke, Judges had repeatedly said that the Courts of this country would not take notice of the revenue laws of foreign States. In the rule that was now Rule 54 in the fourth edition of Professor Dicey's book, the word "revenue" had appeared for the first time in the third edition, which was brought out in 1922.

It had been argued for the respondent on the motion that what had been said by the Judges in the cases cited had been obiter dicta, and ought, in the present case, to be disregarded, because there had been no actual decision establishing the proposition. But the absence of authority for what had been called an elementary proposition might mean merely that the proposition was so well recognized that it had never been put to the test.

A number of cases had been cited, and it was very difficult to say of any one of them that it was a direct decision. But the case of Municipal Council of Sydney v. Bull [or Cook] (25 The Times L.R., 6; [1909] 1 K.B., 7) did support the view that the revenue law of a foreign country would not be enforced in England, although there were certain cases in which they were bound to recognize some of the consequences of that law.

Being bound by the ordinary rule, he felt bound to treat the case of Municipal Council of Sydney v. Bull [or Cook] (supra) as one which it was his duty to follow, and to leave it to a higher jurisdiction to say whether the rule should be maintained. His view was that there was a recognized rule under which English Courts would not collect taxes for foreign Sovereign States. The present application, therefore, succeeded, and the statement of claim would be struck out and the action dismissed. As the foreign Sovereign had submitted to the jurisdiction of the Court, the Court was in a position to order her to pay costs.

Court of Appeal.
1928. June 25.

M. WHEELER AND CO., LIMITED v. WARREN.*

Companies—Debentures—Powers of receiver—Getting in property—Action without company's consent.

A debenture of a limited company empowered the holder to appoint a receiver and manager and provided: "A receiver and manager so appointed shall be the agent of the company and shall have power (1) to take possession of and get in the property hereby charged . . ." A receiver and manager having been appointed brought an action in the name of the company for the rescission of an agreement by the defendant for the purchase of land from the company and forfeiture of the deposit, and alternatively for specific performance.

Held, that the debenture empowered the receiver and manager to bring the action without the company's consent.

This was an appeal from a decision of the Vice-Chancellor of the County Palatine Court of Lancaster, who had held that a receiver appointed by a debentureholder of the plaintiffs, M. Wheeler and Company, Limited, had no power to bring certain proceedings in the name of the company.

On August 26, 1927, a debenture was issued by the company to David Horwich charging its undertaking and all its assets by way of floating security for a sum of £75 then advanced and further advances. Clause 5 of the debenture gave the lender power to appoint a receiver and manager at any time after the principal moneys thereby secured had become payable. Clause 6 provided:—"A receiver and manager so appointed shall be the agent of the company and shall have power (1) to take possession of and get in the property hereby charged . . ."

The principal moneys having become due, the debentureholder appointed Mr. Joshua Ralph Atkins to be a receiver and manager of the property charged. On May 5, 1928, the receiver issued the writ in this action in the name of the company against the defendant, Mrs. Sarah Ann Warren, claiming rescission of an agreement dated September 23, 1927, entered into on behalf of the company with the defendant for the sale of land to her; and forfeiture of the deposit paid by her; and (in the alternative) specific performance of that agreement.

The defendant moved for an order that the company might be struck out as plaintiffs and all further proceedings stayed on the ground that the action had been begun without the company's authority. Against that it was contended that the receiver had power to bring the proceedings in the name of the company without its consent.

The Vice-Chancellor held that the receiver had not that power and made the order asked for.

The receiver appealed in the name of the company.

Mr. Grant, K.C., and Mr. John Bennett appeared for the appellant company; Mr. Gover, K.C., and Mr. J. M. Easton for the respondent.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS said that the appeal raised an extremely short point on the construction of the debenture in question. It was not expressly provided by clause 6 (1) of the debenture that the receiver was to have power to use the company's name in proceedings to get in property charged, but it was provided that the receiver was "To take possession of and get in the property hereby charged." It appeared to him (his Lordship) that as the getting in of the property was to be done by the receiver, and the property was vested in the company, he must have power to get in the property in the only way in which it was possible—namely, by bringing an action for the purpose in the name of the company. The fact that the receiver was made the agent of the company and given power to get in the property charged was sufficient to give him power to take the requisite steps in the name of the company. Otherwise the receiver would have to go to the company for its assent to the action being brought and the effect of that would be to render clause 6 (1) valueless. The purpose of the debenture was to give ample security to the lender, and it appeared to him (his Lordship), therefore, that clause 6 (1) must be taken to have the wide meaning that would entitle the receiver to get in assets by action in the company's name.

An argument was advanced that an action for rescission was not an action for getting in property of the company. But there was an alternative claim for specific performance, and if an order for specific performance were made, that would have the effect of getting in the purchase money. The alternative claim for rescission was made as a means of getting all outstanding questions decided between the parties, and in that sense the proceedings were proceedings to get in property charged. The appeal would, therefore, be allowed.

LORD JUSTICE LAWRENCE and LORD JUSTICE RUSSELL gave judgment to the same effect.

HODGKINSON AND ANOTHER v. HEWITT.*

Landlord and Tenant—Restrictions—Rates paid by owner instead of occupier—Nine-tenths only of full rate payable—Claim to increase rent by full rate—Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920 (10 and 11 Geo. V., c. 17), s. 2 (1) (b).

In 1927 the Sheffield City Council, by virtue of section 56 of the Sheffield Corporation Act, 1920, passed a resolution to the effect that from October 5, 1927, the owner and not the occupier of premises where the rateable value did not exceed £10 should be rated to the consolidated rate on a basis of nine-tenths of the full consolidated rate. There was thus a difference of 10 per cent. of the full consolidated rate between the full rate previously payable by the occupier and the rate now payable by the owner.

The landlords of certain premises, within the rateable value limit fixed by the resolution, claimed the right to increase their tenant's rent under the Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920, by the full consolidated rate as previously paid by the tenant, and not by the amount, equal to nine-tenths of that rate, now payable by the landlords.

Held, that section 2 (1) (b) of the Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920, was applicable to the facts of the case, and that there had been an "increase" in the amount for the time being payable by the landlords in respect of rates over the corresponding amount paid in respect of the period including August 3, 1914; but that the landlords could only increase the rent by the amount of nine-tenths of the full consolidated rate, and not by the amount of the full rate previously paid by the tenant.

This was an appeal by the plaintiffs from a decision of his Honour Judge Lias, sitting at Sheffield County Court. The plaintiffs, who were the owners of 9, Broom-close, Sheffield, claimed from the defendant, Mr. John Hewitt, the tenant of the premises, a sum of money by way of increase of rent which they said that they were entitled to charge under the Rent Restriction Acts. The amount of increase per week represented the difference between the rate levied on the premises for which the defendant had previously been liable, namely, 2s. 11d., and the rate of 2s. 7½d. which became payable by the plaintiffs in the following circumstances:—

By the Sheffield Corporation Act, 1920, the rates were consolidated and became a comprehensive borough rate. On May 4, 1927, by virtue of section 56 of the Sheffield Corporation Act, 1920, which provided that the owner instead of the occupier might be rated in certain cases to the consolidated rate, a resolution, which took effect on October 5, 1927, was passed by the Sheffield City Council placing the liability for the rate on the owners in certain cases limited by the rateable value of the premises. The result in the case of the present premises was that, instead of the occupier being rated at 2s. 11d. per week, the owners became the persons rated and liable as such to pay a rate calculated on the basis of nine-tenths of the amount in the pound of the full consolidated rate, which was 2s. 7½d. per week instead of 2s. 11d., the amount of the full consolidated rate previously levied on and payable by the occupier. The owners were allowed the 10 per cent. rebate in respect of the cost of collection, the risk of bad debts and other matters which had to be borne by the owners.

The plaintiffs then gave the defendant notice under the Rent Restriction Acts and the Sheffield Corporation Act, 1920, of an increase of rent. The question was whether the plaintiffs were entitled to add the whole 2s. 11d. rate, which the occupier had paid, to the rent, or only the 2s. 7½d. for which they, the plaintiffs, were now liable.

By section 1 of the Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920, if the increased rent exceeded the standard rent by more than the permitted amount, the amount of excess was irrecoverable; and the permitted amount under section 2 (1) was an amount not exceeding any increase in the amount for the time being payable by the landlord in respect of rates over the corresponding amount paid in respect of the period including August 3, 1914.

The county court Judge gave judgment for the defendant. The plaintiffs appealed.

Mr. Konstam, K.C., and Mr. F. M. Crawshaw appeared for the appellants; Mr. W. Hanbury Aggs and Mr. F. J. O. Coddington for the respondent.

MR. JUSTICE ACTON.—This appeal was concerned with the incidence of rates in Sheffield and the application thereto of the provisions of the Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920. The question in issue between the parties was whether in the circumstances the landlords of a dwelling to which that Act applied were entitled to demand from the tenant a weekly rental of 2s. 11d., as they contended, or a weekly rental of 2s. 7½d., as the tenant contended.

Before the outbreak of War in 1914 there were being levied and paid in Sheffield (a) a poor rate, and (b) a general district rate. To the poor rate there had not been applied either of the systems of compounding such a rate which are dealt with by sections 3 and 4 of the Poor Rate Assessment and Collection Act, 1869. The poor rate was accordingly a rate which was leviable upon and payable by the occupiers, and there had not been an agreement by the owners of hereditaments to which section 3 of the Act of 1869 had application to pay the rate and be allowed a commission on the amount thereof, nor any order under section 4 of that Act that the owners of such hereditaments should be rated instead of the occupiers upon the terms of that section. As to the other rate in force, the general district rate (the legislation as to compounding which rate is to be found in section 211 (1) (a) of the Public Health Act, 1875), in 1914 the owner was rated at an amount equivalent to 75 per cent. of the full rate, and this rate was levied and paid on that basis. In practice the owner paid both the poor rate and the general district rate, the two rates together amounting to 2s. 1d. a week, though there was no information before us to show how this amount was divided between poor rate and general district rate; and the owner added this amount of 2s. 1d. a week to the rent payable by the tenant. This continued until 1920 when the Sheffield Corporation Act, 1920, was passed. Part VIII. of that Act deals with the "Consolidation of Rates, &c." Section 45 provides that "this Part of this Act shall come into operation as and from March 31, 1921." Sections 46-50 provide that from and after that date the rates are to be consolidated and are to become a comprehensive borough rate. It was contended by Mr. Konstam, and not controverted, that the result of this was that the enactments applying to such rate were sections 3 and 4 of the Poor Rate Assessment and Collection Act, 1869, and not sections 209-211 of the Public Health Act, 1875. In 1921, however, this consolidated rate was dealt with as a rate for which the occupier and not the owner was liable without any deduction or abatement, and the whole rate was levied upon the occupier. The owner, therefore, had no direct relation thenceforward with the rating authority in respect of this consolidated borough rate, but paid, as he had always paid, the water rate. This system remained in operation until 1927. What then took place was this: By section 56 of the Sheffield Corporation Act, 1920, it is provided that the owner instead of the occupier may be rated in certain cases to the consolidated rate. The full terms of this section are as follows: "(1) The owner, instead of the occupier, may from time to time, at the option of the Corporation, be rated to the consolidated rate, (A) Where the rateable value of the premises does not exceed seven pounds or such other amount not exceeding ten pounds as the Corporation from time to time may determine; or (B) where the premises are let in separate apartments; or (C) where the rents are collected weekly: Provided that where the rateable value of the premises does not exceed seven pounds or other the amount for the time being determined as aforesaid, the owner so rated shall be assessed to the consolidated rate in respect of such hereditaments on the full rateable value thereof but shall be liable to pay in respect of such premises a rate calculated on the basis of not less than four-fifths or more than nine-tenths (as the Corporation shall from time to time prescribe) of the amount in the pound of the full consolidated rate. (2) When the Corporation exercise their powers under this section they shall forthwith give notice thereof to the overseers and the overseers shall rate the owner and the owner shall pay the rate accordingly and during the currency of any such notice the provisions of this section shall apply within the city in substitution for the provisions with regard to the rating of owners instead of occupiers which are contained in sections 3, 4, and 5 of the Poor Rate Assessment and Collection Act, 1869." Under that section a resolution was passed and confirmed on May 4, 1927, by the Sheffield City Council, as follows, namely:—"Resolved: That this committee recommend the council, as the local rating authority, to exercise, in respect of future consolidated rates to be made by them, the option given to them by section 56 of the Sheffield Corporation Act, 1920, to rate to the consolidated rate the owner of premises instead of the occupier, where the rateable value of the premises does not exceed £10, and that such owner shall be liable to pay, in respect of such premises, a rate calculated on the basis of nine-tenths of the amount in the pound of the full consolidated rate."

This resolution took effect as from October 5, 1927, and the result was in relation to the premises in question in this case, which were admittedly premises to which the resolution applied, that instead of the occupier being rated at 2s. 11d. a week, the owners became the persons rated and liable as such to pay, in respect of the premises in question, a "rate calculated on the basis of nine-tenths of the amount in the pound of the full consolidated rate," or in other words, 2s. 7½d. a week, instead of 2s. 11d., the amount of the full consolidated rate previously levied upon and payable by the occupier. The question then was whether the owners, as landlords, were, under the Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920, entitled to increase the rent payable by the occupier, as tenant, by the sum of 2s. 11d. or only by the sum of 2s. 7½d.

The contention of the appellant landlords, as formulated by Mr. Konstam, was that in these circumstances section 2 (1) (b) of the Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920, had no application, and that the provision applicable was section 2 (3). As a corollary to this proposition, he contended further that the principle laid down in Nicholson v. Jackson (37 The Times L.R., 887) could not be applied in the present case. The substance of this argument was that what was effected by the resolution of the city council under section 56 of the Sheffield Corporation Act, 1920, could not be said to be an "increase" in the amount for the time being payable by the landlords over the corresponding amount paid by them in the specified period of 1914; that there was no amount "corresponding," within the meaning of the subsection, to the amount at which the landlords became rated in 1927; and that there was no possibility of a comparison between an earlier amount paid, and a later amount becoming payable, by the landlords, upon which it was right or reasonable to say that the latter amount was an "increase" over the earlier amount. It was said that what had taken place was not an increase in the amount payable by the landlords, but a transfer to the landlords of a burden or liability previously borne by the tenant; that that was a matter expressly dealt with by subsection (3) and not by subsection (1) (b); and that as the burden or liability which was transferred from the tenant to the landlords was the burden or liability of discharging 100 per cent. of the full consolidated rate, the landlords were entitled to increase the rent payable by an amount equivalent to 100 per cent. of the full consolidated rate, or in other words, the sum of 2s. 11d. instead of only 90 per cent. of that rate, or, in other words, 2s. 7½d. per week. It was said that, if that contention prevailed, it could not be said to be the result of the transfer of such a burden or liability that the terms on which the dwelling-house was held were on the whole less favourable to the tenant than the previous terms, and that there was no reason why such an increase of rent as the landlords sought to impose in respect of such a transfer from tenant to landlords of this burden or liability should be deemed to be an "increase" of rent obnoxious to, or impermissible under, the Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920, or indeed an "increase" of rent at all. The argument then proceeded to the further proposition that, if these points were once established, there was no reason why the principle of Nicholson v. Jackson (supra) should be applied, and good reason why it should not. It was, however, admitted that if section 2 (1) (b) was applicable to the present case, this appeal could not succeed, and the principle of Nicholson v. Jackson (supra) would then apply.

The respondent's contention, in answer to these arguments, was this: By section 12 (1) (d) the expression "rates," for the purposes of the Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920, includes "water rents and charges." The landlords of the premises in question have always paid the water rate, and, therefore, were always paying "rates." In 1914 what they received from the tenant was 7s. a week—4s. 11d. for rent and 2s. 1d. for rates. This sum of 2s. 1d. comprised water rate, poor rate, and general district rate. The landlords have throughout paid some "rates," namely, the water rate, and from 1914 to 1921 the poor rate and the general district rate, the latter under the compounding section 211, of the Public Health Act, 1875. From 1921 to 1927 it is true that they paid water rate only. But as the landlords were always paying some "rates" within the meaning of the Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920, any alteration in the rates payable by them must have been either an increase or a diminution of the rates payable by them. Attention was then drawn to section 1 and to section 12 (1) (a) and (c) of the Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920. By section 12 (1) (a), "The expression 'standard rent' means the rent at which the dwelling-house was let on the third day of August nineteen hundred and fourteen, or, where the dwelling-house was not let on that date, the rent at which it was last let before that date, or, in the case of a dwelling-house which was first let after the said third day of August, the rent at which it was first let: Provided that, in the case of any dwelling-house let at a progressive rent payable under a tenancy agreement or lease, the maximum rent payable under such tenancy agreement or lease shall be the standard rent; and, where, at the date by reference to which the standard rent is calculated, the rent was less than the rateable value the rateable value at that date shall be the standard rent." By section 12 (1), (c) "The expression 'net rent' means, where the landlord at the time by reference to which the standard rent is calculated paid the rates chargeable on, or which but for the provisions of any Act would be chargeable on the occupier, the standard rent less the amount of such rates, and in any other case the standard rent." If regard be had to section 2 (1) (b) of this Act (ignoring permissible increases of rent in respect of matters other than increase of "rates" payable by the landlord), the rent to which the landlord is entitled is the "standard rent" with the addition of any subsequent increase permitted by section 2 (1) (b), the "standard rent" being the "net rent" with the addition of any rates which were paid by the landlord at the material date, which may be roughly described as the date of the outbreak of the War. The rates paid at this date by the landlords were 2s. 1d. per week. The rates now payable by the landlords are 2s. 7½d. per week, an increase of 6½d. per week; and that amount is a permitted increase, and the only permitted increase, of the rent which the landlords are entitled to claim against the tenant, upon the true construction of section 2 (1) (b) and on the principle decided in Nicholson v. Jackson (supra).

It was said that the fallacy of the argument for the appellants is that it introduces and persists in maintaining a confusion between the "standard rent" and the "net rent." It is true that in 1922 the landlords were getting 7s. 4d., which included no "rates" other than the water rate, the amount of which was then 4d. a week. But the landlords were always entitled to the "standard rent," which includes the rates which were being paid by the landlords at the date of the outbreak of the War. It was also said that, however this may be, and from whatever point of view the matter is to be regarded, what has happened is that there has been an "increase" in "the amount for the time being payable by the landlords in respect of rates over the corresponding amount paid in respect of the yearly, half-yearly or other period, which included the third day of August, 1914." It follows that section 2 (1) (b) applies in express terms to what has taken place in the present case, and it is unnecessary to look further. It also follows that the principle of Nicholson v. Jackson (supra) also applies.

I think that the respondent's contention is the correct one. I am of opinion that what has taken place is an "increase" of the rates payable by the landlords such as is contemplated by, and dealt with in, section 2 (1) (b) of the Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920, and that that is the subsection which is applicable to the facts of this case. It follows, of course, that the principle of Nicholson v. Jackson (supra) must also apply, and the result is that this appeal fails. I am, however, also of opinion that even if Mr. Konstam had succeeded in establishing that the subsection applicable was subsection (3), there would still have been no satisfactory or sufficient reason for holding that to the transfer of this burden or liability from the tenant to the landlords the principle of Nicholson v. Jackson (supra) ought not to be applied, as it must beyond question be applied to any "increase" of rates within section 2 (1) (b). It is highly undesirable to introduce this further complication into the interpretation of legislation already very complicated, unless indeed it cannot be avoided; and we think that the sounder view is that advanced by Mr. Coddington for the respondent, that even if Mr. Konstam were right in saying that the appropriate subsection is (3), the principle of Nicholson v. Jackson (supra) must still apply.

MR. JUSTICE FINLAY.—I agree. This is an appeal from a decision given by his Honour Judge Lias sitting in the Sheffield County Court in a case which, in form, was an action of ejectment, but, in substance, was a proceeding raising a point which is said to affect the position as between landlord and tenant in a very large proportion of the houses in the City of Sheffield. The amount at stake in the particular case is very small, but for the reason indicated the point has been treated, and no doubt rightly, as one of importance to those owning or occupying houses in Sheffield. The facts are as follows : The defendant was the tenant, and the plaintiffs were the landlords, of a dwelling-house, No. 9, Broom-close, Sheffield. The defendant had been tenant of the house for many years. In August, 1914, the standard net rent of the house was 7s. per week, being 4s. 11d. in respect of rent, and 2s. 1d. in respect of rates. Of the 2s. 1d. rates 3¾d. represented water rate, which was throughout the whole period payable and paid by the landlords. The rates, apart from water rate, represented in proportions which we do not know precisely, and which are not material, poor rate and general district rate. This standard rent of 7s. had, by reason of various permitted increases, risen to 9s. in 1921.

In order to make intelligible the further facts it is necessary to state, quite shortly, the general position of the law with regard to rates, and to refer in particular to the Sheffield Corporation Act, 1920. With regard to poor rate, the important Act is the Poor Rate Assessment and Collection Act, 1869. Sections 3 and 4 of that Act contain provisions whereby the rates of certain hereditaments of a certain value may, either by agreement or by order of the vestry, be exigible from the owner instead of the occupier, and make provision for certain rebates to be allowed to the owner. These sections were never brought into operation in the City of Sheffield, and the result was that the poor rate was, up to and including 1914, levied on the occupier. With regard to the general district rate, that is dealt with by section 209 and the following sections of the Public Health Act, 1875. Section 211 of that Act relates to compounding. The position in Sheffield was that this rate was levied on the owner, and 75 per cent. only of the rate was, in accordance with the statutory provision, exacted from such owner. In practice the owner paid both the rates, recouping himself by a corresponding increase in the rent.

By the Sheffield Corporation Act of 1920 it is provided (see section 46 and the following sections) that the poor rate and the general district rate are to be consolidated into one rate called the consolidated rate. The result of this Act was to effect an alteration in the incidence of the rates in the City of Sheffield, and from 1921 onwards the whole rate was made on the occupier, and was levied without deduction. This transfer of the liability to rate from owner to occupier was the subject of an unreported decision of the Divisional Court in 1921 in Highfield v. Griffin, which will be referred to later in this judgment.

By a resolution of the city council of Sheffield of May 4, 1927, it was resolved to bring into operation section 56 of the Sheffield Corporation Act, 1920, and the house with which we are here concerned, being of the rateable value of £9 10s., was brought within the section. The effect of what was done was that from October, 1927, the rates, instead of being levied on the occupier, were levied on the owners, and, by reason of the corporation prescribing that amount, the owner was to pay, not the whole rate, but nine-tenths of the rate. The owner having thus become liable to pay a rate previously paid by the occupier, it is common ground between the parties that the Rent Restriction Acts permit the owner to recoup himself by an addition to the rent. There is no difficulty in seeing that a tenant must pay a larger sum by way of rent if his landlord pays the rates than he would pay if he pays the rates himself. The dispute in this matter is as to what is the proper amount to be added to the rent. The contention of the defendant is that inasmuch as 90 per cent. only of the rate is in fact exigible from the plaintiffs, 90 per cent. represents the sum which may be added to the rent. The contention of the plaintiffs is that inasmuch as the defendant has been relieved from paying 100 per cent. of the rates, and the liability to pay rates has been wholly shifted to the plaintiffs, they are entitled to add 100 per cent. of the rates to the rent. In terms of figures, the amount at stake is 3½d. per week. If 90 per cent. only of the rates can be added to the rent the addition to the rent will be 2s. 7½d. If 100 per cent. of the rates can be added the amount of the sum added will be 2s. 11d.

From a general point of view there is, of course, a very great deal to be said for the plaintiffs' contention. The defendant has got rid of his liability to pay the whole of the rates, and although the plaintiffs are liable to pay 90 per cent. only, it is no doubt true that the 10 per cent. abatement is allowed in respect of the cost of collection, the risk of bad debts, and other matters which have to be borne by the plaintiffs. The matter, however, cannot be decided upon any such broad considerations. It depends upon the exact terms of this difficult and involved Act, and upon the application of decided cases. There is a dispute between the parties as to which is the section of the Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920, which is applicable in this case. The defendant says that section 2 (1) (b) of the Act of 1920 is the relevant section. By that section there is a permitted increase in rent as follows :—" (b) An amount not exceeding any increase in the amount for the time being payable by the landlord in respect of rates over the corresponding amount paid in respect of the yearly, half-yearly or other period which included the third day of August, 1914, or in the case of a dwelling-house for which no rates were payable in respect of any period which included the said date, the period which included the date on which the rates first became payable thereafter." The plaintiffs, on the other hand, contend that on the facts of this case section 2 (1) (b) does not apply, and that the relevant provision is section 2 (3). That is in the following terms : " (3) Any transfer to a tenant of any burden or liability previously borne by the landlord shall, for the purposes of this Act, be treated as an alteration of rent, and where, as the result of such a transfer, the terms on which a dwelling-house is held are on the whole less favourable to the tenant than the previous terms, the rent shall be deemed to be increased, whether or not the sum periodically payable by way of rent is increased, and any increase of rent in respect of any transfer to a landlord of any burden or liability previously borne by the tenant where, as the result of such transfer, the terms on which any dwelling-house is held are on the whole not less favourable to the tenant than the previous terms, shall be deemed not to be an increase of rent for the purposes of this Act : Provided that, for the purposes of this section, the rent shall not be deemed to be increased where the liability for rates is transferred from the landlord to the tenant, if a corresponding reduction is made in the rent."

Upon the whole, I incline to the view that the very able argument of Mr. Coddington on this point is correct, and that section 2 (1) (b) is the relevant section. I was not impressed by the arithmetical criticism which Mr. Konstam made of that argument, for his criticism appeared to me to depend upon ignoring other permitted increases which would have altered the standard rent between 1914 and the date we have to consider. More difficulty is, to my mind, caused by the decision of a Divisional Court in the unreported case of Highfield v. Griffin. In that case it was decided that the transfer of liability to rates from landlord to tenant which, as pointed out earlier in this judgment, took place in 1921, was a transfer of a burden or liability within the earlier part of subsection (3). In that case the point which was so forcibly put to us was not argued, and, further, it may be noted that the proviso at the end of the subsection is a proviso only on the earlier part relating to transfer from landlord to tenant, and not on the latter part relating to transfer from tenant to landlord. But I nevertheless feel considerable difficulty in holding that while a transfer of rates from landlord to tenant is a transfer of a burden within the subsection, a re-transfer of the liability back from tenant to landlord is not within the subsection. For this reason I prefer to discuss the case both on the view of the defendant that section 2 (1) (b) is the relevant section, and also on the view of the plaintiffs that section 2 (3) is the relevant section. In my opinion whichever be the relevant section the result is the same.

If the section to be considered is section 2 (1) (b) the question is what was the increase in the amount payable by the landlords in respect of rates over the corresponding amount paid in respect of the period including August 4, 1914. In my opinion we are bound by the decision of the House of Lords in Nicholson v. Jackson (37 The Times L.R., 887) to hold that the word "payable" in the subsection has reference to the amount in money which there is a liability to pay. The case was decided on the corresponding provision in the Act of 1915, but it was not suggested that any distinction could be drawn by reason of any change of language. Mr. Konstam pointed out to us that there was a remarkable difference of judicial opinion in Nicholson v. Jackson (supra), and no doubt the case was one which admits of much argument, but it does not appear to me to be profitable to consider the difficulty which arose in that case, for it was not, and it could not be, questioned that we are bound by the view which commended itself to the majority alike in the Court of Appeal and in the House of Lords. It follows that, applying this decision to the present case, the amount payable by the landlords, the present plaintiffs, was 90 per cent., and not 100 per cent. of the rates.

It now only remains to consider what is the effect if the view be taken that section 2 (3) is the section really applicable. It may be pointed out, though perhaps in a case under the Rent Restriction Act the argument may not be very weighty, that if the construction of section 2 (3) contended for by the plaintiffs is adopted the result would be curious and anomalous. On the view of the construction of the Act which I am now adopting there may be an increase of rates borne by the landlord due to such causes as increase in local expenditure, and there may also be an increase in rates borne by the landlord due to the transfer of the liability to some rate to him. It is certainly a startling result if, in the case of an increase due to causes other than the transfer, the actual amount payable only is to be allowed, while in the case of increase due to transfer the whole amount of the rate, whether payable or given as a rebate for expenses, is to be allowed. I am of opinion that the construction of subsection (3) does not lead to any such result. The words to be considered are "any transfer to a landlord of any burden or liability previously borne by the tenant." The liability previously borne by the tenant was a liability to pay the rates. The liability now borne by the landlord is a liability to pay the rates. In so far as the liability to pay rates is concerned, there is no difficulty in holding (assuming the subsection is really applicable at all) that the liability which rested on the tenant is now transferred to the landlord, but with regard to the 10 per cent. can it be said to be transferred at all? As a payment of money, and as a liability to pay money, it has really disappeared. An equivalent appears in the form of a responsibility for collection, and a risk of bad debts on the part of the landlord, and that is measured as being the equivalent of 10 per cent. of the rate, but it seems to me that these services thus rendered by the landlord cannot, in any proper sense, be said to have been transferred from the tenant. For this reason I am of opinion that on the construction of section 2 (3) the result is the same. It follows that the increase of rent exigible is 2s. 7½d. per week as the defendant contends, and not 2s. 11d. per week as the plaintiffs contend. This was the conclusion arrived at by the learned County Court Judge. In my opinion his conclusion was correct, and this appeal ought to be dismissed.

Leave to appeal was granted.

FLATHER v. HOOD.*

Agricultural Holdings—Notice to quit—Statutory provision for 12 months' notice—Whether applicable to notice by tenant—Agricultural Holdings Act, 1923 (13 and 14 Geo. V., c. 9), s. 25 (1).

By s. 25 (1) of the Agricultural Holdings Act, 1923, "Notwithstanding any provision in a contract of tenancy to the contrary, a notice to quit a holding shall be invalid if it purports to terminate the tenancy before the expiration of 12 months from the end of the then current year of tenancy. . . ."

Held, that this provision applies to a notice to quit given by a tenant, as well as to a notice to quit given by a landlord.

This action was brought by Mr. Oswald Vivian Flather, a tomato grower, of 42, Clarendon-road, Lewisham, S.E., against Mr. Amos Hood, a nurseryman, of the Park Nurseries, Welling, Kent. The plaintiff claimed possession of part of the Park Nurseries, consisting of about an acre of land, three greenhouses, and a packing shed, of which, according to the plaintiff, the defendant was a tenant at will at a rent of £100 a year in virtue of an oral letting by the plaintiff to the defendant on or about December 23, 1927. Mr. Flather said that he gave immediate notice of determination of the tenancy to the defendant by letters dated February 6 and March 19, 1928. He further claimed £25 4s. 1d., rent at the rate of £100 a year from December 25, 1927, until March 26, 1928, and mesne profits thereafter until judgment. The defendant also gave the plaintiff three months' notice to determine the tenancy.

The first question was whether the defendant was tenant at will of the plaintiff; the second was whether the three months' notice given by the tenant (the defendant) was a valid notice in view of the provisions of section 25 of the Agricultural Holdings Act, 1923.

Section 25 (1) provides:—

"Notwithstanding any provision in a contract of tenancy to the contrary, a notice to quit a holding shall be invalid if it purports to terminate the tenancy before the expiration of 12 months from the end of the then current year of tenancy. . . ."

Mr. Picciotto appeared for the plaintiff; Mr. J. B. Melville, K.C., and Mr. S. Seuffert for the defendant.

His LORDSHIP held that the defendant was a tenant at a rental of £100 a year reserving his rights of compensation. On the second point, he decided that section 25 of the Act applied to both the landlord and the tenant, and that any notice of less than a year was invalid in view of the actual wording of the section. He said that he could not accept Mr. Picciotto's submission that the section applied only to a notice given by the landlord to the tenant. He gave judgment for the defendant with costs.

VERNER-JEFFREYS v. PINTO.*

Moneylenders — Agent or canvasser — Prohibition against acting as such—Illegality of transaction—Employment by moneylender—Whether necessary to be proved — Moneylenders Act, 1927 (17 and 18 Geo. V., c. 21), s. 5 (3) (6).

By s. 5 (3) of the Moneylenders Act, 1927, "No moneylender or any person on his behalf shall employ any agent or canvasser for the purpose of inviting any person to borrow money or to enter into any transaction involving the borrowing of money from a moneylender, and no person shall act as such agent or canvasser, or demand or receive directly or indirectly any sum or other valuable consideration by way of commission or otherwise for introducing or undertaking to introduce to a moneylender any person desiring to borrow money."

By s. 5 (6), "Where it is shown that a moneylending transaction was brought about by a contravention of any of the provisions of this section, the transaction shall, notwithstanding that the moneylender was duly licensed under this Act, be illegal, unless the moneylender proves that the contravention occurred without his consent or connivance."

Held, that the above provisions apply not merely where the person said to be an agent or canvasser is employed as such by the moneylender, but are intended to prevent any transaction brought about by touting, provided that the moneylender consents to or connives at the touting; and to prove the illegality of the transaction it is not necessary to show that the moneylender gave any authority to the tout.

This was an action in which the plaintiff, Mrs. Dorothy May Verner-Jeffreys, claimed a declaration that the moneylending transaction between her and the defendant, Mr. Joseph Pinto, a moneylender, of 4A, King-street, Hammersmith, W., in a bill of sale dated January 10, 1928, signed by the plaintiff, was illegal, and that the bill of sale was void. She also claimed an injunction to restrain the defendant from enforcing the bill of sale until after the hearing of the action. Alternatively, she said that the interest charged was excessive and that the transaction was harsh and unconscionable, and she asked for a declaration as to what, in the circumstances, was a fair rate of interest.

The plaintiff was the widow of a naval commander who was killed in action in 1915, and had some means under a settlement, but in 1927 she was in need of money and wrote to Clive Everton, Limited, registered moneylenders, of 24, New Bond-street, London, for a loan. The manager of that company, Mr. Harwood, was sent down to Devonshire, where the plaintiff resided, and took an inventory of her furniture. On December 23, 1927, she signed a promissory note for £400 and received £210. She subsequently required a further loan, and was asked by Clive Everton, Limited, to come up to London and see them. She called on January 9, 1928, and Mr. Harwood told her that he had a friend who would advance the money—namely, the defendant, Mr. Joseph Pinto.

On January 10, 1928, she went with the solicitor recommended to her by Clive Everton, Limited, to see the defendant, and signed a bill of sale containing an inventory of her furniture and goods, and the defendant handed her £500 in notes. She was then taken back to the office of the company and paid off the promissory note for £400 in favour of Clive Everton, Limited. For that purpose the plaintiff handed Mr. Harwood £479 of the £500, and he handed her back £115 or £119, allowing £40 as a rebate. Twenty-one pounds was paid to the solicitor for his costs. Clive Everton, Limited, claimed that they allowed a rebate of £100 and not £40.

The plaintiff pleaded that the transaction with the defendant was a moneylending transaction and contrary to section 5 (3) of the Moneylenders Act, 1927, because, she said, Mr. Harwood, or the company, Clive Everton, Limited, acted as an agent or canvasser in the transaction either for the defendant or with his knowledge and consent.

Section 5 (3) of the Moneylenders Act, 1927, states:—

"No moneylender or any person on his behalf shall employ any agent or canvasser for the purpose of inviting any person to borrow money or to enter into any transaction involving the borrowing of money from a moneylender, and no person shall act as such agent or canvasser, or demand or receive directly or indirectly any sum or other valuable consideration by way of commission or otherwise for introducing or undertaking to introduce to a moneylender any person desiring to borrow money."

The plaintiff said that at the interview which she had on January 9, 1928, with Clive Everton, Limited, Mr. Harwood got her to sign a letter requesting Mr. Harwood to obtain a loan of £500 for her. The letter was addressed to Clive Everton, Limited, and was as follows:—

"Will you kindly introduce me to some person or firm of moneylenders so that I may obtain an advance to enable me to pay you off the money I owe you, as I understand you are not prepared to let the same stand over ? "

* Reported by G. P. LANGWORTHY, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Mr. Frank G. Enness appeared for the plaintiff ; Mr. Edward Clayton, K.C., Mr. H. J. Wallington, and Mr. C. E. Rochford for the defendant.

The plaintiff was called in support of the contention that Clive Everton, Limited, acted as agents for the defendant. She stated that she came away from Clive Everton, Limited, on January 10, 1928, with £119, and not, as alleged, with £179.

Mr. Harwood gave evidence on behalf of the defendant, and said that £300 was taken in discharge of the plaintiff's debt to his company.

MR. JUSTICE CLAUSON.—Did you know that that was at the rate of 550 per cent. per annum on the £210 which your company had lent her for about a month? Is that the usual rate of interest to be charged to a woman who is fairly well off ?

Mr. Harwood.—It was the usual rate.

MR. JUSTICE CLAUSON.—Do you mean to say 550 per cent. is a usual rate?

Mr. Harwood.—Yes.

In answer to counsel, the witness said that his company received no commission from Mr. Pinto.

The witness went on to say that he never told the defendant that out of the loan by the defendant to the plaintiff his company were going to be paid off the amount due on the promissory note given to them by the plaintiff. He never acted as agent or canvasser for the defendant in the transaction of the £500 lent by the defendant.

Mr. Joseph Pinto then gave evidence, and said that he had heard absolutely nothing from Mr. Harwood about the plaintiff requiring a loan from him before a telephone message of January 9, 1928. He told Mr. Harwood that the interest would be 48 per cent., payable by monthly instalments of £40. Neither Mr. Harwood nor Clive Everton, Limited, acted as his agents or canvassers. He was quite unaware that the plaintiff was going to pay off the amount due to Clive Everton, Limited, out of the £500 which he lent her.

Counsel then addressed the Court.

MR. JUSTICE CLAUSON, in giving judgment, stated the facts, and said that two points had been taken—first, that the transaction was illegal under section 5 (6) of the Act of 1927 by reason of the fact that there had been a contravention of subsection 3 of that section. If the construction which he put on section 5 (3) was accurate, it would operate very seriously for moneylenders, but his decision, if wrong, could be taken to a higher authority. He was not prepared to hold on the evidence that the arrangements on January 9, 1928, had been plotted for and planned previously between the defendant and Mr. Harwood.

It had been contended by the defendant that subsection 3 was applicable only when the person who was said to be an agent or canvasser was employed as such by the moneylender, but he did not so read it. There was no dispute that the plaintiff was invited by Mr. Harwood to borrow money from the defendant, and it was clear that Mr. Harwood acted as canvasser for the purpose of inviting the plaintiff to borrow money from the defendant, who was a moneylender, and in so doing he was acting in contravention of subsection 3. On that construction of the subsection the whole transaction was illegal, and the plaintiff was entitled to a declaration that it was illegal and that the bill of sale was void. That construction might not be held to be correct, but he thought the Legislature appreciated the terrible result of touting and intended to interfere to prevent any transaction brought about by touting, provided that the moneylender consented to or connived at the touting. It was not necessary to show that he gave authority to the tout.

On the second point, as to the plea that the interest was excessive and the transaction harsh and unconscionable, the interest was 48 per cent. for the loan of the £500. He was directed by section 10 of the Moneylenders Act, 1927, that he was to presume that interest was excessive if the rate charged was over 48 per cent. If, therefore, without any security, interest of 48¼ per cent. would make a transaction harsh and unconscionable, he had no hesitation in saying that 48 per cent. interest charged on a loan for which there was quite a substantial security was grossly excessive, and he was entitled to hold that such a rate of interest made the present transaction harsh and unconscionable. The transaction could, therefore, be reopened, and if he was wrong on the first point he would allow the defendant interest at the rate of 15 per cent. In his opinion, however, the plaintiff was entitled to succeed on the first point.

Vendor and Purchaser—Contract for sale of land—Memorandum in writing—Auctioneer's signature—Law of Property Act, 1925 (15 Geo. V., c. 20), s. 40.

At an auction a freehold house was knocked down to the defendant as the highest bidder, but he afterwards refused to sign the contract because one of the conditions of sale required the purchaser to pay certain road-making charges. On the same day the auctioneer, as soon as he was informed of the defendant's refusal, signed the contract as the defendant's agent.

Held, that since in the circumstances the auctioneer's signature could fairly be said to be part of the transaction of sale there was a memorandum in writing sufficient to satisfy s. 40 of the Law of Property Act, 1925.

His LORDSHIP delivered a reserved judgment in this action in favour of the plaintiff, Mr. Chaney, who claimed, as the vendor, specific performance of a contract to purchase a freehold house at Southend-on-Sea. The case raised an important question as to the extent and duration of an auctioneer's authority to sign a memorandum of the contract as agent for the purchaser, who had refused to sign it.

On the plaintiff's instructions a freehold house, known as Tiverton, Durham-road, Southchurch, Southend, was put up for sale at the London Auction Mart on April 29, 1927, by Mr. J. E. Ewin, carrying on business as Brown and Ewin, of 218, East India Dock-road.

According to the evidence given on behalf of the plaintiff, the house, lot 3 at the auction, was knocked down to the defendant as the highest bidder at £650.

* Reported by H. LANGFORD LEWIS, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The defendant admitted that he had bid for the house, but denied that he bid beyond £500 or £510, owing to his having read during the bidding a condition of sale requiring the purchaser to pay road charges amounting to £56.

The second defence was that there was no memorandum in writing to satisfy section 40 of the Law of Property Act, 1925, which replaced section 4 of the Statute of Frauds, on the ground that in the circumstances of the case the auctioneer had no authority to sign the memorandum.

Mr. Vaisey, K.C., and Mr. G. P. Slade appeared for the plaintiff; Mr. C. A. Bennett, K.C., and Mr. W. A. Jolly for the defendant.

MR. JUSTICE MAUGHAM, in the course of his judgment, said that there was a marked conflict of fact between the evidence of the half-a-dozen witnesses called for the plaintiff and that of the defendant himself. Mr. Ewin was an experienced auctioneer, and the defendant a well-known bidder at the Auction Mart. Mr. Ewin was told by his chief clerk, Mr. Herbert Doughty, that the defendant was the highest bidder at £650, and Mr. Ewin at once wrote his name down in the particulars. He (his Lordship) had no doubt that the story of the defendant that he had stopped bidding at £510 was quite untrue, and that he deliberately bid £650 for the property and had it knocked down to him.

The defendant, knowing that the property had been knocked down to him, did not state at the time that there had been a mistake and that he never made the final bid, and did not wait to see the auctioneer. In those circumstances Mr. Ewin left the Auction Mart and got back to his office about an hour later. He was then told that the defendant refused to sign the contract because of the road-making charges, and that he had not come to the office. Without further delay Mr. Ewin signed the memorandum—which had already been filled up by his clerk—as agent for the defendant on the footing that the defendant would probably come and pay his deposit in due course. It, therefore, contained a recital that the defendant had paid a deposit of £65, and stated that he agreed to pay the balance of the purchase money and complete the contract.

There remained only the defence that Mr. Ewin had no authority to sign the memorandum at his office between 4.30 and 5 p.m. on the day of the sale. It had long been settled that an auctioneer was the agent of both vendor and purchaser to sign the contract or a memorandum sufficient to satisfy the statute: Emmerson v. Heelis (2 Taunt., 38); White v. Proctor (4 Taunt., 209); Sims v. Landray ([1894] 2 Ch., 318). The authority, however, must be exercised at the time of the sale and could not be exercised a few days later (Mews v. Carr, 1 H. and N., 484); nor did it extend to the auctioneer's clerk (Bell v. Balls (13 The Times L.R., 274; [1897] 1 Ch., 663)). It could not be revoked by the vendor or the purchaser after the fall of the hammer: Bell v. Balls (supra). The principle could not be better stated than it was by Mr. Justice Stirling in Bell v. Balls (supra, at p. 671), where he said:—

"The authority which the purchaser confers upon the auctioneer is to write down the bidding—that is, to make a minute or record of it at the time and as part of the transaction, and such a record is held a memorandum sufficient to satisfy the statute. I do not see that the nature of the proceeding justifies the implication of an authority to make a memorandum, except at a time when the writing down can fairly be held to be a part of the sale. If the auctioneer were allowed to record the bidding at a later time evils might arise similar to those which the Statute of Frauds was intended to prevent."

Mr. Justice Stirling there came to the conclusion that a memorandum signed a week after the day of sale was signed after the auctioneer's authority had ceased.

Here the defendant had not repudiated his bid in the sale-room. If he had, Mr. Ewin could not safely have postponed signing the memorandum. He had simply raised a protest of no moment based on a special condition which he ought to have read before making his bid. Mr. Ewin was justified in the view which he took that such a protest would not be insisted on and that the defendant would probably come to his office, pay the deposit, and sign the contract on the day of the sale.

Accordingly, he (his Lordship) held that Mr. Ewin, on receiving the information that the defendant had not paid his deposit and was refusing to sign the contract, was entitled to sign the memorandum as his agent. His signature could fairly be held to be part of the transaction of sale. In the result there was a memorandum sufficient to satisfy section 40 of the Law of Property Act, 1925, duly signed by an agent for the defendant, and the plaintiff was entitled to the usual order for specific performance and the costs of the action.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL v. NATIONAL PROVINCIAL BANK LIMITED.*

Revenue — Income-tax — Profits or gains—Receipt on behalf of beneficiary by another person—Obligation on receiver to deliver statement—Income Tax Act, 1918 (8 and 9 Geo. V., c. 40), ss. 103, 107.

HIS LORDSHIP gave judgment for the Crown in this special case stated by consent pursuant to Order XXXIV., rule 1, and Order LXVIII., rule 2, of the Rules of the Supreme Court. The question raised was whether a bank, on being required by the Commissioners of Inland Revenue, under section 103 of the Income Tax Act, 1918, to deliver lists of the persons beneficially entitled to stocks registered in the name of the bank or its nominees, either as trustees, by way of security, or at the mere request of the owner, was bound to do so.

The proceedings were begun on June 1, 1928, by a writ of subpœna whereby the informant claimed penalties under section 107 of the Income Tax Act, 1918, for the neglect and refusal of the defendants to prepare and deliver lists in the prescribed form as required by section 103 of that Act, and the parties concurred in stating in a special case the questions of law which arose.

Section 103 (1) of the Income Tax Act, 1918, provides:—

"Every person who, in whatever capacity, is in receipt of any money or value, or of profits or gains arising from any of the sources mentioned in this Act, of or belonging to any other person who is chargeable in respect thereof, or who would be so chargeable if he were resident in the United Kingdom and not an incapacitated person, shall, whenever required to do so by any general or particular notice, prepare and deliver, within the period mentioned in such notice, a list in the prescribed form, signed by him, containing—(a) a true and correct statement of all such money, value, profits or gains; (b) the name and address of every person to whom the same shall belong; (c) a declaration whether every such person is of full age, or a married woman living with her husband, or a married woman whose husband is not accountable for the payment of any tax charged on her, or is resident in the United Kingdom or is an incapacitated person."

The following stocks—5 per cent. War Loan, 1929-47, inscribed or registered; 5 per cent. and 4 per cent. National War Bonds, registered; 4 per cent. War Loan, 1929-42, inscribed or registered—belonging to customers of, or others having business relations with, the defendants, or held in trust by them, were frequently registered or inscribed in the name of the defendants, or of one or other of certain subsidiary companies as their nominees, in the following circumstances:—

(a) When the defendants were acting as trustees or executors under the trusts created by some will or settlement, and the dividends when received by the defendants were duly paid to the beneficiaries. (b) When the stock was taken by the defendants as security for a loan or overdraft; in that case the dividends when received were placed to the credit of the customer from whom the security was taken. (c) When the stock was taken by the defendants as security not for the owner's personal account but for the account of some other person; in such case the dividends when received by the defendants were accounted for by the defendants to the owner of the stock in the manner agreed on, including the placing thereof to a realized security account to await liquidation of the principal debtor's estate. (d) When the stock was merely registered or inscribed at the request of the owner in the name of one of the aforesaid nominees; in that case the dividends were received by the defendants and placed to the credit of the customer's account or otherwise dealt with on his instructions.

The Commissioners of Inland Revenue, purporting to act under section 103 of the Income Tax Act, 1918, required the defendants by particular notices to prepare and deliver within the prescribed time lists in the prescribed form containing true and correct statements of the names and addresses of all persons on whose behalf they received interest on the aforesaid stocks registered or inscribed in the name of the defendants or the aforesaid nominees, under the above four heads (a) to (d) respectively, in all cases where the value of the 5 per cent. War Loan or Bonds was £500 or more and the value of the 4 per cent. War Loan or Bonds was £1,000 or more.

The defendants, contending that the Commissioners of Inland Revenue were not entitled to demand such lists under section 103, and that they were not bound to furnish the information required, refused to comply with the demands. The Attorney-General agreed to waive any penalty, and the questions for the Court were whether the defendants were bound to prepare and deliver any and which of the four lists demanded.

The Attorney-General (Sir Thomas Inskip, K.C.) and Mr. R. P. Hills appeared for the informant; Mr. A. M. Latter, K.C., and Mr. Raymond W. Needham, K.C., for the defendants.

The Attorney-General said that he understood that the bank did not dispute liability to deliver a list under case (a). Case (d) would probably follow the result in (a), (b), and (c). On the face of it, the section appeared in very clear terms to require every person, whenever required to do so, to prepare and deliver a list.

Presumably, the reason of this friendly proceeding—the Attorney-General having agreed to waive penalties—was that the bank might have a clear direction which would protect them in dealing with their customers, and not because of any real difficulty in construing section 103. Nothing turned on the fact that in case (d) the registered owner was a nominee, instead of the bank. It was presumably intended to cover the case of a person going abroad for a lengthy period and not wishing to give a power of attorney.

Mr. Latter said that the last thing that the bank desired to do was to fail in its duty, or obstruct the revenue authorities in any way, but it desired to be protected by the decision of the Court before disclosing any of its clients' affairs.

Case (a) was drawn a little too widely. If the bank held "as executor" it was not clear to whom the stock would belong until debts were paid and it had assented to the legacies or ascertained the residue. Then it was holding as trustee. He admitted that the bank must then prepare and deliver the list. If it made the lists under cases (b) and (c) it would not get the exemption from assessment given to persons in a fiduciary capacity, for the relation was simply that of banker and customer—i.e., of creditor and debtor. Case (d), he submitted, was more like (b) and (c) than (a).

With regard to the 4 per cent. "tax compounded" securities, there was no "other person chargeable," and the revenue authorities were not entitled to lists of that stock.

Mr. Justice Rowlatt, in giving judgment, said that he could not see the answer to the Crown's claim. As to trustees and executors, the case was quite clear, except that, as every one conceded, it did not apply to executors in the course of administration. The fourth case was, in principle, exactly the same.

In the second and third cases, the bank was a pledgee of the stock, which was registered in its name as security. The bank was the registered proprietor, but, subject to its right to use that registration for its protection, the stock still belonged to the pledgor. Mr. Latter had contended that the bank did not receive the interest within the meaning of section 103, because it was going to be carried to the credit of the pledgor, which would make the bank a debtor for it. But the Attorney-General's answer was correct—that that happened afterwards. The bank received the interest as mortgagee on behalf of the person who was entitled to it. It was exactly the case the statute aimed at. His judgment must be for the Crown in all the four cases.

VISCOUNT BURNHAM v. ATLANTIC AND PACIFIC FIBRE IMPORTING AND MANUFACTURING COMPANY, LIMITED.*

Limitations (Statute of)—Written acknowledgment of debt—Debentures of company—Statement in company's accounts—Whether a sufficient acknowledgment—Civil Procedure Act, 1833 (3 and 4 Wm. IV., c. 42), ss. 3, 5.

A limited company at various dates between 1890 and 1902 issued debentures payable within two years but paid no part of the principal or interest. The company's published accounts habitually referred to the debenture debt as outstanding, and in 1925 the accounts, which were signed by two directors and the secretary, stated the amount of the arrears of interest.

Held, that the statement in the accounts was a written acknowledgment within s. 5 of the Civil Procedure Act, 1833, and therefore an action to recover the principal and interest was not barred by the 20 years limitation fixed by s. 3 of that Act.

His LORDSHIP gave judgment in favour of the plaintiff, Viscount Burnham, in this action, which he brought on behalf of himself and all other debenture-holders claiming an account of what was due by the company in respect of principal and interest.

It was admitted by the defendant company that no part of the principal or interest, which was payable at the rate of 10 per cent., had ever been paid on any of the debentures.

The Atlantic and Pacific Fibre Importing and Manufacturing Company, Limited, which was incorporated in 1883 to purchase certain freehold land and patent rights, issued at various times during 1890, 1891, 1892, 1893, 1894, 1896, 1900, and 1902 debentures to the amount of £23,925 8s. 6d., one of which, dated November 19, 1890, was issued to the plaintiff, then Mr. Harry Lawson Webster Lawson, to secure the principal sum of £1,110 11s. 8d.

The company pleaded that the moneys alleged to be owing on the debentures, both for principal and interest, had become barred by the Civil Procedure Act, 1833.

The plaintiff contended that an acknowledgment was contained in the yearly balance-sheets issued by the company that part of the liabilities of the company consisted of the amounts due on the debentures, and that that acknowledgment prevented the statute of limitations from running.

The debentures, being under seal, created a specialty contract debt which was barred after 20 years under section 3 of the Civil Procedure Act, 1833, but that statute also created a statutory acknowledgment by section 5, which, if in writing, would prevent the statute from running.

Each debenture issued became payable two years after the date of its issue. The company now had assets available for the payment of the principal and interest due on the debentures. The arrears of interest up to the year ending December 31, 1925, amounted to £78,340 12s. 4d. Most of the debenture-holders were also shareholders in the defendant company.

Mr. C. L. Fawell appeared for the plaintiff; and Mr. A. P. Vanneck for the defendant company.

MR. JUSTICE CLAUSON, in giving judgment, said that the question was whether certain debentures issued upwards of 20 years ago were barred by the Civil Procedure Act, 1833. The principal money secured on each debenture became due upwards of 20 years ago. Was the right to sue on the debentures barred by section 3 of the statute? The only point was whether there had been a sufficient acknowledgment in writing of the sum due on the debentures and of the interest within the meaning of section 5 of that Act so as to enable the debenture-holders to recover.

The company, over a long series of years, had habitually referred in their yearly published accounts to the debenture debt as outstanding, and of recent years to the arrears of interest. In 1925 the accounts, which showed the amount of arrears of interest to be £78,340 12s. 4d., were signed by two directors and the secretary, the obviously authorized agents of the company. Could it be said that that statement was an acknowledgment made in writing signed by the agents of the party liable for principal and interest being due on the specialty—namely, the debentures, the nominal amount of which was £23,925? It was clear that the statement was such an acknowledgment. It was not made to the debenture-holders, but that was not made necessary by the Act of 1833.

The result was that the defence to the action failed and there would be a declaration that the claim of the plaintiff and the other holders of debentures for principal and interest against the defendant company had not been barred by any statute of limitations.

Court of Appeal. (Scrutton, Lawrence, and Greer, L.JJ.) 1928. July 5.

ST. ANNE'S WELL BREWERY COMPANY v. ROBERTS AND OTHERS.*

Negligence — Duty to adjoining owner—Ancient wall.

The defendants were the owners, but not the occupiers, of a part of the ancient city wall of Exeter, which also formed the back wall of an ancient inn owned by the plaintiffs. The portion of the wall belonging to the defendants collapsed, demolishing the plaintiffs' inn. In an action for damages the Judge held that, though the ancient wall was not a thing essentially dangerous within Rylands v. Fletcher (L.R., 3 H.L., 330), yet on the principle of Todd v. Flight (9 C.B., N.S., 377), the defendants, being owners, though not occupiers, were under a duty to prevent the wall from causing damage to adjoining property. He therefore gave judgment for the plaintiffs.

Held, (1) that the doctrine of Rylands v. Fletcher (supra) had never been applied to affect the liability of an owner who was out of possession at the time when the injury took place; though the defendants did not erect the wall, they took it over when they bought the property as the boundary and retaining wall for their property and they were only using that property in the ordinary ways in which property is used, so that they were outside the authority of that case; (2) that there was no reason to suppose that when they let the property to their tenant it was in a ruinous condition or that in the exercise of a reasonable diligence they should have ascertained that it was in a ruinous or dangerous condition. In these circumstances the plaintiffs failed to bring their case within the principles of the decision in Todd v. Flight (supra).

Decision of Acton, J. (44 The Times L.R., 479), reversed.

This was an appeal by the defendants from the decision of Mr. Justice Acton (44 The Times L.R., 479) in an action for damage caused to an ancient inn by the fall of a portion of the ancient city wall of Exeter.

The facts appear fully from the judgments.

Mr. Justice Acton held (1) that the ancient wall was not a thing essentially dangerous within Rylands v. Fletcher (L.R., 3 H.L., 330), but (2) that there was a duty on the defendants to keep it in such a state that their neighbours might not be injured by its fall; (3) that the plaintiffs had not been guilty of contributory negligence in failing to discover the dangerous state of the wall; (4) that the action was maintainable against the owners and not merely against the occupier of the wall.

The defendants appealed.

Mr. du Parcq, K.C., and Mr. J. L. Pratt appeared for the appellants; Mr. Holman Gregory, K.C., and Mr. G. D. Roberts for the respondents.

Lord Justice Scrutton.—This appeal raises some curious and interesting questions, and I have listened with great care to the arguments addressed to us, particularly, if he will allow me to say so, to the able and ingenious argument of Mr. Roberts. But I have come to the conclusion that the decision of Mr. Justice Acton cannot be supported. As one of the counsel has said, the first thing is to get the facts right; and the trouble in this case is that it is quite impossible to get some of the facts right, because nobody knows what the facts are. The matter complained of by the plaintiffs, who are the owners of an ancient inn situate in the ancient city of Exeter, is that a large portion of the city wall of Exeter fell into their premises and did a great deal of damage, and they therefore claimed compensation for that damage against two trustees and a tenant for life of the property which is said to comprise that portion of the ancient city wall. The city wall has surrounded the city of Exeter more or less continuously for centuries. It is a very substantial structure, at any rate in this part of the city. It is six feet thick, and it is some 30 to 40 feet high; and in this part of the city it appears to have been built on the side of a hill. Against it—I am not certain whether I am using a correct term, for a reason that I will state in a moment—there appears to have been built many years ago an ancient inn, known as the Custom House Inn, which has now been destroyed. On the top floors of that inn there was daylight between the wall and the structure of the inn. On the lower floor of the inn it is very difficult to know what the position was. It rather looks as if in portions the city wall was the back wall of the inn. It may be that in some places a thin brick wall had been built against the city wall. But inasmuch as when the inn and the wall were standing you could not see what the relations of the inn to the wall were, without boring holes in the inn to find out where the wall was, and, now that the wall has fallen, the wall and inn are buried under one huge mass of masonry, it is difficult to be sure whether the city wall was the back wall of the inn or whether there was a wall of the inn next to the city wall. And nobody knows where the brickwork of the wall began in relation to the floor of the inn. Whether it began on the level of the ground floor, whether it went down lower than the ground floor, whether it began higher up the hill than the ground floor, will, I imagine, never be known as to that particular portion of the wall. About 30 feet in length of the wall fell. Apparently the evidence is that it began dropping down, that it sagged, and then fell out. Why did it fall? There was very considerable controversy at the trial as to whether the wall was a wall with buttresses, or whether there had been on the part of those who built the inn or inhabited the inn, at some time or other, excavation into the wall; for on each side of the fireplace in the kitchen on the ground floor there were two cupboard recesses going back some 6 or 7 feet, and the case made for the defendants was that whoever built them had dug into the wall and made two large recesses in the wall. On behalf of the plaintiffs it was said: "No, you are wrong in that: the fireplace is on a buttress, the sides of the cupboards furthest from the fireplace on each side are also buttresses, and that explains the two cupboards." At the trial the learned Judge, having heard the evidence and looked at the plans, some imaginative and some taken from measurement, came to the conclusion that the cupboards or recesses were excavated out of the wall. Speaking for myself, having looked at the evidence, and in particular having looked at the plan prepared in February from actual measurement, I have come to the conclusion that at some time or other excavations were made into the wall to make recesses, which went some considerable way into the wall. Under those circumstances, the defendants say: "You have only yourselves to thank for it. You have been weakening our wall by digging into it, and when it ultimately tumbles down because you weakened it by digging into it, you must not come to us and complain that it has tumbled down. You must thank yourselves for this tumbling down; you should not have dug into it." The learned Judge takes the view, as I understand him—and I see no reason to differ from his conclusion—that the fall of the wall was due partly to its being weakened by these recesses, partly to the continual percolation of the ordinary fall of the rain through the soil down the wall to the bottom of the wall, possibly washing away foundations or soil from around the foundation of the wall. And he takes the view that the fall of the wall, which has stood for centuries, is due to those two things: that the plaintiffs themselves have weakened the wall by digging round it, and that the natural operation of water falling from the skies on a wall which has stood as it has for centuries without any particular means of drainage has ultimately caused this fall. And one other fact has to be appreciated—namely, that nobody could see what was going on at the base of this wall; on the side furthest from the inn you could not find out without digging down for 20 or 30 feet into the soil. On the other side, in order to find out what was happening you would have had to break through the line of brick which was in the cupboards, possibly to bore the wall to find out how thick it was, possibly to dig in order to find out exactly where its foundations were. And therefore, if there was anything wrong, it was about as latent a defect as you could expect any defect to be. Now that I take to be the sort of facts we have to investigate, and on those facts the plaintiffs say to the defendants: "Never mind for the moment what your legal relations are with anybody to whom you have let the land. You are owners of land. On it you have erected an artificial structure. You have not kept that artificial structure on your own land. You have not stopped it from falling on to our land ; and we say, therefore, under the well-known doctrine of Rylands v. Fletcher (L.R., 3 H.L., 330), that having put bricks on your land you have not kept them on your own land, and you are absolutely liable whether you were negligent or not." Now it strikes me that there are two reasons why Rylands v. Fletcher (supra) does not apply, and the learned Judge has found that it does not apply in this case. In the first place, as I understand the doctrine of Rylands v. Fletcher (supra) it relates to occupiers. I do not know, and neither counsel for the respondents could refer me to any case where the doctrine of Rylands v. Fletcher (supra) has been applied to an owner not in occupation. If there are such cases, though each counsel has been invited to supply me with them, none has been supplied to me. The doctrine of Rylands v. Fletcher (supra), as I understand it—I take it from a well-known text-book (Law of Torts, by Salmond, 6th ed., at page 257), which appears to me to be accurate—is this : "The occupier of land who brings or keeps upon it anything likely to do damage if it escapes is bound at his peril to prevent its escape, and is liable for all the natural and probable consequences of its escape, even if he has been guilty of no negligence." While stated in that way, it is an absolute liability ; there are so many exceptions to it that it is doubtful whether there is much of the rule left. And I do not propose in this judgment—I do not think it is necessary—to try and state what there is left of the rule when you have taken out all the exceptions. The first point that I have mentioned will, of course, be relevant when we come to see what the exact position of the defendants is : whether they are owners or occupiers. But there is another matter which seems to me of great importance. It has been frequently said that the doctrine of Rylands v. Fletcher (supra) does not apply to what may be called the normal use of land. I will not put it in my own words. I will put it in the words of Lord Cairns, L.C., in Rylands v. Fletcher (supra), who says at page 338 : "My Lords, the principles on which this case must be determined appear to me to be extremely simple. The defendants, treating them as the owners or occupiers of the close on which the reservoir was constructed, might lawfully have used that close for any purpose for which it might in the ordinary course of the enjoyment of land be used ; and if, in what I may term the natural user of that land, there had been any accumulation of water, either on the surface or underground, and if, by the operation of the laws of nature, that accumulation of water had passed off into the close occupied by the plaintiff, the plaintiff could not have complained that that result had taken place." Now that passage about the normal use of land is not only Lord Cairns's ; because in a later case of Wilson v. Waddell (2 App. Cas., 95), where Lord Blackburn gave the judgment of the Court, the facts were that the land in its ordinary condition drained in a particular way, and the water went in a particular way. There the occupier of a coalfield excavated all the coal from the land, with the result that the water went in quite a different way on to the land of a different adjoining owner. And the different adjoining owner said : "Your land in its natural state sends its water to A. You have done to the land something which sends the water to me, B. You are liable under the doctrine of Rylands v. Fletcher (supra)." Lord Blackburn says this : "The general rule of law in both countries"—that is, England and Scotland—"is that the owner of one piece of land has a right to use it in the natural course of user, unless in so doing he interferes with some right created either by law or contract ; and as a branch of that law, the owner of the minerals has a right to take away the whole of the minerals in his land, for such is the natural course of user of minerals" ; and then he cites the passage from Lord Cairns to the effect that, if when that is done or if by using the land in the normal way the water in the ordinary course is diverted somewhere else, there is no cause of action by third parties for damage by the receipt of the water, because the owner, the occupier of the land, is only using it in the normal way.

Now, that argument, which has been put forward in this case, is met by counsel for the respondents by saying : "Oh, it is not a normal use of land to have a retaining wall." I am afraid I have not been able to appreciate that. One of the most normal uses of land, it appears to me, is to put buildings on it ; and if you put a building on the land and it falls, either because your adjoining owner has done something to the building to weaken it, or because the natural operations of Nature by the fall of rain weaken its foundations without your knowing it, and you cannot be down at the foundations all the time to see how they are getting on—there is no cause of action in your adjoining owner, who has, first of all, weakened your wall and then complained of its falling. For these reasons, without going into the whole doctrine of Rylands v. Fletcher (supra), I think the attempt to say that this is a case of that class fails. Similar views were expressed by Mr. Justice Branson in the case that has been cited of Ilford Urban District Council v. Beal and Another (41 The Times L.R., 317 ; [1925] 1 K.B., 671), where he held that the erection of a retaining wall on land was a normal use of land, and that its having been built in such a way that damage was afterwards done to underground property, which was not known to exist, did not constitute a case like Rylands v. Fletcher (supra). I agree, and I think this case is on the same lines as the Ilford case (supra).

Then the next line of attack was this : it is said, "Anyhow, this wall falling was a nuisance." I think it was correct to say that it was a nuisance, and not a trespass ; because neither the owners nor the occupier threw this wall into the plaintiffs' property ; it fell into the plaintiffs' property from indirect causes, not by direct action of the owners or occupier of the defendants' land ; and therefore I think it is correct to treat it as nuisance and not as trespass. And it is said : "There being a nuisance, we say that you, the trustees and tenant for life, legal and equitable owners of this land—are liable, because there has been a nuisance on your land which has done us damage." No doubt the first question to decide—which also has a relevance with regard to the point about Rylands v. Fletcher (supra)—is : Who was the occupier of the wall ? In fact, in 1918 the then trustees of the will of a Mr. Wreford, who had made his will in 1893 and died in 1899, let the house and the garden at the top of the wall to one Wilson as a weekly tenant at 4s. 3d. a week. And it is said by the defendants : "When we let him the garden, of course we let him the garden wall ; we did not let him the wall without the garden : and it is impossible to conceive us as remaining in occupation of the wall while he is in occupation of the garden." On the other side, it is said, as I understand, when you let a house and a small garden like this at 4s. 3d. a week, you never think of letting the wall. You never suppose that the weekly tenant is tenant of the wall. It seems a small matter to deal with ; it seems to me that when you let a house and garden you ordinarily let the boundaries of the garden ; though I have no doubt that Wilson during his tenancy would have been rather astonished to hear that he was the tenant of the wall. I should imagine that in law he was the tenant of the wall, and it was included in the premises for which he was paying 4s. 3d. a week. If that is so, then Wilson was the occupier of the premises on which there was a nuisance. I think also it is clear law that the person liable for a nuisance on premises is surely the occupier. And I think also it has been established by authority binding on this Court—I refer to Barker v. Herbert (27 The Times L.R., 488 ; [1911] 2 K.B., 633), which has been followed in other cases in this Court—that the occupier himself is not liable if he did not create the nuisance on the land which he occupies unless, knowing of the nuisance or being in such a position that he ought with reasonable care to have known of the nuisance, he allows it to continue, and perhaps he is not liable even then. I refer to the passages in Lord Justice Fletcher Moulton's judgment in Barker v. Herbert (supra) on pages 642 and 643, and to the passage in Lord Justice Farwell's judgment at page 645 ; and therefore if Wilson had been sued for nuisance, being the occupier of this wall, which was the nuisance, I think the question to be determined in his case would have been: Did you know that there was a nuisance ? Ought you with the exercise of reasonable care to have known there was a nuisance ? And if both these questions were answered in the negative, there would have been no liability on the occupier. But there might in certain cases, it is said, have been, even in that case, a liability on the owner. And that is the ground, as I understand, on which Mr. Justice Acton has given judgment against the trustees and tenant for life. He has referred to, and as I understand followed, the case of Todd v. Flight (9 C.B., N.S., 377), and he has treated it as deciding what I think it does not decide, though I think in doing so he has the authority at least of Mr. Justice Lopes in the case of Nelson v. Liverpool Brewery Company (2 C.P.D., 311), which has been cited to us. Todd v. Flight (supra) was decided on demurrer ; that is to say, if the statements in the declaration were true, did they give a right of action against the defendant ? And cases decided on demurrer in that way are not authorities for what would be the case if there were other statements in the declaration. They are authorities on the question: the statements in the declaration being taken as true, do they give a cause of action ? Now, the statements in the declaration were these : That the defendants owned a building and stack of chimneys, which stack of chimneys were in a dilapidated, decayed, ruinous, insecure, and improper state, and in danger of falling, and the defendant, well knowing the premises—that is, well knowing that the chimneys were in a dilapidated, &c., state—let his building to an occupier, and the Court held that the allegation that the defendant let the house when the chimneys were known by him to be ruinous and in danger of falling, and kept and maintained them in that state, did give a cause of action against the defendant. It seems to me clear that, when that case is looked at, it is no authority for the proposition that if, though the chimneys were in a defective condition, the defendant did not know it and could not by reasonable care have known it, he would then be liable, though not the occupier, to the person subsequently damaged by the fall of the chimneys. And when Mr. Justice Lopes in Nelson's case (supra), to which Mr. Roberts very properly referred us, says that an action will lie against the landlord in case of a misfeasance by the landlord, as, for instance, where he lets premises in a ruinous condition, unless the learned Judge meant, as he probably did, that he must have known of the ruinous condition, that passage misrepresents, I think, what was decided in Todd v. Flight (supra). And it appears to me that you are not able successfully to attack an owner no longer in occupation, because he has let to an occupier premises on which there is ultimately found to be a nuisance, unless you can show that at the time when he let them there was then a nuisance on the premises and that he knew it. Now, in this case, without repeating the statements of fact as to the condition of this wall, it appears to me to be impossible to say that any of the defendants knew, either at the time when they let the premises or at any time afterwards till about a week before the wall fell, that there was anything wrong with the foundations of the wall. The wall had stood for centuries ; and when the city architect saw it about a month before it fell, he said: " The wall is all right ; it will stand for some time "—according to the evidence. And further, there is no evidence that I can see that any of the defendants knew that these excavations had been made in the wall by some person connected with the ownership of the inn. There is no evidence that any of them had ever been in the inn. They would have no right that I know of to enter the inn ; and I do not think it is to be taken as neglect that they have not either dug down the wall to find out what the conditions of the foundations were inside and away from the inn, or insisted on entering the inn to see if they could find out anything by looking at the wall of the kitchen in the inn. Under these circumstances it appears to me that the cardinal thing which would have to be proved to establish any liability against anybody would be knowledge of the defect which ultimately resulted in the fall, or failure to acquire that knowledge because he had failed to use reasonable care to ascertain what he should have ascertained, and the plaintiffs have failed to prove either of these things. Therefore it appears to me you can make no claim against the defendants for nuisance ; and for these reasons, rejecting the claim both on the ground of Rylands v. Fletcher (supra) and on the ground of nuisance, it appears to me that the learned Judge came to a wrong conclusion ; the judgment must be set aside and entered for the defendants with costs.

Lord Justice Lawrence.—I agree. The first question on this appeal is whether at the crucial time this property was being used by the defendants in an abnormal or unnatural manner so as to attract the principle of Rylands v. Fletcher (L.R., 3 H.L., 330), and so as to render any question of their negligence immaterial. Now, Mr. Justice Acton has not definitely decided that question. But, reading his judgment, I think one can say that he inclined to the opinion that the principle of Rylands v. Fletcher (supra) did not apply. I agree with Lord Justice Scrutton that the keeping of this wall by the defendants on their property was not an abnormal or unnatural use of their property in the situation in which that property was found. The wall was no doubt originally built for two purposes, for defence and as a retaining wall. It has long since lost its use for defence, but has still for many centuries existed as a retaining wall supporting the property and the houses which have been built behind it. And I fail to see how the defendants can be charged with having brought upon their property something which is of a dangerous or unusual character. The wall has itself existed for a very long time, has apparently admirably fulfilled its purpose as a retaining wall, and was so fulfilling it down to the time when it collapsed. It seems to me that this case is not one to which the principle of Rylands v. Fletcher (supra) applies.

The second question is whether the defendants have been guilty of any breach of their duty towards their neighbour. That question depends, first of all, to my mind, on whether they were in occupation of this wall when it collapsed. The duty to the neighbour is one which, I think, must fall upon the person in occupation. And in the present case the garden behind the wall was let to Mr. Wilson, a weekly tenant ; and it is suggested that the letting was such that the wall itself was not comprised in it. I think it would require the strongest possible evidence where there was a garden or piece of ground situate as this was, bounded on the south by a wall with nothing but space and air behind that wall for a depth of 40ft., to show that that wall itself, which maintained the garden and the ground and protected it, was not comprised in the letting. It is quite true that the tenant may not have thought that he had acquired a tenancy of the wall right down to the bottom of the ground, but I think that if the matter had been tested in a Court of law that would be the only result of letting the ground as it stood. It is not the question here whether a wall separating two adjoining tenements on the same level passes with one or the other. The question is as to a wall which is essential to the enjoyment of the property which was comprised in the tenancy. And I think it would require very strong evidence to show that the landlords letting the property, as they did, had reserved to themselves the wall which was an essential part of it. I have come to the conclusion myself that the occupier was Wilson, and that as such occupier he would be liable as between himself and the landlords. Mr. Roberts, indeed, argued that the question would depend upon whether the duty of repairing the wall was cast on the tenant or on the landlords. I fail to see that. Any bargain made by the person responsible to his neighbour or to the public that another person should perform that obligation may give rise to rights as between those two contracting parties, but does not, in my judgment, in any way affect the rights of a third party, who is no party or privy to any such contract. The cases to which Mr. Roberts has referred are cases which deal with a liability as between landlord and tenant. The case of Nelson v. Liverpool Brewery Company (2 C.P.D., 311) does contain a dictum, by Mr. Justice Lopes, which carries the case further to this extent : it says that, although the prima facie liability is on the owner and occupier, yet the landlord may also be liable if there is a covenant to repair. Speaking with great respect for the learned Judge, I do not quite follow that reasoning. But in the present case that dictum would not apply, because here it is not suggested that there was a covenant by the landlords to repair. In fact, it is one of those ordinary tenancies in which, as between the parties, neither the landlord nor the tenant has undertaken the obligation to repair ; and therefore the tenant, as between himself and the landlord, is not obliged to repair, nor is the landlord, as between himself and the tenant, obliged to execute repairs. In those circumstances the prima facie liability of the occupier remains as against third parties.

But it would be unsatisfactory to leave the matter there. The case has been argued and fought and decided upon the question whether the defendants themselves have been guilty of negligence and of failing to abate a nuisance upon their property for a reasonable time after it had come, or ought to have come, to their knowledge. That, of course, raises a question of fact ; and, to my mind, I think that the facts on that point are hardly in dispute. I will not repeat them. Lord Justice Scrutton has fully stated them. It seems to me that in this case it would be, I was going to say, monstrous, but certainly it would be a strong thing to hold that these defendants ought to have known that these cupboards or holes had been made either in the wall or underneath the wall, which, obviously from the evidence, have led to the collapse of the wall. It is true that there are other factors which have led to it, but it is nowhere suggested that, apart from the weakness of the wall there, those factors would alone have brought down the wall. It would be wrong, to my mind, to attribute to the defendants any negligence where the wall was in excellent condition so far as they could tell, but had been undermined by the action of the plaintiffs or their predecessors in title unknown to the defendants, and without the slightest hint of anything of that kind having been done. In the circumstances, I think that no negligence ought to be attributed to the defendants, even if they are liable at all, and I think they are not. For those reasons I agree that the appeal succeeds.

Lord Justice Greer.—I agree. This appeal and the action in respect of which the appeal is brought raised certain mixed questions of law and fact which were tried before Mr. Justice Acton at Exeter Assizes and on further consideration in London. We are not differing from the learned Judge in any estimate of the respective value to be attached to the evidence of the witnesses on the one side or the other ; and so far as we are differing from him we are differing from him with regard to the conclusions of fact and with regard to the application of principles of law to the facts which he found.

The claim was a claim which rested upon what is regarded in law as a nuisance. And the first point in my judgment to be determined is whether the defendants when the action was brought were in fact in occupation of the property which caused the damage. Nine years before the damage was caused the defendants' predecessors in title, one of whom is one of the present defendants, had let to a Mr. Wilson a cottage and a garden in the position which has been referred to in my Lord's judgment, and which is detailed in the evidence. And if I look at the photograph, it is quite plain that the major portion of this old wall constituted part of the surface of the tenant's garden, the boundary consisting merely of the parapet of the wall. Now as he was the tenant of the house and garden it seems to me impossible to suppose that he was not the tenant of that portion of the wall which was part of his garden, and it seems to me equally impossible to suppose that he was not the tenant of the part of the wall which was his boundary wall as well as the part which was part of the surface of his garden. If that be so, it follows that the occupier was responsible on the principle of Rylands v. Fletcher (L.R., 3 H.L., 330).

Rylands v. Fletcher (supra) has never been applied to affect the liability of an owner who is out of possession at the time when the injury takes place. But beyond and above that, I think that the cases that have been referred to, especially the judgment of Lord Justice Farwell in West v. Bristol Tramways Company, Limited (24 The Times L.R., 478 ; [1908] 2 K.B., 14, at p. 23), show conclusively that in order to come within the doctrine of Rylands v. Fletcher (supra) it is necessary to show that the user which is complained of is something out of the ordinary, something of an unusual character to which the land has been put. Now, though the defendants did not erect this wall, they certainly took it over when they bought the property, when the property became theirs. They did not take it over as suggested, because it was a piece of antiquity ; they took it over because it was the boundary of their property and a good retaining wall for their property and without it their property could not have continued to exist. It was just as much a retaining wall as if they had built it themselves for that purpose : and therefore it seems to me on the authorities that they were only using their property in one of the ordinary ways in which property is used, and that accordingly they are outside the authority of Rylands v. Fletcher (supra). Then it was said: Assuming they are outside the authority of Rylands v. Fletcher (supra) they are still liable upon the principles laid down in the case of Todd v. Flight (9 C.B., N.S., 377). Now I think it is clearly established by the facts that there is no reason to suppose that when they let the property to Mr. Wilson it was in fact in a ruinous condition, or that they had the slightest notice that it was in a ruinous condition or that in the exercise of reasonable diligence they could have ascertained that it was in a ruinous and dangerous condition ; and if so, then the plaintiffs have failed to bring their case within the principles of the decision in Todd v. Flight (supra) and the cases which have followed that decision. A very large number of cases have been cited here ; but the principles applicable to the facts of this case do not seem to me to be in doubt, and it is not necessary to refer to any further authorities. I agree that the appeal must be allowed.

K.B. Div. (Rowlatt, J.) 1928. June 27.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL v. RUDGE.*

Revenue—Legacy duty—Chattels settled on persons in succession—Ultimate vesting in person with absolute interest—Valuation—Whether duty payable on value at date of testator's death or at date of vesting—Legacy Duty Act, 1796 (36 Geo. III., c. 52), s. 14.

A testator bequeathed chattels to trustees upon trust to allow them, so far as the rules of law and equity would permit, to go and be enjoyed with his mansion house. The testator died in 1846, and after divers intermediate life interests the defendant became, in 1909, tenant in tail male in possession of the mansion house, and in 1924, on attaining the age of 21 years, he became absolutely entitled to the chattels, with power to sell or dispose of them. They had greatly increased in value since 1846. No legacy duty had been payable in respect of them before 1924.

Held, that legacy duty was payable on the value of the chattels in 1924, not on their value in 1846.

This was an information by the Attorney-General, which showed: —

Edward Rudge, late of the Abbey Manor House, Evesham, in the County of Worcester, and of No. 44, Wimpole-street, in the parish of St. Marylebone, in the County of Middlesex, Esquire, deceased (hereinafter referred to as "the testator"), duly made his will, dated April 24, 1843, and thereby appointed his wife, Margaret Rudge, and his friend, Adam Washington, executors thereof, and devised his mansion house, called the Abbey Manor House, aforesaid, and certain hereditaments to the use of his said wife, Margaret Rudge, during her life if she should so long continue his widow, and after her death or second marriage to the use of trustees for the term of 1,000 years from his death upon trusts which had since been satisfied and subject to the said term and the trusts thereof to the use of his eldest son, Edward John Rudge, for his life, and after the death of the said Edward John Rudge to the use of the testator's grandson, Edward Charles Rudge, for his life, and after the death of the said Edward Charles Rudge to the use of the first and every other son of the said Edward Charles Rudge successively according to seniority in tail male with divers remainders over. And the testator by his said will bequeathed all his plate and plated articles wheresoever the same might be at the time of his death, and also all his household furniture, pictures, prints, engravings, drawing books, china, glass and other articles of furniture whatsoever (except linen) which should be in or about the said mansion house called the Abbey Manor House aforesaid at the time of his death, and also his books, prints, and articles of old Japan and Chelsea china which were then in his messuage in Wimpole-street aforesaid unto the said Adam Washington and Peter Nouaille the younger in trust to permit the same to go and be held and enjoyed with the said mansion house called the Abbey Manor House so far as the rules of law or equity would permit by the person who, under or by virtue of the said will, should for the time being at law or in equity be tenant for life or in tail male in possession or in remainder expectant on the said term of 1,000 years of the said mansion house yet so that the same should not for the purpose of transmission vest absolutely in any tenant in tail male under the said will being the child of any person thereby made tenant for life who should not attain his age of 21 years. And the testator directed that as soon as conveniently might be after his death the said Adam Washington and Peter Nouaille the younger or the survivor of them, or the executors or administrators of such survivor should cause an inventory to be taken of the said plate, furniture, pictures, articles, and things thereby bequeathed as aforesaid, and this was duly done.

The testator died on September 3, 1846, and the said will, with a codicil dated May 16, 1846, which did not affect the said will so far as hereinbefore stated, was, on November 18, 1846, duly proved by the said Margaret Rudge and Adam Washington in the Prerogative Court of Canterbury.

* Reported by J. W. Hall, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The said Margaret Rudge died on February 25, 1870. The said Edward John Rudge died on January 29, 1861. The said Edward Charles Rudge died on December 14, 1909. The said Edward Charles Rudge had one son and no more—namely, the defendant. The defendant was born on May 31, 1903, and attained his age of 21 years on May 30, 1924.

Under the said will of the testator, the defendant became, on December 14, 1909, tenant in tail male in possession of the said mansion house called the Abbey Manor House devised by the said will as aforesaid, and became, on May 30, 1924, absolutely entitled to the said plate, furniture, pictures, articles, and things bequeathed by the said will as aforesaid.

Under the provisions of the Legacy Duty Acts, legacy duty at the rate of one per cent. became, on May 30, 1924, payable in respect of the said plate, pictures, articles, and things bequeathed by the said will as aforesaid. The defendant was accountable for the said legacy duty.

On December 1, 1925, the defendant delivered an account for legacy duty in respect of the said plate, pictures, articles, and things bequeathed by the said will as aforesaid.

In the said account the defendant gave the value of the said plate, pictures, articles, and things as the sum of £2,444 5s. The defendant alleged that the said sum of £2,444 5s. was the value of the said plate, pictures, articles, and things as at the death of the testator and was according to valuations made at that time, and contended that the legacy duty which became payable on May 30, 1924, in respect of the said plate, pictures, articles, and things was payable on the value of the said plate, pictures, articles, and things as at the death of the testator. The informant charged that this contention was not well founded, and that under the provisions of the Legacy Duty Acts the said legacy duty was payable on the value of the said plate, pictures, articles, and things as at the time when the defendant became absolutely entitled thereto.

The value of the said plate, pictures, articles, and things bequeathed by the said will as aforesaid as on May 30, 1924, was in excess of the said sum of £2,444 5s.

The Commissioners of Inland Revenue had caused application to be made to the defendant to deliver an account for legacy duty in respect of the said plate, pictures, articles, and things bequeathed by the said will as aforesaid, and in the said account to give the value of the said plate, pictures, articles, and things as on May 30, 1924, and to pay the duty which ought to be paid on such value, but the defendant had refused to deliver such account and to pay such duty.

The informant, on behalf of his Majesty, prayed as follows:—

That it might be declared that, under the provisions of the Legacy Duty Acts, legacy duty at the rate of one per cent. became, on May 30, 1924, payable on the value of the said plate, pictures, articles, and things bequeathed by the said will of the testator as aforesaid as on May 30, 1924, and that the defendant was accountable for the said duty.

That an account might be directed to ascertain the amount due in respect of the legacy duty payable on the footing of the foregoing declaration, together with interest thereon at the rate of £4 per cent. per annum from May 30, 1924, and that the defendant might be ordered to pay the amount of the said duty and interest to the Commissioners of Inland Revenue, the informant waiving such penalties as the defendant might have incurred by reason of the said duty not having been previously paid.

That all necessary and proper inquiries might be made, directions given, and accounts taken for the purposes aforesaid.

The defendant, by his answer, admitted the facts as set out in the information, but contended that legacy duty was payable only on the value of the chattels as at the death of the testator.

By s. 14 of the Legacy Duty Act, 1796: "No duty shall be paid on any articles of plate, furniture, or other things not yielding any income, and given to or for the benefit of or so as that the same be enjoyed by different persons in succession, whilst the same shall be so enjoyed in kind only by any person or persons not having any power of selling or disposing thereof, so as to convert the same into money or other property yielding an income; but if the same shall . . . come to any person or persons having power to sell or dispose thereof, or having an absolute interest therein, then, and in each and every such case the same duty shall be chargeable and paid thereon as if the same had been originally given absolutely and with full power to sell or dispose thereof. . . ."

The Attorney-General (Sir Thomas Inskip, K.C.) and Mr. J. H. Stamp appeared for the Crown; Mr. T. Simpson Pedler for the defendant.

MR. JUSTICE ROWLATT.—I think this case is really quite clear, and it has been very clearly put by Mr. Pedler for the defendant. The words to be construed are these, "the same duty shall be chargeable and paid thereon as if the same"—that is, the gift "had been originally given absolutely and with full power to sell and dispose thereof." This gift was a gift by a will made in 1843, which took effect upon the death in 1846. It vested absolutely with full power to sell and dispose thereof in 1924. At which date are the chattels, being pictures, to be valued? The difference really is in the meaning given to the word "originally." The argument for the defendant, Mr. Rudge, is that "originally" is an adverb of time, so as to make it mean this: as if the absolute gift had been given in 1843. The construction for the Crown makes "originally" an adverb going to the quality of the gift and makes the section read thus: as if the gift which is now taken had been an original gift; that is, as if it had originally come now instead of there being all sorts of events in between. That is the construction of the Crown, and it is a very simple construction. There is another difficulty in the way of the defendant's construction, and that is this; if it is to be taken as a gift in 1843, is the duty the same as would have been paid if the gift was to the person having the immediate enjoyment of it as an absolute gift, or is the duty to be reckoned as if the person now taking it had been alive in 1846 and had taken it then? It must be one or the other, because the rates of duty are different; persons may be in different relationships. I put it to Mr. Pedler, and, after some hesitation, he said: "I think the duty must be calculated as on a gift to the original person who took it then as a gift to him absolutely instead of by way of enjoyment for a time only." I think it is a most extraordinary result, because this gentleman pays, or might pay, on a different relationship from that which he bore to the testator. Now, apart from that, the other inconveniences and injustices are great, as was pointed out, and I will not repeat them, in Attorney-General v. Cavendish (1 Wightwick, 82) by Chief Baron Macdonald, in 1810, which was a very carefully considered case. The Court heard that case on June

1, and then, being doubtful, instead of giving a variety of discordant opinions, they had it re-argued on July 3 : then judgment was considered for three weeks. It was the judgment of the Court, and so it is a judgment of great authority. The Chief Baron goes through all the sections ; he says he has been through all the relevant sections. He must have looked at section 14, and he must have looked at section 12, which is in pari materia ; he examines section 22, which speaks of settled value, and he decided primarily under section 35, which has the same sort of problem involved in it, and he says clearly that the scheme of the Act is to tax at the date when the gift is received and on the value at that date. He lays that down quite clearly, and I really think it is an authority in this case. After all, it is the common sense of the matter. If you are going to tax a man upon a gift to him, tax him upon what he gets, and not upon some notional figure, either for him or against him, to ascertain which in this case would require an antiquarian research into values eighty years ago and more.

I am quite clearly of opinion that the Crown is right in this matter, and that it is entitled to judgment, with costs.

MORE v. WEAVER.*

Defamation — Libel — Privilege — Absolute privilege—Letter to solicitor from client.

Defamatory written statements made to a solicitor by a client for the purpose of obtaining professional advice and assistance are absolutely privileged, at all events where they are relevant to that purpose.

Judgment of Swift, J. (44 The Times L.R., 546), affirmed.

This was an appeal by the plaintiff from the judgment (44 The Times L.R., 546) given in an action for alleged libel, tried before Mr. Justice Swift and a special jury.

The action was brought by Miss Kathleen Frances Mervin More, of Lancaster-street, W., who claimed from the defendant, Miss Flora Gertrude Weaver, damages for alleged libel which, she said, was contained in letters which the defendant sent to her (the defendant's) solicitor.

The defendant denied that the words complained of were defamatory, and pleaded that the letters were privileged.

In 1923 the plaintiff proposed to purchase the business of a private hotel and the defendant agreed to find the necessary money for that purpose, but no terms were arranged between them with regard to security or interest. It was, however, subsequently arranged that the plaintiff should give as security to the defendant a mortgage over the leases of the houses which constituted the hotel. A mortgage was accordingly prepared, but a dispute about the signing of the mortgage then took place between the plaintiff and the defendant. The defendant wrote to her own solicitor the letters which were complained of as being libellous. They were written for the purpose of his advising and assisting her to get proper security for her money and finally to obtain repayment of it.

Mr. Justice Swift held that the communications between the defendant and her solicitor were absolutely privileged, and that no action for defamation would lie in respect of such communications. Even if he were wrong in that view, and these communications were the subject of a qualified privilege only (having been published on a privileged occasion), then there was no evidence of any malice to destroy that privilege. In either event, there was no case to go to the jury, and the action failed. He entered judgment for the defendant with costs. The plaintiff appealed.

The plaintiff appeared in person ; Mr. Rayner Goddard, K.C., and Mr. O'Hagan for the respondent.

Counsel for the respondent were not called on.

Lord Justice Scrutton, in giving judgment, said that the appellant undoubtedly believed that she had a grievance against certain people. In this particular case she had brought an action against another woman for alleged libel. The defendant had lent money to the plaintiff in connexion with the purchase of the business of a private hotel. Differences had arisen between the plaintiff and the defendant with regard to the questions what security should be given for the loan, and also when and in what circumstances the loan should be repaid. During the discussion of these differences the defendant wrote certain letters to her own solicitor. In the course of some proceedings against the plaintiff these letters were made public.

The question arose whether communications from a client to his or her solicitor or from a solicitor to the client were or were not absolutely privileged. There were a few cases where untrue and defamatory communications or statements were, by the law of England, absolutely privileged, so that though they were untrue, defamatory and malicious, the law would not allow any action to be brought in respect of them.

The leading case was the absolute privilege given to a Judge. The same absolute privilege applied to counsel and also to witnesses. The question was whether the privilege went beyond Judges, counsel, and witnesses in Court. It was decided in the House of Lords in Watson v. M'Ewan ([1905] A.C. 480) that the privilege extended to statements made by a witness to a solicitor and his client in preparing the proof for trial. Did it extend to a client consulting his or her solicitor and making statements for the purpose of obtaining advice and discussing the matter at issue ? There had been some difference of opinion on the question whether the privilege in such a case was absolute or qualified, and it was because of that difference of opinion that the Court of Appeal, on an interlocutory appeal, had in the present action restored the statement of claim which had been struck out by the Master and the Judge in Chambers.

The difficulty had arisen because Mr. Justice Darling, in Morgan and Another v. Wallis (33 The Times L.R., 495), expressed the view that the privilege was only qualified and that the question of malice should, therefore, be investigated. On the other hand, there was the high authority of Lord Chancellor Herschell in Browne v. Dunn (6 R., 67, at p. 72), where he said :—

"It seems to me that when communications pass between a solicitor and those whom he reasonably believes will desire to retain him, and to whom he makes a communication in relation to that, and who do retain him, the whole of these communications leading up to the retainer and relevant to it, and having that and nothing else in view, are privileged communications, that the whole occasion is throughout privileged. There is no authority, so far as I know, to the contrary, and it seems to me that to lay down any other doctrine would be very gravely contrary to the public interest."

Lord Bowen, in the same case, said, at page 80:—"I very much doubt whether, when a professional relation is created between a solicitor and client, and communications pass between the solicitor and the client with reference to the prosecution of a third person, or with reference to proceedings being taken against him, the fact that the solicitor is animated by malice in what he says of the third person would render him liable to an action, provided he does not say anything which is outside what is relevant to the communications which he is making as a solicitor to his client."

Lord Bowen was obviously inclined to the view that there was absolute privilege, provided that the communications were relevant.

If, then, statements or communications between solicitor and client were absolutely privileged, was there evidence which could be left to the jury that the communications made in the letters which passed between the defendant and her solicitor in this case were irrelevant to the matter under discussion? It would be idle to ask the jury whether these letters were irrelevant to the matter under discussion. The case was not one of qualified privilege, but of absolute privilege. There was no ground for leaving to the jury the question whether the communications were irrelevant or not, and there was no evidence on which they could hold that they were irrelevant. The appeal would therefore be dismissed, with costs.

Prob., Divorce, and Adm. Div. (Lord Merrivale, P.) } 1928. June 25.

Divorce — Jurisdiction — Parties domiciled in England at time of and after marriage—Desertion of wife by husband—Decree of judicial separation granted to wife—Wife's suit for divorce—Husband's protest to jurisdiction—New domicile alleged—Wife's plea of estoppel.

A wife married in England to an Englishman, domiciled in England, was granted a decree of judicial separation on the ground of her husband's desertion. He afterwards took up his abode in France. Later she filed a petition for the dissolution of her marriage. The husband appeared under protest to the jurisdiction, on the ground that he had acquired a new domicile in France. An order was made by the Registrar for the question of domicile to be tried as a preliminary issue. The wife appealed against the order on the ground that the husband, having deserted his wife, could not be heard to say that he had changed his domicile for the purpose of ousting the jurisdiction in divorce of the English Court.

Held, that jurisdiction in divorce in England depends upon domicile, and that the domicile is that of the husband; that the apparent exception to this rule stated by Lord Gorell in Armytage v. Armytage (14 The Times L.R., 480; [1898] P., 178) and Ogden v. Ogden (24 The Times L.R., 94; [1908] P. 46, at p. 78) cannot be sustained on an examination of the authorities; and that estoppel is a rule of evidence which cannot be invoked as a bar in limine, though such a plea may be considered at the trial of the issue of domicile.

In this case the parties were married in England in May, 1915, the husband having been born and being domiciled in England. In August, 1917, the parties ceased to live together, and in January, 1921, the wife was granted in this Division a decree of judicial separation on the ground of her husband's desertion. Early in 1928, the wife presented a petition for the dissolution of her marriage on the ground of her husband's adultery in 1927 and 1928. The husband appeared to the petition under a protest, and alleged in his answer that since September, 1923, he had acquired a domicile in France. On March 13, 1928, the registrar directed that an issue should be tried as to the domicile of the respondent. From this order the petitioner appealed and in her summons asked that, being out of time, she should be allowed an extension of time for appealing, that the order be disallowed, and alternatively that the issue be heard with the main petition upon oral evidence.

Mr. CLIFFORD MORTIMER, for the petitioner, said that subsequently to the decree of judicial separation the wife presented in 1921 a petition for divorce but that petition was dismissed on the wife's application on terms set out in heads of agreement dated August, 1921, followed by a settlement. One of the terms was that the parties should continue to live separate and apart as decreed by the Court. There was in the husband's answer to the present petition no denial of the charge that he was living in adultery in France. The decree of judicial separation did not absolve the respondent from his duties to his wife, and he could not now be heard to take advantage of his own wrongdoing. The case came within the exception stated by Lord Gorell in Armytage v. Armytage (14 The Times L.R., 480; [1898] P., 178) and Ogden v. Ogden (24 The Times L.R., 94; [1908] P., 46, at p. 78) to the rule that the jurisdiction in divorce follows the domicile of the husband. The basis of this exception, which had more or less dictated the practice of the Court for thirty years, was that a man could not take advantage of his own wrongdoing. He could not be allowed to say to his wife: "Although you are judicially separated from me and I have deserted you, you are still my wife and tied to me, so that you are at my mercy in regard to the tribunal for divorce. If I choose to establish myself in France, living in adultery, I can make you seek your remedy in France. If I choose to transfer my domicile from France to Germany I can make you go there." The exception stated in Armytage v. Armytage (supra) only enunciated the original principle of English law that a man who behaved in this way could not be heard to assert his inhabitance of another country. This exception was upheld in Scottish law, in Manderson v. Sutherland (1 F., 621, at p. 629) per Lord Moncrieff. Professor Dicey said that this was a possible exception (4th Edition, Conflict of Laws, at p. 295), though he certainly expressed some doubt at a later stage (p. 878) as to the validity of the exception. Westlake, however, and other authors had approved the exception. Counsel also referred to Niboyet v. Niboyet (4 P.D., 1, at p. 14) per Lord Justice Brett; Le Mesurier v. Le Mesurier (11 The Times L.R., 481: [1895] A.C., 517); Lord Advocate v. Jaffrey (36 The Times L.R., 820; [1921] 1 A.C., 146); and Attorney-General for Alberta v. Cook (42 The Times L.R., 317; [1926] A.C., 444).

Mr. BEDDINGTON submitted that whatever might be the validity of the exception stated in Armytage v. Armytage (supra) the facts of this case made it distinguishable. There having been a decree of judicial separation, the respondent was under no obligation to remain in this country. He went to France in 1923 definitely to live there and with no intention of defeating his wife's rights. In his affidavit he said:

"At the time when I determined to take up my residence in France I had no expectation that my wife might bring any matrimonial proceedings against me. I understood that the deeds of August, 1921, were a final settlement between my wife and me and made further proceedings by either party impossible and that I was free to settle wherever I pleased. . . . She has exactly the same remedies against me according to French law as she would have in the English Courts. I have nothing to gain in these proceedings by setting up a French domicile, but it would be contrary to fact and disloyal to the Court if I allowed my wife to sue in a Court which in the events which have happened has no jurisdiction."

The dictum in Armytage v. Armytage (supra), added counsel, had never been followed in a defended suit, and this was the first time that the issue had been raised in a contested suit. There was indeed no real exception to the general rule of the forum of the domicile. Stathatos v. Stathatos (29 The Times L.R., 54; [1913] P., 46) and De Montaigu v. De Montaigu (29 The Times L.R., 654; [1913] P., 154) each presented special features which made them no real exceptions. His Lordship (Lord Merrivale) in the case before the Privy Council of Attorney-General for Alberta v. Cook (supra) had cited an obiter passage from the judgment of Lord Cave in Lord Advocate v. Jaffrey (supra) as follows:

"As to a possible exception in a case where a husband who, having been guilty of desertion or some other matrimonial offence in this country, endeavours to deprive his wife of her remedy by changing his domicile, there is no doubt authority (which it is not now necessary to examine) for the proposition that in such a case the husband will not be allowed to set up his own wrong as an argument for prejudicing his wife's rights."

But in the Privy Council case, Lord Merrivale, in reading the decision of the Judicial Committee, had not accepted this view. On the contrary he said that the contention that a wife judicially separated from her husband was given choice of a new domicile was contrary to the general principle on which the unity of domicile of the married pair depended. Neither divorce a mensa et thoro nor the Matrimonial Causes Act of 1857 effected that purpose. Moreover, Mr. Beddington added, the doctrine of estoppel could apply only to a case where the acquisition of the foreign domicile was part of the husband's matrimonial wrongdoing, and that was not the case here.

The question sought to be raised by this summons is whether there is a rule of law governing the jurisdiction in divorce whereby as between parties originally of English domicile a husband judicially separated from his wife and alleged to be afterwards guilty of adultery is disentitled to allege in proceedings by the wife for dissolution of marriage that since the decree of judicial separation he has become domiciled elsewhere.

The domicile of origin of the parties is English. They were married in England in 1915. In 1921 a decree of judicial separation on the ground of desertion was pronounced at the suit of the wife. Later in the same year she petitioned for dissolution of marriage on the ground of her husband's alleged adultery, but in pursuance of an agreement for valuable consideration made between her, her husband, and his father, the petition was, on her application, dismissed. She now petitions for dissolution of marriage on the ground that the husband has during 1927 and 1928 lived in adultery at Nice.

The respondent appeared to the petition under protest, alleging himself to be domiciled in France, and at his instance an order has been made for trial of an issue in order to determine whether he is or not domiciled in England. He has filed affidavits which make a prima facie case of domicile in France. The petitioner, after the time for appeal against the order for an issue has expired, applies to set aside the order, or alternatively for directions for trial of the issue upon viva voce evidence at the hearing of the petition. Extension of time for appeal is sought and must be allowed.

For the petitioner it was argued at the hearing of the summons that a husband domiciled in England who deserts his wife is thereupon estopped from acquiring domicile elsewhere. It was also argued that the wife so deserted is entitled to determine the forum in which proceedings as to the marriage shall be taken. In effect what is contended for is a condition as to domicile stereotyped by or upon the decree of judicial separation, or incapable of being altered without the consent of the wife.

Admittedly there is no direct authority for the proposition of law which the petitioner asserts. In old cases like Warrender v. Warrender (2 Cl. and F., 488), Dolphin v. Robins (7 H.L.C., 390), and Pitt v. Pitt (4 Macqueen, 627), there was discussion in the House of Lords as to whether a wife separated from her husband by a judicial decree granted at her instance may acquire domicile other than that of her husband. In Armytage v. Armytage (14 The Times L.R., 480; [1898] P., 178) Lord Gorell, then Sir Gorell Barnes, stated an opinion that in the case of a wife antecedently domiciled here and deserted here by her husband the husband "cannot be allowed [in the wife's suit for dissolution of marriage] to assert for the purposes of the suit that he has ceased to be domiciled in this country." In Ogden v. Ogden (24 The Times L.R., 94; [1908] P., 46, at p. 78) the same learned Judge made a more detailed statement in the words following: "In cases where a wife has been deserted in the country of the domicile by her husband in circumstances entitling her to sue for divorce, it has been held that she might sue in the Courts of the country of the domicile, notwithstanding the fact that the husband has left the country and might possibly have done so with the intention of acquiring a domicile in another country. The decree in such a case is justified either by considering that the husband cannot be heard to say that he has changed his domicile, or, as some have thought, that the wife must ex necessitate be entitled to treat the country of the previous matrimonial domicile as still being the country of her domicile, and to require its Courts to do justice to her, because otherwise it would be impossible for a wife so situated to obtain a decree, as the respondent might keep changing his abode from place to place, asserting that he had abandoned his original domicile, and any domicile with which it were sought to fix him." The opinions expressed obiter in Warrender v. Warrender (supra), Dolphin v. Robins (supra), and Pitt v. Pitt (supra), and such cases do not accord with many later decisions in the supreme tribunals. The passages in Armytage v. Armytage (supra) and Ogden v. Ogden (supra) were not statements of opinion to which effect was given by the judgment of the Court, either here or in the Court of Appeal. They express, however, the considered views of an eminent Judge who, in 1908, had been for very many years engaged in administering the jurisdiction in divorce which is here exercised. On the other hand, they have not commanded the common assent of jurists (see Dicey on Conflict of Laws, 4th Edition, pp. 101 and 123); and the Judicial Committee in Attorney-General for Alberta v. Cook (42 The Times L.R., 317; [1926] A.C., 444), while it did not deal directly with the questions involved in this case, laid it down as axiomatic in the jurisdiction in divorce that one of the effects of marriage is to give to the spouses a common domicile—the domicile of the husband—that the jurisdiction to decree dissolution of marriage is the jurisdiction of the country of the domicile, and that it is a requisite of the jurisdiction to dissolve marriage that the defendant in the proceedings should be domiciled within the jurisdiction. Counsel for the petitioner frankly said in the course of his argument that he knew of no case in which effect had been given to the propositions embodied in the dicta from Armytage v. Armytage (supra) and Ogden v. Ogden (supra) which I have cited, and if they are authority, they define an exception to the principles most strongly emphasized in recent judgments of the House of Lords and the Privy Council that under British law the jurisdiction to decree divorce depends on domicile, that the domicile of the husband determines the domicile of the wife, and that independent authority to decree divorce cannot, consistently with English law, co-exist at the same time in two sovereign States.

When the opinions cited from Armytage v. Armytage (supra) and Ogden v. Ogden (supra) are carefully examined it becomes clear that they do not purport to lay down a rule of law. They purport rather to state the practice of the Court. It is said, however, that they necessarily involve the proposition for which the petitioner contends and must be given effect to in that sense. What, then, is the suggested rule, what is its origin, and how does it operate? It supposedly relates, as I understand, to people whose domicile of origin is English. No one has ever suggested that the residence of foreigners which gives jurisdiction to decree judicial separation stereotypes the domicile of either of them. Nor is it thought, I believe, that in the case of citizens of foreign or colonial origin, resort of an injured wife to an English Court would render the defendant in the suit legally incapable of reverting to his domicile of origin overseas, or choosing a permanent home and finding a new domicile elsewhere. If the rule exists, it would seem to have some remarkable exceptions. No such rule forms part of the Common Law Until 1857 the power of dissolution of marriage by judicial decree, to which it is supposed to be ancillary, did not exist. There was no room or use for such a rule in the Courts which exercised jurisdiction to decree divorce a mensa et thoro. That jurisdiction depended simply on residence. There is no such provision in any of the Matrimonial Causes Acts. So as a substantive proposition of English law the alleged rule cannot be sustained. How then and to what extent can the Court, within its due authority, give effect in practice to a resolution like that stated in Armytage v. Armytage (supra), that a husband of English domicile who deserts his wife here shall not be allowed in the wife's suit for dissolution of marriage to assert for the purposes of the suit that he has ceased to be domiciled in this country, or, as was said in Ogden v. Ogden (supra), that a wife so deserted in circumstances entitling her to sue for divorce shall be admitted to sue here "notwithstanding the fact that the husband has left the country and might possibly have done so with the intention of acquiring a domicile in another country"? It is suggested that the principle of estoppel is available.

In the 18th century jurisdiction was gained in English Courts by resort to legal fictions—supposititious residence in Cheapside, untrue averments of imprisonment in the Marshalsea or of indebtedness to the Crown, and the like, with the aid of rules of procedure which prevented the raising of issues of fact in respect of matters going to the jurisdiction. In the 20th century his Majesty's Courts do not proceed on like lines. The suggestion that a respondent should be met by an estoppel in limine in the matter of jurisdiction when a petition alleges a state of facts such as is forecasted in Ogden v. Ogden (supra) is a proposal to resort to a legal fiction, and not an appeal to an estoppel in the true sense. Estoppel, as has been said in numberless cases, is a rule of evidence: see per Lord Esher in Seton, Laing and Co. v. Lafone (3 The Times L.R., 624; 19 Q.B.D., 68), per Lords Justices Lindley and Bowen in Low v. Bouverie (7 The Times L.R., 582; [1891] 3 Ch., 82), and per Lord Justice Vaughan Williams in Liverpool and North Wales Steamship Company, Limited v. Mersey Trading Company, Limited (25 The Times L.R., 89; [1909] 1 Ch., 209). To quote an early definition, "Estoppel is when one is forbidden in law to speak against his own act or deed, yea though it be to say the truth" (Termes de la Ley: Tit. Estoppel). Estoppel prevents a man from denying the truth of some statement he has made, per Lord Justice Lindley in Low v. Bouverie (supra), or some representation by conduct which has induced another to alter his position, per Lord Justice Vaughan Williams in Oliver v. Bank of England (18 The Times L.R., 341; [1902] 1 Ch., 610). In legal proceedings waiver may work estoppel as acquiescence may in the course of a business transaction. The rule of evidence which produces estoppel operates in the trial of issues as to domicile in this Court to the same extent as in other proceedings in the High Court and not otherwise. The statute which established the jurisdiction in divorce directed that the Court should proceed upon the rules of evidence in force in the Courts of Common Law.

An issue of domicile, therefore, is not to be prejudged so as to give effect to a presumption of law, but it is to be duly tried to determine the relevant matters of fact. It may even be that the effect in point of fact of a proved desire to avoid a jurisdiction may have to be weighed together with other relevant facts, as was done, with interesting results, in the Chancery Division in the case of Drexel v. Drexel (32 The Times L.R., 208 ; [1916] 1 Ch., 251, at p. 259).

What follows from the considerations I have stated is that the respondent's allegation by way of objection to the jurisdiction of the Court that he is domiciled in France may be tried like any other issue. Upon the trial the Court will determine whether the respondent has taken up his residence in France and is in truth resident there with that intention which, coupled with residence, results in a change of domicile. There, and particularly on the last-mentioned topic, the matters which gave rise to the pronouncements in Armytage v. Armytage (supra) and Ogden v. Ogden (supra) will have whatever may be their due weight.

The application to rescind the order for trial of the issue fails. As to the mode of trial, the state of the facts makes it highly desirable that the issue shall be tried upon evidence given viva voce, and the proper mode of securing this will be to direct, as I do, that the issue be set down for trial with the cause, so that if the preliminary decision be in favour of the petitioner, she may forthwith proceed to establish her right to a decree. The wife will have the costs of the application.

Court of Appeal. } 1928.
(Scrutton, Greer, and Russell, L.JJ.) } June 29.

SOWERBY AND ANOTHER v. LINDSAY (WHITELOCK AND ANOTHER, THIRD PARTIES).*

Landlord and Tenant—Lease—Construction—Rates paid in excess of fixed sum in any year of tenancy—Covenant by landlords to refund—Covenant by tenant duly and punctually to pay rates—Three half-years' rates paid in single year of tenancy—Construction of landlords' covenant to refund.

The lease of a flat beginning at midsummer at a rent of £400 per annum, payable in advance at the rate of £100 on each quarter day, contained a covenant by the lessors that in case the total sum paid by the tenant in any one year of the term in respect of rates and taxes should exceed £125, the lessors would, on production of the relative receipts, refund to the tenant the difference between the total sum paid by him as aforesaid and £125. If this difference were not refunded by the lessors within fourteen days of demand the tenant was to be at liberty to deduct such difference from the next instalment of rent. The lease contained a covenant by the tenant that he would duly and punctually pay and discharge all rates, taxes, duties, charges, assessments, and outgoings payable in respect of the demised premises.

The tenant in a year of the tenancy between midsummer and midsummer paid three half-years' rates, amounting in all to over £125, and having demanded the refund of the excess from the landlords and having failed to get payment of the same within 14 days of the demand, deducted it from his next instalment of rent.

Held (Scrutton, L.J., dissenting), that, under the landlords' covenant to refund, the tenant was entitled to make the deduction.

Decision of the Divisional Court (44 The Times L.R., 501) affirmed.

This was an appeal from a decision of the Divisional Court, Mr. Justice Salter and Mr. Justice Talbot (44 The Times L.R., 501), allowing an appeal from a decision of the Recorder of the City of London, sitting at the Mayor's and City of London Court, by which he gave judgment for the plaintiffs, Messrs. Sowerby and Another, against the defendant, Mr. John Lindsay, for £66 9s. 2d., being a quarter's rent of £100 for a flat on the fourth floor at No. 24, Park-lane, London, less certain credits amounting to £33 10s. 10d., and judgment for the defendant against the third parties for the amount payable by the defendant to the plaintiffs in respect of the claim and costs.

By a lease dated June 26, 1925, the Park-lane Flats, Limited, demised to Captain Beaumont the said flat at a rent of £400 per annum, payable in advance at the rate of £100 on each quarter day. Clause 2 (2) of the lease was as follows :—

"That the tenant will duly and punctually pay and discharge all rates, taxes, duties, charges, assessments, and outgoings whatsoever, whether Parliamentary, parochial, local, or of any other description, and including in particular water rate, which are now or may at any time hereafter be assessed, charged, or imposed upon or payable in respect of the demised premises or the owner or occupier in respect thereof (landlords' property tax in respect of the rent first hereinbefore reserved only excepted) and will also duly and punctually pay all sums payable in respect of gas, electric light, and other luminant, if any, used in the flat as shown by the separate meter or meters belonging thereto."

By clause 4 (6) : "In case the total sum paid by the tenant in any one year of the term hereby granted in respect of rates and taxes shall exceed £125, that the lessor will on production of the relative receipts refund to the tenant the difference between the total sum paid by him as aforesaid and the said sum of £125. And that if such difference be not refunded by the lessor within 14 days of demand, then the tenant shall be at liberty to deduct such difference from the next instalment of rent payable by him hereunder."

By clause 4 (1) of the lease the right to quiet enjoyment was made conditional on the tenant's performance of his covenants.

By a deed of assignment dated December 4, 1925, the Park-lane Flats, Limited, assigned their interest in the lease to the plaintiffs. By a deed of assignment dated May 26, 1927, Captain Beaumont assigned his tenancy under the lease to the defendant. In the year of the tenancy from June 24, 1926, to June 24, 1927, Captain Beaumont had paid three half-years' general rates and two water rates, making in all

* Reported by T. W. Morgan, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

£213 11s. 8d. On completion of the assignment of the tenancy Mr. Lindsay paid over to Captain Beaumont £88 11s. 8d., the amount by which £213 11s. 8d. exceeded £125, and Messrs. Whitelock and Storr, Captain Beaumont's solicitors, gave Mr. Lindsay an undertaking by way of indemnity in respect of that sum. The sum of £88 11s. 8d. then duly demanded of the plaintiffs having been and remaining unpaid for 14 days, Mr. Lindsay claimed to deduct the said sum from the next instalment of the rent, due on June 24, 1927. The plaintiffs thereupon sued for £100, this instalment of the rent, less certain credits of £33 10s. 10d. making £66 9s. 2d., under Order XIV. in the High Court. The defendant obtained leave to defend, claiming the right to deduct £88 11s. 8d. under clause 4 (6) of the lease, and the action was transferred to the Mayor's and City of London Court, Messrs. Whitelock and Storr being added as third parties.

The learned Recorder gave judgment for the plaintiffs for £66 9s. 2d., with costs, and judgment for the defendant against the third parties for the amount payable by the defendant to the plaintiffs in respect of the claim and costs.

The defendant and the third parties appealed. The Divisional Court (Mr. Justice Salter and Mr. Justice Talbot) held that even on the assumption that he had not duly and punctually paid these rates, the tenant, by the express terms of the lessors' covenant, was entitled to make the deduction. The tenant's covenant with regard to due and punctual payment of the rent was not a condition of the lessor's covenant to refund the excess paid over £125, and it did not qualify or modify that covenant. The Divisional Court accordingly allowed the appeal, entered judgment for the defendant, with costs, and set aside the order made against the third parties.

The plaintiffs, the landlords, appealed.

Mr. A. Grant, K.C., and Mr. Lavington appeared for the appellants; and Mr. C. A. Bennett, K.C., Mr. Sandlands, and Mr. Geoffrey Howard for the respondents.

Lord Justice Scrutton, in the course of a dissenting judgment, said that the question raised in the appeal was obviously one of some doubt. The Divisional Court had differed from the Court below and there was a difference of opinion in the Court of Appeal. He (the Lord Justice) was quite clear about the matter. The question for decision was with regard to the construction of a clause in a lease which defined the tenant's liability with regard to the rates. The clause in question limited the liability of the tenant to £125 per year and the question was how that was to be worked. He entirely agreed with Mr. Justice Talbot when he said: "The intention, I should imagine, of that clause was to apportion the rates as between landlords and tenant in this way: up to £125 per annum, it was intended that the rates should be borne and paid by the tenant, and that any excess over that should be borne by the landlord. That I have very little doubt was the intention with which that clause or paragraph was framed, and I should think probably that if one knew all the facts connected with this lease and the buildings of which probably, in fact obviously, these premises formed a part, we should find that these very same words were applied to terms beginning at different times of the year, and probably it was because the clause had to be adapted to a midsummer tenancy that the point, which I daresay was never thought of at all by the parties when they entered into this contract, has arisen." The difficulty in this case had arisen from an obvious arithmetical fact; the tenancy began at midsummer; the years of the tenancy were midsummer to midsummer, but those lease years, or tenancy years, covered three rating periods; Easter to Michaelmas, Michaelmas to Easter, and Easter to Michaelmas. The 12 months of the tenancy was mixed up with 18 months of rates, and according to the date on which the tenant paid his rates in the tenancy year—if he paid his first six months' rate before midsummer and the third six months' rate after the next midsummer—he might have actually paid only one six months' rate in one particular year of the tenancy; on the other hand, if he paid his first six months' rate after midsummer and his third six months' rate before the next midsummer, he would have paid three rates (18 months' rates) in the year; and it was easy to see that if he arranged it in that way and paid one instalment—one rate of six months—in the first year of his tenancy, and three half-years' rates in his second year, and recovered one six months' rate back from the landlord, and if he only paid one six months' rate in his third year and three six months' rates in his fourth year and again recovered from the landlord one six months' rates, and so on for the fifth and sixth years of his tenancy, he would have contrived to get for himself something which was never within the contemplation of the parties, because he would have paid less than six times £125, and would be putting the burden on the landlord, in three years, of half-a-year's rates. He (the Lord Justice) absolutely declined to believe that that was the intention of the parties and he declined to be forced to accept what he thought was a construction quite out of accordance with the intention of the parties and an unbusinesslike construction, if he could see his way to avoid it.

The language of the clause in question was as follows:—"In case the total sum paid by the tenant in any one year of the term hereby granted in respect of rates and taxes shall exceed £125 . . . ." In fact the tenant paid in one of the years of the tenancy rates for three half years. In his (Lord Justice Scrutton's) view, "paid" should be read as "payable." The clause should be read as relating to the year of the term and as meaning that in respect of the year of the term the tenant should only be liable for £125 for rates and taxes. Where a half-year's rating period was partly in and partly outside of one year of the term there should be an apportionment.

He (the Lord Justice) was quite clear that that was the intention of the parties; he was quite clear that it was business; and he was quite clear that it was justice, and those were three desirable things to get at in construing a deed. The other construction enabled the tenant to get out of paying half a year's rates every other year by choosing the time when he paid his rates. He (the Lord Justice) was quite clear that that was not the intention of the parties, and he was quite clear that it was not justice, and he desired to avoid constructions which were neither just nor businesslike and were contrary to the intention of the parties. He would therefore allow the appeal.

Lord Justice Greer said that he differed from Lord Justice Scrutton with the greatest possible hesitation, but he had formed a different opinion on the construction of the clause in question. He thought that the Judges in the Divisional Court had put the right construction on the deed in question. They had to construe two clauses in the deed—a formal document, prepared after full consideration in order to set down what the parties had undertaken the one to the other. The first clause was clause 2 (2) of the deed, which referred to the covenant by the tenant duly and punctually to pay and discharge all rates, taxes, duties, charges, assessments, and outgoings whatsoever. It was to be observed that if punctual payment was not made, and that resulted in loss to the landlord, the landlord would be entitled to say that the tenant had broken the contract and must pay damages. Then clause 4 (6) provided: "in case the total sum paid by the tenant in any one year of the term hereby granted in respect of rates and taxes shall exceed £125, that the lessor will on production of the relative receipts refund to the tenant the difference between the total sum paid by him as aforesaid and the said sum of £125. And that if such difference be not refunded by the lessor within 14 days of demand, then the tenant shall be at liberty to deduct such difference from the next instalment of rent payable by him hereunder."

What had happened in this case was that in one year of the term the tenant paid rates, partly in respect of that year and partly in respect of the previous year, in excess of £125 by £88 11s. 8d., and the defendant claimed the right to deduct that sum under clause 4 (6) of the lease. He (Lord Justice Greer) could not read the words "the total sum paid by the tenant in any one year" and the words "paid by him as aforesaid" as meaning something quite different from what they said—as equivalent to the words, "total sum payable by the tenant in any one year" and "the total sum payable by him as aforesaid." A literal construction of the covenant did not do any injustice to the landlords, because if they did not get their rent, if too large a sum was deducted in one year because too small an amount had been deducted in the previous year, the landlords had their remedy by claiming damages, because they would be entitled to say that punctual payment had not been made. It was argued that clause 4 (6) must be read as conditional on punctual payment by the tenant of the rates and taxes. But all the members of the Court agreed that it was impossible to read the sub-clause as conditional on punctual payment. He regretted that he could not come to the same conclusion as Lord Justice Scrutton, but the words were clear and the parties must be held to the words which they had put in the document, which was a carefully considered formal document.

Lord Justice Russell said that with some trepidation he also differed from the view adopted by Lord Justice Scrutton, but he took some consolation from the fact he was in company with Mr. Justice Salter, Mr. Justice Talbot, and Lord Justice Greer on that matter. It was highly likely that Mr. Justice Talbot had made a correct guess with regard to the intention of the parties, when he used this language: "The intention, I should imagine, of that clause, was to apportion the rates as between the landlord and tenant in this way: up to £125 per annum, it was intended that the rates should be borne and paid by the tenant and that any excess should be borne by the landlord." If it were possible to construe the words used by the parties in the deed so as to effectuate that intention without using undue violence in the process, he (Lord Justice Russell) would gladly do so, but he was unable to construe the clause in any such way without essentially and radically redrafting it. It was suggested that the Court should read the words "rates and taxes" as referring only to rates and taxes relating to the particular year in question. At first sight that was an attractive suggestion, but, on looking at the matter a little more closely, that would not give effect to the intention of the parties. The words "paid by the tenant" in clause 4 (6) clearly could only relate to actual payment. It was quite impossible to strain the language of the clause and read the word "paid" as "payable." To decide in the appellants' favour here would be redrafting the clause and not construing the rights of the parties. The appeal failed and must be dismissed.

K.B. Div. (Rowlatt, J.) 1928. June 22.

MORLEY v. LAWFORD AND CO.*

Revenue — Income-tax — Deduction—Guarantee given in hope of obtaining orders—Trade expense—Income Tax Act, 1918 (8 and 9 Geo. V., c. 40), Sched. D, Cases I. and II., Rule 3.

The respondents, who were asphalters, subscribed to the guarantee fund of the British Empire Exhibition at Wembley, solely, as the General Commissioners found, in the hope of obtaining preferential treatment in the allocation of contracts for asphalting work within the Exhibition grounds. They did not in fact obtain any contract at all from the Exhibition authorities. Having been called upon to pay a considerable part of the amount guaranteed, they sought to deduct the sum so paid from their profits assessable to income-tax as a trade expense.

Held, that it was not an allowable deduction.

This was a case stated by the General Commissioners of Income Tax for the Becontree Division of Essex.

On December 9, 1926, Messrs. Lawford and Co. (hereinafter called "the respondents"), who at all material times carried on the business of asphalt contractors at Bow Bridge, Stratford, appealed against an assessment to income-tax, Schedule D, in the sum of £4,006 for the year ending April 5, 1927, made upon them under the provisions of the Income Tax Acts in respect of the profits of their business.

The sole question at the appeal and on which the opinion of the Court was sought was whether a sum of £375 paid by the respondents under circumstances hereinafter appearing and charged in their accounts for the year to December 31, 1925, as a "trading expense" was an admissible deduction in computing their profits for the purpose of assessment to income-tax for the year ending April 5, 1927.

Evidence which the General Commissioners accepted was given to the following effect:—

(a) In the month of December, 1921, the respondents received an inquiry from the surveyors to the British Empire Exhibition, Messrs. Baker and Mallett, for asphalting work at the Exhibition. In consequence thereof the respondents submitted an estimate in writing dated December 30, 1921, amounting to £3,617 10s., but no order resulted therefrom. In the month of January, 1922, the respondents submitted a revised estimate for such work but no order resulted therefrom.

* Reported by J. W. Hall, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

(b) In or about the month of March, 1922, the respondents were informed by a Colonel Lynch as representing the British Empire Exhibition (1923), Incorporated, at an interview that if they, the respondents, were prepared to subscribe to the guarantee fund for the undertaking of the Exhibition at Wembley they, as guarantors, would receive preferential treatment over non-guarantors as regards orders for asphalting work to be done at the Exhibition. On the faith of this representation the respondents decided to become guarantors in the sum of £250 to the British Empire Exhibition Fund for the purpose of obtaining such preference.

(c) Shortly thereafter, at a further interview between the respondents and Colonel Lynch as aforesaid respecting the guarantee to be given by the respondents as aforesaid, Colonel Lynch informed the respondents that certain of the respondents' competitors had become guarantors to the extent of £1,000 and £250 respectively, and after consideration the respondents informed Colonel Lynch that in order not to prejudice their position they had decided to increase their guarantee originally contemplated at £250 to the sum of £500, and they in fact gave a guarantee for such sum to the British Empire Exhibition (1923), Incorporated, on April 5, 1922.

(d) The respondents did not receive any order or inquiry whatsoever from the Exhibition authorities.

(e) In the year 1925 the respondents were called upon to pay and did in fact then pay the sum of £375 under and in respect of their said guarantee.

A representative of the respondents gave evidence, which the General Commissioners accepted, that the respondents gave the said guarantee solely for the purpose of obtaining preference as regards the respondents' tenders for asphalting work to be done at the Exhibition ; that by reason of the representations made by Colonel Lynch as aforesaid they believed that as a result of such guarantee they would obtain an order or orders for such work ; and that but for such belief they would never have given the said guarantee at all.

It was contended on behalf of the respondents that the payment of £375 was ordinary business expenditure with the object and for the purpose of making ordinary business profit out of which revenue would accrue, and that it was money wholly and exclusively laid out or expended for the purposes of their trade, or alternatively that it was a loss connected with or arising out of their trade within the terms of Rule 3 of the Rules applicable to Cases I. and II. of Schedule D of the Income Tax Act, 1918, and therefore was a proper deduction from the profits for the purpose of income-tax.

On behalf of the Crown it was contended :—

(a) That the said sum of £375 was not money wholly and exclusively laid out or expended for the purpose of the respondents' trade and was not a loss connected therewith.

(b) That it was not an expense of earning the profits for the year ending December 31, 1925.

(c) That it was money expended for the purpose of acquiring contracts and not an expense of fulfilling any such contracts.

(d) That the said sum of £375 represented a capital payment and its deduction was accordingly prohibited by Rule 3 of the Rules applicable to Cases I. and II. of Schedule D of the Income Tax Act, 1918.

(e) That the sum of £375 was not a proper debit item to be placed against the profits of the year ending December 31, 1925.

The following cases were cited in support of the Crown's contentions : City of London Contract Corporation, Limited v. Styles (4 The Times L.R., 51), English Crown Spelter Company, Limited v. Baker (99 L.T., 353), Stott v. Hoddinott (7 Tax Cas., 85).

The General Commissioners determined, on the facts above stated and admitted, as follows :—

"We are satisfied on the whole of the evidence that Messrs. Lawford and Co. gave the guarantee, and the amount paid thereunder was money expended by them wholly and exclusively for the purpose of their trade or business and is an admissible deduction from their profits for income-tax purposes."

The inspector of taxes thereupon required the General Commissioners to state and sign a case for the opinion of the High Court.

The Attorney-General (Sir Thomas Inskip, K.C.) and Mr. R. P. Hills appeared for the Crown ; Mr. Latter, K.C., Mr. du Parcq, K.C., and Mr. J. P. Eddy for the respondents.

Mr. Justice Rowlatt.—In this case, the respondents, who are asphalters, seek to deduct from their profits, or to carry into the computation of their profits, a sum of £375 which they have had to pay as guarantors to the British Empire Exhibition. They paid the guarantee with the wholly commercial and mercenary object—I am not using that word in any offensive sense—of putting themselves in a better position to get a contract for some of the asphalting which would have to be done in the grounds of the Exhibition. It so happened that although they had been solicited to give the guarantee by holding out these hopes they did not get any contract and never were even asked to tender. But I think the case would have been precisely the same had they obtained a lucrative contract.

I do not think anything turns on the circumstance that what would, as it was hoped, help them, was not the payment of any sum of money but the act of giving a guarantee which, in the event, became a payment of a sum of money. I think I must treat the case just as if the money had been paid without the intervention of the chance of escaping payment which the form of a guarantee gave them. I look at it from this point of view : Was the guarantee given for the purposes of the trade ; or rather, could it be found by the General Commissioners that the guarantee was given for the purposes of the trade ?

Secondly, I do not think anything turns upon the circumstances that the guarantee, in the hope of obtaining results, was in one year and the actual payment called for was in another year. I do not think those circumstances affect the case ; I only mention them to show that I have not overlooked them.

The General Commissioners have found in favour of the subject and they have found the facts as fully as they can find them. The Crown, however, takes up its position, as I understand it, on two grounds, which perhaps run into one another a little. The Crown says that this was a capital expenditure ; then it says that this was not an expenditure at all which was sufficiently connected with the trade. I say nothing at all about the first point, whether it was a capital expenditure, because I think that the Crown is right on the second point. I do not think that either the giving of this guarantee or the payment under it is capable of being described as a payment at all for the purposes of the trade within the meaning of the Act.

What was really the position ? This Exhibition was in contemplation and it required guaranteeing. It was an Exhibition that was designed to further every sort of trade. Incidentally it would be necessary to have the grounds asphalted, but the object of the Exhibition was to further every sort of trade, and the immediate purpose, and the only immediate purpose which it is possible to attribute to anybody, was to support that Exhibition.

Then there comes the second step in the argument, that it might occur to a prudent man that, if he was a supporter of the Exhibition, then a subsidiary stream of causation would be set in motion ; a supporter of the Exhibition would be more likely to be supported by the Exhibition when it came to the giving out of contracts than one who was not. Therefore the operation of supporting the Exhibition might be coloured by an ulterior and mercenary motive. I think that the ulterior mercenary motive was this : that it was hoped that supporting the Exhibition would influence orders in the direction of the respondents ; that patronage, like charity, might be so ordered as to begin at home.

That was the position. As I say, I think this expenditure is incapable of being held to be for the purposes of the trade.

I begin in dealing with the difficulties in the way that the Crown suggested from the classical passage in Lord Cave's judgment in British Insulated and Helsby Cables, Limited v. Atherton (42 The Times L.R., 187 ; [1926] A.C., 205) where he says : " A sum of money expended, not of necessity and with a view to a direct and immediate benefit to the trade, but voluntarily and on the grounds of commercial expediency, and in order indirectly to facilitate the carrying on of the business, may yet be expended wholly and exclusively for the purposes of the trade." But I think when Lord Cave used the words " indirectly " and " immediate " and " commercial expediency " and so on he was indicating dissociation between the expenditure and the trade of a far less wide character than what I have endeavoured to indicate by using the words " ulterior motive." In all the cases that he was referring to and that can be referred to under this head the expenditure itself was, in its immediate character, a commercial expenditure or what might be a commercial expenditure in itself. In the case of Smith v. Incorporated Council of Law Reporting for England and Wales (30 The Times L.R., 588 ; [1914] 3 K.B., 674) there was a payment to one of the staff of the society concerned in that case. In the case of Mitchell v. Noble, Limited (43 The Times L.R., 245 ; [1927] 1 K.B., 719) there was a payment to one of the directors of the company ; that was the immediate nature of the payment. In the Scotch case of Moore v. Stewarts and Lloyds, Limited (6 Tax Cas., 501) it was a payment to gain a business control. In Usher's Wiltshire Brewery, Limited v. Bruce (31 The Times L.R., 104 ; [1915] A.C., 433) it was a payment in respect of a house belonging to the brewery company.

The payments in all those cases may be said to have been indirect and to have been made only on the ground of commercial expediency and not immediately for the purposes of the trade, but they were not anything like so remote as, in my judgment, the payment in this case, where the respondents were merely putting themselves in the position of subscribers to something in the hope that they would be favourably considered.

This case is a most important one, I think, because if the line is not to be drawn at this case, I really do not know what mercenary payments in the nature of " ground bait," as the Attorney-General put it, may not come in and be capable of being found to have been made for the purposes of the trade.

Now the nearest analogy that can be put, I think, from the point of view of the subject, is the case of expenditure on advertisement. In a figurative way you may call this perhaps an expenditure on advertisement because it was an expenditure merely made to influence customers, it was an expense not immediately of production, but it was an expense of salesmanship. But it was not the same, because the expenses of advertisement are expenses directly inviting trade to your business. This was really an expenditure which put the respondents in a class of persons who they anticipated might be favourably considered for reasons of gratitude, so to speak, by people who had business to give away.

I suppose a great many people subscribe to a great many things, buildings, and so on, in the hope that some trade may come their way in respect of that. I think that is all very much too remote. I do not think a case like this, putting it at its highest, is capable of being considered by the General Commissioners in the way in which they have dealt with it, Therefore I find that in this appeal the Crown succeeds, with costs.

IN RE HOME AND COLONIAL INSURANCE COMPANY, LIMITED.*

Companies—Dissolution—Subsequent discovery of assets—Motion to declare dissolution void—Defunct company—Removal from Register—Notice to Treasury Solicitor—Companies (Consolidation) Act, 1908 (8 Edw. VII., c. 69), ss. 223 (1), 242.

Where a limited company has been dissolved, and on the subsequent discovery of assets a motion is made under s. 223 (1) of the Companies (Consolidation) Act, 1908, to declare the dissolution void, notice of the motion ought to be given to the Treasury Solicitor since on dissolution the undistributed assets pass to the Crown as bona vacantia. Under s. 242, as to removal of defunct companies from the Register, the same practice should be adopted where there are undistributed assets.

This was a motion to declare the dissolution of the Home and Colonial Insurance Company, Limited, void under section 223 (1) of the Companies (Consolidation) Act, 1908, which is as follows :—

" Where a company has been dissolved, the Court may at any time within two years of the date of the dissolution, on an application being made for the purpose by the liquidator of the company or by any other person who appears to the Court to be interested, make an order, upon such terms as the Court thinks fit, declaring the dissolution to have been void, and thereupon such proceedings may be taken as might have been taken if the company had not been dissolved."

* Reported by H. Langford Lewis, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Mr. Lionel Cohen appeared for the liquidator ; Mr. Stafford Crossman for the Attorney-General.

Mr. COHEN said that the company's final meeting was held on May 27, 1927, and it was dissolved in November, 1927. Since then a very considerable asset had been discovered in the form of a right of action against another company under a reinsurance agreement which would have been void if it had covered marine policies by reason of the decision in In re National Benefit Assurance Company, Limited—Ex parte English Insurance Company, Limited (44 The Times L.R., 14 ; [1928] Ch., 74). The liquidator had since discovered that the dissolved company had issued no policies of marine insurance, and so there was a good debt. The only question was whether, on an application such as the present, the Attorney-General ought to be served with notice of the motion. Mr. Registrar Stiebel, in his book on Companies, had suggested (at p. 1,228) that there was some doubt as to the practice. That matter, said counsel, ought to be settled one way or the other.

Mr. CROSSMAN said that the Crown might have an interest in any assets which were undistributed, as bona vacantia, and the Treasury Solicitor thought that there should be a regular practice of giving him notice of any motion brought under section 223 of the Act, so that he might consider whether the Crown ought or ought not to be represented before the Court.

MR. JUSTICE MAUGHAM thought that it was inconceivable that the Crown should wish to oppose the making of such an order.

Mr. CROSSMAN said that the making of the order was discretionary, and, apart from the section, the Crown would have a vested right in the assets. In ninety-nine cases out of a hundred the Crown would not see fit to be represented, but there might be cases in which it would desire to intervene. He referred to In re Higginson and Dean—Ex parte Attorney-General (15 The Times L.R., 135 ; [1899] 1 Q.B., 325). He suggested that the same practice should be adopted in applications under section 242 of the Companies (Consolidation) Act, 1908, under which the Registrar of Joint Stock Companies could strike a defunct company off the Register. On the present motion the Attorney-General did not wish to intervene.

MR. JUSTICE MAUGHAM said that it was desirable that he should state the practice under section 223, when the Court made an order declaring the dissolution of a company to have been void. It was settled by the decision in In re Higginson and Dean—Ex parte Attorney-General (15 The Times L.R., 135 ; [1899] 1 Q.B., 325) that, on a company being dissolved in the strict sense, the whole of its assets undistributed at the date of dissolution passed to the Crown as bona vacantia, and that, accordingly, if the Court made an order under the section, it was in effect divesting the Crown of those assets. It followed that such an order should not be made without notice being given to the Treasury Solicitor to ascertain whether the Attorney-General should be served. The position under section 242 of the same Act in cases where there were undistributed assets appeared to be exactly the same. There the practice had been to serve the Registrar, but the same practice should be adopted as under section 223. In the present case the Attorney-General had appeared at the request of the Court, and been represented by Mr. Crossman, and, as he made no claim to the assets, the order would be made as asked for by the motion. There would be no order as to costs.

TILLING-STEVENS MOTORS, LIMITED v. KENT COUNTY COUNCIL AND ANOTHER.*

Revenue — Mechanically propelled vehicles—Duty—Petrol-electric vehicle—Electrical propulsion—Generation of electricity by internal combustion engine on vehicle—Rate of duty—Finance Act, 1926 (16 and 17 Geo. V., c. 22), Sched. I. (5).

A vehicle propelled by electricity generated by an internal combustion engine on the vehicle is not an electrically propelled vehicle within clause 5 of the First Schedule to the Finance Act, 1926, and is therefore subject to the higher duty imposed upon a vehicle mechanically propelled otherwise than by electricity.

So held by Lord Hanworth, M.R., and Sankey, L.J.—Russell, L.J., dissenting.

Decision of Clauson, J. (44 The Times L.R., 516) reversed.

This was the defendants' appeal from a decision of Mr. Justice Clauson (44 The Times L.R., 516).

On April 9, 1927, the plaintiffs in the action, Tilling-Stevens Motors, Limited, applied to the defendants, the Kent County Council, for a licence in respect of a petrol-electric goods vehicle, as being an electrically propelled vehicle, and paid to the defendants £21 5s. 3d. in respect of the licence duty, which sum was the proper amount chargeable under clause 5 of the First Schedule to the Finance Act, 1926, for an electrically propelled goods vehicle of the weight of the vehicle in question.

The Kent County Council refused to license the vehicle as an electrically propelled vehicle, and the plaintiffs, under protest, applied for and obtained a licence for it, at the higher rate fixed by the same clause, as a vehicle other than an electrically propelled vehicle. The plaintiffs claimed a declaration that they were entitled to repayment of the difference between the two rates.

The Kent County Council were empowered to levy and collect duties on licences for mechanically propelled vehicles. The second defendant, the Minister of Transport, was interested under the Roads Act, 1920, because the amounts for licences collected by the Kent County Council were payable to the Exchequer, and the Minister of Transport became entitled to a certain proportion of the sums which the Exchequer received.

Mr. Justice Clauson said that, in popular language, there was in those vehicles an ordinary internal combustion engine which produced the electricity which, in the electric motor, drove the rear wheels. The wheels went round because the electric motor made them revolve. That being so, the vehicles, in the popular sense, came within the category of electrically propelled vehicles as it was impossible to say that they were not electrically propelled, though it was true that petrol had some work to do. The plaintiffs had established that those particular vehicles were electrically propelled vehicles within the meaning of paragraph 5.

* Reported by G. T. WHITFIELD-HAYES and H. C. GARSIA, Esqs., Barristers-at-Law.

The Minister and the Kent County Council appealed.

The Attorney-General (Sir Thomas Inskip, K.C.) and Mr. Stafford Crossman appeared for the Minister ; Mr. K. E. Shelley for the council ; and Sir Arthur Colefax, K.C., and Mr. Trevor Watson for the respondents.

The Attorney-General said that the real source of power was the combustion engine. The electric motor was merely a source of transmission of energy to the rear wheels. The onus was on the respondents of proving that the true source of propulsion was electricity. Electricity played an important part in every motor-car, but cars were not usually "electrically propelled." In the vehicle under consideration the clutch, the gear box, and the gear shaft were missing, but otherwise it was just like an ordinary commercial lorry.

Sir Arthur Colefax, for the respondents, said that the essential characteristic of the respondents' vehicle was the electric motor.

Mr. Shelley replied.

The Master of the Rolls (Lord Hanworth), in giving judgment, said that the appeal was brought by the defendants claiming that judgment should be entered for them, and that it should be held that the vehicle in question was properly taxed under the Finance Act, 1926, as being a vehicle other than an electrically propelled vehicle.

It was a sound rule of law, applied again and again to Finance Acts, that words used in any such Act must be given their ordinary meaning, and that the duty of the Court was to look at the substance of the matter. He thought that in dividing mechanically propelled vehicles for the purpose of taxation into those which were electrically propelled and those otherwise propelled, the Legislature intended to provide two categories easily determinable.

It did not appear necessary, or even right, to enter into a discussion which might be very suitable in a patent case but was not germane when the Court had to deal with categories not made on a scientific basis. The schedule was intended to enable persons without any scientific training to ascertain how vehicles should be taxed. If scientific knowledge were applied, it might be contended with regard to a steam engine that the name was inappropriate, as the source of power was heated coal. So, too, the ordinary motor-car was not merely a vehicle containing an internal combustion engine driven with petrol but was a vehicle requiring a battery to provide the spark from which combustion was obtained.

There was no doubt in the present case that a petrol engine caused electricity to be stored, which, in its turn, caused the vehicle to be propelled ; but the real source of power was the petrol, and, to continue to drive the vehicle, the driver replenished his petrol tank and not his accumulators. Could the vehicle, then, be called an electrically propelled vehicle as in the case of the electric brougham ? He thought not. It was necessary to divide the vehicles into categories on broad grounds and not, perhaps, with scientific accuracy.

He found himself unable to agree with Mr. Justice Clauson, who seemed to have entered on an inquiry which was too precise. He (the Master of the Rolls) thought that the vehicle in question was propelled by petrol, although the power was transmitted electrically. For those reasons he had come to the conclusion that the vehicle fell within the category of vehicles which were other than electrically propelled, that it had been properly assessed to tax, and that the appeal must be allowed.

Lord Justice Sankey said that he agreed. The point to be decided was whether the vehicle in question was electrically propelled. If so, it paid a less tax than if it was a vehicle "other than electrically propelled" under the first Schedule to the Finance Act, 1926. In Lord Advocate v. Fleming (13 The Times L.R., 216 ; [1897] A.C., 145, at p. 152) Lord Halsbury said that in dealing with taxing Acts "we have no governing principle of the Act to look at ; we have simply to go on the Act itself to see whether the duty claimed under it is that which the Legislature enacted." And in Tennant v. Smith (8 The Times L.R., 434 ; [1892] A.C., 150, at p. 154) he said that "inasmuch as you have no right to argue that there is any governing object which a taxing Act is intended to attain other than that which it has expressed by making such and such objects the intended subject for taxation, you must see whether a tax is expressly imposed."

In this case, then, did the expression "vehicle other than electrically propelled" apply to the alleged subject of taxation ? That was where the difficulty arose, for the word "propelled" was capable of different shades of meaning. In the present case a diagram had been put in showing three different kinds of vehicle. No. 1 had the ordinary internal combustion engine and was petrol-propelled. No. 3 was a vehicle which was seen some years ago—the electric brougham. That was beyond question electrically propelled. But the particular vehicle with which the Court was now concerned seemed to lie between these two, and the question was on which side of the line it was, petrol-propelled or electrically propelled.

A taxing Act meant to be of universal application should be construed according to the ordinary meaning of the words, and it was not proper to go into scientific considerations. To do that would be to put too heavy a burden on the taxpayer. Starting with the ordinary petrol-driven engine, one found that there were certain drawbacks—namely, the abrupt changes of gear, which were translated into shocks that travelled through the machinery. It was so stated in the plaintiffs' pamphlets. Then how was it sought to avoid that ? It seemed to him (his Lordship) that it was by altering the mode of transmission. Therefore what had been done was not to alter the character of the petrol-propelled vehicle but to improve it by giving it a different mode of transmitting power. That was confused by the fact that the petrol consumption continued as before. The vehicle remained a petrol-propelled vehicle with a different transmission. He (his Lordship) was far from saying that the matter was beyond doubt. It might be argued that the Court was legislating rather than interpreting, but he did not think that was so. For these reasons he agreed that the appeal must be allowed.

Lord Justice Russell, in delivering a dissenting judgment, said that were it not for the fact that the Master of the Rolls and Lord Justice Sankey were of opinion that the appeal should be allowed, he would have said that the judgment of Mr. Justice Clauson was beyond question right. He held that opinion so strongly that he felt bound to express it. Indeed, the matter seemed to him so clear that he began to think that he must be wrong. In his view, the problem could best be illustrated by question and answer. Why did the vehicle move ?—Because the wheels rotated. Why did the wheels rotate ?—Because the shaft rotated. Why did the shaft rotate ?—Because of the motor driving it. What was the motive power in the motor driving it ?—Electricity. The only difference in the propulsion of that vehicle and the propulsion of an electric tram was that, in one case, the engine generating electricity was carried on the vehicle, while, in the other, it was not. No one would say that an electric tram was not "electrically propelled" because the engine which generated the electricity was driven by oil, gas, or steam. In his view, the appeal ought to be dismissed.

Court of Appeal.
(Lord Hanworth, M.R., Sankey and Russell, L.JJ.)
1928. July 16.

WIGGINS v. LAVY.*

Champerty—Maintenance—Speculative actions —How far permissible.

Observations as to the circumstances in which a solicitor may take up a speculative case on behalf of a poor client, and as to the terms on which he may do so.

This was an appeal by the defendant from the verdict and judgment entered at the trial before Mr. Justice Branson and a common jury of an action which related to an unusual claim for damages for alleged maintenance and champerty brought by Mr. Harry Francis Wiggins, of Edenholme, Charton-road, Shepperton, against Mr. Frederick Lavy, solicitor, of 3, Featherstone-buildings, High Holborn, W.C.

The plaintiff alleged that between December 15, 1925, and March 15, 1927, the defendant wrongfully and without legal justification or excuse procured Miriam Schneider and Isadore Schneider, an infant, by his father and next friend, Sidney Schneider, to bring an action against the plaintiff in the Shoreditch County Court for the recovery of damages for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by the negligence of the present plaintiff or his servant ; further, that the defendant wrongfully procured, maintained, and upheld the action and carried it on at his own cost and under an agreement, as between himself and Miriam Schneider and Sidney Schneider, that they should be under no liability to him for any costs in respect of the action, but that in the event of their succeeding he should receive one-tenth of any damages which they might recover. That agreement was said to have been entered into partly orally and, as to the written part, in a letter received by Sidney Schneider from a person writing in the name of the Legal Aid Society, stating that the society's solicitor, Frederick Lavy, would be pleased to undertake proceedings on the terms set out above.

The defendant denied the allegations and denied that the plaintiff had suffered damage. The defendant pleaded that if the Legal Aid Society or any other society did any of the things alleged the society was not acting as the servant or agent of the defendant, nor was it authorized by the defendant to do any of the things alleged.

The jury found that the charges of champerty and maintenance were both made out, and returned a verdict for the plaintiff. Judgment was entered for £29 14s. 2d. damages, and costs on the High Court scale.

The defendant appealed.

Mr. A. S. Comyns Carr, K.C., and Mr. Martin O'Connor appeared for the appellant ; Sir Patrick Hastings, K.C., and Mr. W. E. P. Done for the respondent.

Mr. Comyns Carr said that he was going to contend, first, that there was no evidence to support the plaintiff's case ; secondly, that the Judge had misdirected the jury in various particulars ; and, thirdly, that the Judge had allowed evidence to be given of a large number of cases of alleged offences of a similar character, said to have been committed by the defendant, in which the Schneiders had no concern. That evidence was admitted because it was alleged that, in connexion with the Schneider case, a document was going to be proved relating to a body called the Legal Aid Society, and that similar documents existed in those other cases, so that the evidence was admissible to prove the existence of a system to which the defendant was a party or that the Legal Aid Society was an agent for the defendant. That attempt collapsed, because no document was produced in regard to the Schneider case, and the Judge ruled out secondary evidence given by Sidney Schneider as to the existence and the matter of the document. Nevertheless, the Judge, in summing up, referred to the alleged agreement, and, in any case, the jury's minds had been poisoned by the irrelevant evidence.

There was a further ground which, in itself, was enough to put an end to the case. It was that the plaintiff had proved no special damage. The necessity for that in a civil action for maintenance was laid down in Neville v. London Express Newspaper, Limited (35 The Times L.R., 167 ; [1919] A.C., 368). Here the only special damage alleged consisted of the costs incurred by the plaintiff in the Schneider proceedings in the county court. In fact, those costs were not incurred by the plaintiff, but by the Yorkshire Insurance Company, which instructed solicitors in its own name and paid the costs. That applied not only to the Schneider proceedings, but also to the present proceedings. It was suggested that that was subrogation, but the policy of insurance was the policy of the Excel Company. A mistake had been made in suing Mr. Wiggins, who was the secretary of the Excel Company, instead of suing the Excel Company. The insurance company, in the circumstances, took on itself the burden of defending the plaintiff, but that was not under any policy of insurance.

Turning to the broader issues of the case, counsel said that there was a very curious and difficult conflict in the decisions and judicial statements on the subject in question, in so far as it affected solicitors. In a number of cases the Courts had dealt with the validity or invalidity of agreements by solicitors to charge no costs or to charge out-of-pocket costs only. In "The Law Practice and Usage in the Solicitors' Profession," issued by the Law Society, the following passage occurred at p. 163 :—

"The following statement made by Russell, L.C.J., in summing up to the jury in Ladd v. London Road Car Company (The Times, March 24, 1900, p. 4), was confirmed :—

"'It is perfectly consistent with the highest honour to take up a speculative action in this sense—viz., that if a solicitor heard of an injury to a client and honestly took pains to inform himself whether there was a bona fide cause of action, it was consistent with the honour of the profession that the solicitor should take up the action—Rich v. Cook [1900 C.A.] 110 Law Times Newspaper, 94 ; The Times, November 20, 1900, p. 14.' "

* Reported by H. C. Garsia and G. T. Whitfield-Hayes, Esqs., Barristers-at-Law.

In the present case the Judge had not left the question to the jury whether the defendant honestly believed that the Schneiders had a good cause of action. Counsel submitted that the two cases referred to in the above extract established that a solicitor was entitled to begin an action speculatively, so that his receipt of costs depended on the result of the action. If so, that was a complete answer on the question of maintenance here, as opposed to champerty.

It must be remembered that there was no existing provision for poor persons proceeding in the county court, such as existed in the case of the High Court, and, if a solicitor could not take up an action speculatively, it would be impossible for poor persons to obtain justice. His contention as to the lawfulness of a solicitor's engaging in speculative actions received support from In re Stretton (14 M. and W., 806) ; Jennings v. Johnson (L.R., 8 C.P., 425) ; Clare v. Joseph (23 The Times L.R., 498 ; [1907] 2 K.B., 369) ; and Gundry v. Sainsbury (26 The Times L.R., 321 ; [1910] 1 K.B., 645). It seemed possible that the poverty of the person so assisted might alone afford a defence to an action for maintenance : see Neville v. London Express Newspaper, Limited (supra). That case did not, it was contended, present the point being now raised, that if the defendant had a bona fide belief in the success of the action in the county court that would afford him a good ground of defence in the present case. To show that the defendant was guilty of maintenance, it must be shown that he assisted the Schneiders in the manner complained of without reasonable or probable cause: Flight v. Leman (4 Q.B., 883). He had dealt with the law on the footing that an agreeement by the defendant to act in the way alleged had been proved, but he would contend that no such agreement was proved.

Counsel then proceeded to deal with the facts, and pointed out that the defendant had a retainer in the ordinary form from the Schneiders, which lent no colour to the view that there had been any special bargain as to the costs.

The case opened on behalf of the plaintiff in the Court below was that the defendant had conducted litigation on the footing of receiving an improper interest in the fruits of the litigation, or else was maintaining an action in which he had no personal interest. In his opening, counsel for the plaintiff suggested that the defendant was, in fact, the Legal Aid Society, but that case broke down ; and, as the arrangement suggested was that the Legal Aid Society received 2s. in the pound out of any sum recovered by successful litigation brought through the society, the case that the defendant received that money was not proved. On the contrary, it was proved that the defendant had accounted for the money in all cases to the society. Further, counsel for the plaintiff referred in his opening to documents received by other persons from the Legal Aid Society, but those were not evidence against the defendant, in view of the failure to prove by receivable evidence that Sidney Schneider had ever received a similar communication. It was not suggested that the witnesses called for the plaintiff did not prove a certain relation between Mr. Lavy and the society, but they failed to prove that Mr. Lavy was the society, or that he had received any part of the 2s. in the pound.

In Hawkins's "Pleas of the Crown," Vol. 1, page 460, it was said that there was no doubt that an attorney might prosecute and defend an action "and may assist a client by laying out his own money to be repaid . . ." It was, perhaps, a question whether the poverty of a litigant was in itself enough, without charity, but in Holden and Another v. Thompson and Others (23 The Times L.R., 529 ; [1907] 2 K.B., 489) the assisting of a poor man was held to be charitable, and the offence of maintenance was held not to have been committed. At the same time, Cole v. Booker (29 The Times L.R., 295) established the proposition that charity need not be the sole motive.

Summing up his arguments on the question of champerty, counsel submitted that the document produced as coming from the Legal Aid Society was not an agreement at all, and so did not offend against the law which forbade champerty ; nor did that document purport to have any bearing on the position of the solicitor. Mr. Lavy had disproved that he had ever had 10 per cent. of the damages, and there was no foundation for the allegation. As regarded maintenance, there was no evidence to show any agreement with the Legal Aid Society and no evidence that Mr. Lavy had in any way bound himself to carry on litigation.

Sir Patrick Hastings said that the nature of the agreement entered into could not be in doubt. The Legal Aid Society had sent out documents with a figure of Justice on the top, and their substance was that the society would act for a litigant without fee or charge, but that 2s. in the pound of sums recovered would be retained. It was an attempt to start litigation on the basis that the litigant, if successful, would pay 10 per cent. of the damages obtained. That was clearly champertous. All that the respondent needed to prove was the agreement that part of the money received through that champertous bargain was to go into the pockets of those who assisted in getting it. Whether any damages had actually been obtained or not did not matter The champertous agreement was there whether anything resulted from it or not.

The Master of the Rolls (Lord Hanworth), in giving judgment, said that the appeal was argued on two grounds—(1) that the plaintiff had suffered no damage : and (2) that the defendant had not been guilty of champerty and maintenance. His Lordship reviewed the facts of the case, and said that the accident occurred on December 16, 1925, and on December 17 Mrs. Miriam Schneider, who could not write, made her mark on a document retaining the appellant as her solicitor. On December 18 the latter wrote to the driver of the vehicle which had been involved in the accident, saying that he had been consulted by Mrs. Schneider : that, from evidence before him, he believed the accident to have been caused by the negligence of the driver ; and that unless liability were admitted he was instructed to begin proceedings. The actual proceedings, however, were 11 months later, and the difference between the promptness in making the claim and actually bringing the proceedings was remarkable. From the evidence put forward in the case, it seemed impossible that Mr. Schneider could have seen the appellant before January 6, 1926, and, though Mrs. Schneider might have seen him earlier, it was difficult to say that any responsible person had seen Mr. Lavy before he wrote the letter of December 18.

After a time it was discovered that the action in the county court had been framed against the wrong person, and a letter was written on January 12, 1926, to Mr. Wiggins, the owner of the car. Delay ensued. Mr. Wiggins was employed by a company, and that company was insured against motor accidents with the Yorkshire Insurance Company. The Yorkshire Insurance Company repudiated liability on July 8, 1926 ; but it was remarkable that the appellant had not proceeded promptly with the action according to the instructions which he had received ; it was clearly his duty to have proceeded at once.

On August 8 he wrote to Mrs. Schneider that he presumed that she did not wish him to proceed, and asking for the costs which he had incurred, and a later letter was to the same effect. When the matter came before the county court Judge there was no appearance for the Schneiders, and Mr. Wiggins's costs were taxed for the amount claimed against the appellant. Later, the appellant wrote to the Schneiders that he was willing to accept £10 10s. as his costs in the matter.

The Schneiders were, admittedly, very poor people, and it was obvious that the reason for the delay was that the appellant really did not want to bring an action. It was difficult not to believe that the claim was really made by the appellant, who was guilty of maintaining the action, to get costs for himself. In British Cash and Parcel Conveyors, Limited v. Lamson Store Service Company, Limited ([1908] 1 K.B., 1006), Lord Justice Fletcher Moulton said, at p. 1014 :—

"That there is still such a thing as maintenance in the eye of the law and that it constitutes a civil wrong and perhaps a crime is undoubted, and the general character of the mischief against which it is directed is familiar to us all."

Reviewing the association of the appellant with the so-called "Legal Aid Society" and the way in which its business had been carried on by Osborne and Martin, his Lordship said that it had been admitted by Osborne that when an accident occurred he had introduced the person involved to the appellant, "who took up the case for him." A book had been kept by the appellant showing the transactions which had taken place. Sometimes the persons threatened paid up without fighting. Two shillings in the pound were deducted from the amounts received, but the appellant, a solicitor of 35 years' standing, had not kept any record of those accounts. Mr. Comyns Carr deserved the gratitude of the appellant for the way in which he had conducted the appeal, but it was quite impossible to say that this was a case of the appellant merely doing his duty by his client, a poor person. Lord Russell of Killowen, in Ladd v. London Road Car Company (The Times, March 24, 1900, p. 4), said that where a solicitor acted bona fide, and took pains to discover whether there was a proper cause of action, it was permissible for him to take up the case for a poor person who had no money, and that case was referred to in Rich v. Cook (The Times, November 20, 1900, p. 14 ; 110 L.T. Newspaper, 94).

Speaking as Master of the Rolls, in close touch with the solicitors' profession, he (Lord Hanworth) would be sorry to say anything which might make a decision in a doubtful case more difficult. It was hard to define the exact terms on which a solicitor might take up a speculative case for a poor client and when he might not. But to compare the cases of Ladd (supra) and Rich (supra) and the other authorities on the point with the action of the appellant in the present case was a travesty. There was, therefore, clear evidence of maintenance. The evidence of champerty was less clear, but it could not be said that there was no evidence of it.

But in Neville v. London Express Newspaper, Limited (35 The Times L.R., 167 ; [1919] A.C., 368), it had been held that an action for maintenance could not succeed without proof of special damage. In the present case Mr. Wiggins was the secretary of a company which was insured with the Yorkshire Insurance Company. The Yorkshire Insurance Company, acting in accordance with the best traditions of insurance companies, had assumed responsibility, though Mr. Wiggins himself was not an insured person at all. The insurance company had employed their own solicitor to defend the proceedings, and the costs of the solicitor were the subject matter of the claim in the action. There was, therefore, no case of any special damage to Mr. Wiggins, the plaintiff in the action, and on that technical ground the appeal must be allowed.

LORD JUSTICE SANKEY and LORD JUSTICE RUSSELL gave judgments to the same effect.

Divorce — Permanent maintenance — Calculation of amount—Wife's ownership of valuable jewellery—Whether to be taken into account.

In fixing the amount of permanent maintenance for a wife who has obtained a decree of divorce the Registrar is entitled to take into consideration the fact that she is the owner of valuable jewellery which could be sold so as to produce an income.

This was an appeal from the report of the Registrar fixing the amount of a former wife's permanent maintenance after a decree absolute at £2,000 a year, the respondent being Mr. John Lisle Lysaght, an owner of racing stables.

Sir Ellis Hume-Williams, K.C., and Mr. J. H. Watts appeared for the petitioner ; Mr. Bayford, K.C., and Mr. Bush James for the respondent.

SIR ELLIS HUME-WILLIAMS, for the petitioner, submitted that the Registrar had departed from the proper practice with regard to the calculation of the joint incomes in capitalizing a pearl necklace belonging to the petitioner at some £4,000 and reckoning that she enjoyed the income from that amount. If a man possessed valuable Old Masters, like Raeburns or Gainsboroughs, and did not choose to sell them, would the Court be justified in treating the potential income from the proceeds of a sale as his actual income ?

His LORDSHIP said that if a man had a large hidden treasure in an Ali Baba's cave the Court might encourage him to realize it in circumstances such as these. His Lordship held that the Registrar had properly taken into consideration the wife's possession of the £4,000 pearl necklace, and he would not vary the amount of maintenance ordered—namely, £2,000 a year. In view of the fact that both parties were comparatively young and the possibility of remarriage, the respondent would secure that amount on the petitioner. If the petitioner remarried her allowance would be reduced from £2,000 to £1,250.

REX v. INVESTORS' REVIEW, LIMITED— EX PARTE WHEELER.*

Practice—Subpœna duces tecum—Setting aside —Procedure—Whether by way of rule nisi— Rules of the Supreme Court, Order LII., r. 2.

By reason of Order LII., r. 2, of the Rules of the Supreme Court, the procedure by rule nisi cannot be used by a proposed witness in an action for the purpose of setting aside a subpœna duces tecum as being oppressive and an abuse of the process of the Court.

This was a rule nisi calling on the first defendants in a libel action of Rolls Razor (1927), Limited v. Investors' Review, Limited, and the London Caledonian Press, Limited, to show cause why a writ of subpœna duces tecum issued by the Investors' Review, Limited, and served on Sir Arthur Wheeler, Bt., should not be set aside as being oppressive and an abuse of the process of the Court.

Mr. Clement Davies, K.C., Sir T. Willes Chitty, K.C., Mr. Cartwright Sharp, and Mr. Baillieu showed cause for the Investors' Review, Limited ; Mr. Jowitt, K.C., and Mr. St. John Field supported the rule. Mr. James MacMillan held a watching brief for the second defendants.

Mr. Clement Davies said that the matter arose out of an action for alleged libel begun by Rolls Razor (1927), Limited, in respect of a paragraph published by the defendants on January 7, 1928.

In the pleadings publication was admitted, and there was no justification. The claim being solely for libel and not for slander of goods, the only issues were :—(1) Were the words a libel ? (2) What were the damages ? On the latter question, the dealings of Sir Arthur Wheeler (one of the promoters of the plaintiff company) might be most material, and the Investors' Review, Limited, issued a subpœna requiring him to attend and produce various books.

While he (counsel) was quite ready to deal with the merits, he first submitted that these proceedings were misconceived. This was an application "in an action," and, therefore, under Order LII., rule 2, no motion or application to show cause was to be made. The proper course was to apply to a Master in Chambers, from whom the case could go in the ordinary course to the Judge in Chambers. The subpœna issued out of the Central Office, not the Crown Office, and it could be dealt with only on the civil side of the Court, not on the Crown side.

The Court intimated that they would treat this as a preliminary objection going to jurisdiction, and decide it before considering the merits.

Mr. Jowitt contended that the application was not "in an action." Sir Arthur Wheeler was not a party to the action, and if he had had the temerity to appear before the Master he would have been driven from the judgment seat.

Mr. St. John Field, following on the same side, said that it was impossible to frame a summons in Chambers which would be accepted by the Central Office.

Mr. Clement Davies, in reply, referred to Jacques v. Harrison (12 Q.B.D., 136 ; and, in the Court of Appeal, 165), where strangers were allowed to intervene "in an action" even after judgment. The application was made first in Chambers.

Sir Willes Chitty (who was requested by the Court to follow Mr. Clement Davies) said that the matter had nothing to do with the Crown Office, and ought never to have got near the Crown Paper. The subpœna issued from the Central Office, and if it were to come before the Court at all, it should have been in the Civil Paper. But, in whichever paper it was, it should have been by motion on notice (assuming a motion was right at all). The rule abolishing rules nisi in an action was to save the costs of two hearings. If this was not a proceeding in an action it was difficult to know what it was. It arose out of a subpœna issued in an action by a party to the action to attend and give evidence in the action. It was a complete fallacy to say that a third party could not apply in an action. There were numerous cases, and, in particular, applications to set aside a subpœna had been made in Chambers.

The Lord Chief Justice (Lord Hewart), in giving judgment, said that the words of the rule nisi granted on June 25 were :—

"It is ordered that Monday, July 9 next, be peremptorily given to the defendants, the Investors' Review, Limited, to show cause why a certain writ of subpœna issued on behalf of the said defendants commanding the said Sir Arthur Wheeler to attend at the trial of a certain action, 1928, R. No. 115, in which Rolls Razor (1927), Limited, are the plaintiffs and the said Investors' Review, Limited, and the London Caledonian Press, Limited, are the defendants, to give evidence on behalf of the said defendants, the Investors' Review, Limited, and to produce at the trial aforesaid the documents set out in the said writ of subpœna, should not be set aside : Upon the grounds that the issue of the said writ was oppressive and an abuse of the process of the Court, Upon notice of this order to be given to the said defendants in the meantime."

That order nisi having been granted, it was now urged on behalf of the defendants that these proceedings were entirely misconceived. An objection, in the nature of a preliminary objection, was taken, and was taken at the first moment, because the proceedings on the previous occasion were, of course, ex parte. They said that this proceeding was governed by the Rules of the Supreme Court, and in particular by Order LII., r. 2, which was in these terms :—

"No motion or application for a rule nisi or order to show cause shall hereafter be made in any action or (a) to set aside, remit or enforce an award, or (b) for attachment, or (c) against a sheriff to pay money levied under an execution."

It was argued that the application with which the Court was now dealing was an application in an action. On the other hand, it was contended that, though it had reference to and was concerned with an action, yet it was not an application in an action. The distinction was evidently a fine one, and the question was on which side of the line the matter fell.

It was clear that this application was not made by either party to the action. It was made against the first defendants, but not by the plaintiffs. It was sought by a proposed witness in the action to set aside a subpœna issued in the action by a party to the action, under the title of the action, calling on him to give evidence in the action. Admittedly, if such an application had been made by a party to the action it would have been "in the action."

It was to be observed that Order LII., r. 2, said : "No motion or application for a rule nisi or order to show cause shall hereafter be made in any action"; it did not say "in any action by any party to the action"; the matter was left quite general. One looked, therefore, for some authority to show that the words "by any party" should be imported. There was no such authority, and the suggestion involved the application of a very familiar fallacy. No doubt in some of the cases the decision was based on the fact that the application was made by a party to the action; but no decision enumerated all the cases that could fall within Order LII., r. 2; still less could it be said that an application was not "in an action" because it was made on behalf of a proposed witness in the action. Nevertheless, Mr. Jowitt said that there could not be an application in an action except by a party to the action. But many applications were made by persons not parties to the action at all stages from the service of the writ to setting aside the judgment and execution.

The preliminary objection, he thought, should be upheld. The contrary contention depended on the introduction of words limiting the generality of the rule. It would be a limitation of a crucial and far-reaching character to read in the words "by any party to the action."

The attention of the Court had been directed to numerous cases in which a writ of attachment for contempt had been asked for. Not much illumination was to be derived from them in this case, because when one compared the Rules of the Supreme Court with the Rules of the Crown Office one found that special provision was made for those cases.

MR. JUSTICE ACTON and MR. JUSTICE BRANSON agreed.

VLASSOPOULOS v. BRITISH AND FOREIGN MARINE INSURANCE COMPANY, LIMITED.*

Insurance (Marine)—General average—Accident — Repairs — Items recoverable — York-Antwerp Rules, 1924.

The respondents insured the claimant's steamer by a policy providing that general average was to be adjusted according to the York-Antwerp Rules of 1924. The ship was chartered to go to Bordeaux to load for Cardiff, the charterparty also providing that average, if any, should be settled according to those Rules. During loading at Bordeaux the foremast broke, and damage was done to the ship. For the purpose of repair she was moved to another dock within the port and the shipowners incurred expenses as follows: (1) Wages and provisions of crew; (2) cost of handling and discharging cargo for the purpose of repairs; (3) cost of coal consumed in going in and out and keeping steam up; and (4) expense of towing in and out and mooring and port expenses, and cost of coal consumed in shifting the vessel. While staying at Bordeaux the ship was in no danger. On completion of repairs and loading she left for Cardiff, and while she was at sea she fouled some wreckage without any negligence of those on board her and though there was no immediate danger she was made unfit to encounter the ordinary perils of the sea, and the master put into Cherbourg, as a port of refuge, and had repairs effected. The expenses at Cherbourg were similar to those at Bordeaux. On a case stated by an arbitrator,

Held, (1) that the cost of repairs in each case was recoverable as particular average; (2) that the other expenses at Bordeaux could not be claimed as general average, since no danger was in operation there; and (3) that the other expenses at Cherbourg could be claimed as general average since, though there was no immediate danger, the vessel was not fit, without repair, to encounter the perils of the sea.

This was an award stated as a special case for the purpose of obtaining the opinion of the Court on the question whether certain expenses incurred by a shipowner were properly described as general average.

Sir Robert Aske appeared for the shipowner; Mr. G. P. Langton, K.C., and Mr. F. M. Vaughan for the underwriters.

SIR ROBERT ASKE, in opening, said that the question for decision was whether certain expenses were the subject of general average. There had been a difference of opinion among average adjusters and underwriters, and this was regarded as a test case. The items in dispute were:—

"(1) The wages and provisions of the crew of a vessel in a port for repairs; (2) the costs of handling and discharging cargo in the repairing port for the purpose of executing the repairs; (3) the cost of coal consumed in going in and out of the repairing port and keeping steam up there; and (4) the expense of towing in and out of the port, and the mooring and port expenses there, and the cost of coal consumed in shifting the vessel."

By a policy dated December 27, 1926, the respondents insured the hull and machinery of the Makis, a steamer belonging to the claimant. By the policy general average was to be adjusted according to the York-Antwerp Rules of 1924. The Makis was chartered to go to Bordeaux to load pitwood for Cardiff, and the charterparty also provided that average, if any, should be settled according to the York-Antwerp Rules, 1924.

The Makis went to Bordeaux and began to load, but on January 10, 1927, while loading was proceeding, the foremast broke and certain damage was done to the vessel. For the purpose of repair the Makis was moved to another dock within the port of Bordeaux, and repairs were executed to enable the adventure on which the ship, cargo, and freight were engaged to be safely completed. While staying at Bordeaux the Makis was at no time in danger. For the purpose of executing the repairs some of the cargo had to be shifted on board and some of it had to be landed. During the time occupied by the repairs expenses were incurred by the shipowners for (a) repairs, (b) wages and provisions of crew, (c) coal consumed in shifting into and out of dock and keeping up steam in dock, (d) towage, boatmen, mooring and unmooring, (e) handling cargo on board,

* Reported by W. B. THOMPSON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

(f) discharging cargo, (g) surveyor's fees and incidentals.

The repairs were completed on January 22, 1927, and loading was completed and the Makis left for Cardiff on January 28, 1927.

On January 29, 1927, while the Makis was at sea, her propeller fouled some wreckage without any negligence of those on board her, and was rendered unfit to encounter the ordinary perils of the sea. In consequence thereof the master put into Cherbourg on January 30, and had repairs effected there. The putting into Cherbourg was necessary for the common safety of the ship, cargo, and freight, and the repairs done there were necessary for the safe prosecution of the voyage, though from the time of fouling the wreckage until arrival at Cherbourg, and until the repairs there were completed, neither the Makis nor her cargo or freight was in any immediate danger. To effect the repairs at Cherbourg, part of the cargo had to be handled on board and part had to be discharged.

The expenses incurred at Cherbourg were similar to those incurred in effecting the repairs at Bordeaux. The repairs were completed on February 17, 1927, and the Makis arrived at Cardiff on February 20 and completed discharge on February 24.

The question raised by the case was whether the above expenses, other than for repairs and surveyor's fees, for which liability was admitted, could be claimed as general average on a true construction of the York-Antwerp Rules and the contract between the parties. The arbitrator had held that they could not.

Sir Robert Aske submitted that the York-Antwerp Rules, 1924, did not correspond with the law of any country. He referred to Chalmers on Marine Insurance, 3rd edition, page 120 ; Arnould on Marine Insurance, section 983 ; and the Marine Insurance Act, 1906, section 66 ; he submitted that the general principles of average were stated in the lettered Rules A to G, and then particular cases were dealt with in the numbered rules which followed. The handling on board and the discharge of cargo at Bordeaux and Cherbourg in this case were directly covered by Rule X (b). That rule provided that:—

"The cost of handling on board or discharging cargo fuel or stores, whether at a port or place of loading call or refuge shall be admitted as general average when the handling or discharge was necessary for the common safety or to enable damage to the ship caused by sacrifice or accident to be repaired if the repairs were necessary for the safe prosecution of the voyage."

The item of wages of the crew was dealt with by Rule XI., and was referred to in Carver on Carriage by Sea, section 405. Counsel submitted that the wages both at Bordeaux and at Cherbourg were payable under the Rule.

Coal consumed while under repair was covered by Rule XX. ; and the cost of towage, boatmen, and coal consumed in shifting were covered by Rule X. (a) so far as related to Cherbourg ; but as to shifting from one dock to another at Bordeaux, he could not say that it was covered. Port expenses at Cherbourg might be covered by the words "the expenses of entering such port" in Rule X. (a), but in any case they must come within the general Rules A or C.

Mr. Langton submitted that the rules must be construed as if they were written in and formed part of the contract, and the clauses must be taken as a whole. Taken literally, Rule X. was to some extent in conflict with Rule A and Rule C, and must be limited so as to come within the general principles "when and only when" in A, and "direct consequences" in C. The fall of the mast at Bordeaux did not put either ship or cargo in peril, and general average only arose in a time of danger. (Svendsen v. Wallace (13 Q.B.D., 69, at p. 84)).

Where there was any ambiguity in the Rules the ordinary English law must be applied. The two casualties here were not on the same basis. So far as regarded the Cherbourg casualty, he could only contend that it was not a case of general average because there was no "peril" within Rule A and no "direct consequence" within Rule C. There was an apprehension of peril, but no existing peril—Joseph Watson and Son, Limited v. Firemen's Fund Insurance Company of San Francisco (38 The Times L.R., 752 ; [1922] 2 K.B., 355).

As to the Bordeaux case, the Rules were never meant to apply to an accident which happened before the ship started from her port of loading. That was obvious from Rule XI. He referred to Scrutton on Charterparties, 12th edition, Appendix 5, rule 11.

Sir Robert Aske replied.—The York-Antwerp Rules, 1924, came into existence that general average might be taken out of the ordinary law of England and of any other country, but the underwriters' case here depended on the application of principles of English law. General average could arise as well at the port of loading as at any other point on the voyage.

Mr. Justice Roche, in giving judgment, said that the case raised points of interest and of some novelty under the York-Antwerp Rules, 1924. He stated the facts and said that Cherbourg, in this case, was a port of refuge. The cost of repairs in each case was recoverable as particular average ; he was not concerned with the question whether other of these items also were recoverable as particular average. He only had to say whether the arbitrator was right in holding that none of them were general average items.

The Rules of 1924 constituted a new departure. They began with certain general principles under letters and were followed by numbered Rules. The underwriters contended that, with regard to Cherbourg, the circumstances did not come within the principles in Rules A and C. In his view, the true construction of the contract was that the parties intended the Rules to bind them to the exclusion of any law of this or any other country, and Rules X. and XI. must be read with A and C. The intention of the Rules was to state the general principles and then to deal with specific items, not merely as illustrations but to say "and in particular" as provided in the numbered Rules.

So far as the expenses at Cherbourg were concerned, he held that they fell within either Rule X. (a), Rule X. (b), or Rule XI., and were also within A and C. The finding that the Makis was not in "immediate" danger at Cherbourg did not affect the position, for the arbitrator had already found that she was not fit to encounter the perils of the sea, and there was no need for the peril to be "immediate."

With regard to the expenses at Bordeaux, he held that none of the disputed items were within Rules X., XI., or XX. The claimant really relied on the second part of Rule X. (b), dealing with damage "by accident," but the accident there must, he thought, be one which put either the ship or the adventure in danger. To let in repair of accidental damage where there was no danger in operation would be contrary to the spirit of the Rules. Those expenses were not within Rule A or Rule X. (b).

The award would, therefore, be varied accordingly.

Prob., Divorce, and Adm. Div. (Lord Merrivale, P.) } 1928. July 16.

SHERWOOD v. SHERWOOD.*

Divorce—Decree absolute for wife—Permanent maintenance—Husband's disposable income—Calculation of tax.

In estimating the disposable income of a divorced husband in order to ascertain the amount of permanent maintenance to be paid to his former wife, deductions in respect of income-tax and supertax, allowable from his gross income, are the normal amount of such taxes chargeable against him. An abnormal income-tax charge made in a particular year in respect of much greater earnings in a previous period cannot be deducted from the gross income for the purpose of calculating the disposable income in futuro.

Dayrell-Steyning v. Dayrell-Steyning (38 The Times L.R., 898 ; [1922] P. 280) explained.

On July 29, 1927, the wife in this case was granted a decree nisi for the dissolution of her marriage on the ground of the husband's adultery. There were two children of the marriage, sons, born in June, 1915, and November, 1916, respectively, the custody of whom was granted to the petitioner. She was granted alimony pendente lite at the rate of £2,000 a year, and on December 14, 1927, presented a petition for permanent maintenance, in which she alleged that the respondent derived an income of £15,000 a year from his practice in curative processes, in addition to income from investments and the possession of certain other property. By his answer the respondent said that he had a net income of £6,153 10s. in 1925, £3,959 2s. in 1926, and £1,258 6s. in 1927 ; his income from investments was £1,090. By her reply the petitioner said that in 1923 the respondent made about £20,000, in 1924 over £19,000, and in 1925 nearly £14,000. The reason for the diminution in income was the respondent's illness, from which he had recovered.

The decree nisi was made absolute on February 20, 1928, and on May 25, 1928, the registrar made an order awarding the petitioner £600 a year free of tax, as maintenance for the joint lives of the parties, of which £400 a year, free of tax, was to be secured for her life on securities to be agreed. The registrar also ordered the respondent to pay to the petitioner £150 a year, free of tax, for the maintenance of each of the two children. The registrar gave his reasons for this award as follows : He found that the respondent's net income for 1927, derived from fees and from investments, after discharging tax and supertax and paying £400 as premium on an accident insurance policy, was £1,900. The petitioner had about £107 a year of her own. The respondent's gross income for 1927 was £7,500. The registrar explained in his report that, following Dayrell-Steyning v. Dayrell-Steyning (38 The Times L.R., 898 ; [1922] P. 280), he had allotted maintenance at the rate of one-third of the disposable amount of income which remained in the respondent's hands after paying the expenses of earning it. The petitioner took out a summons to vary the order of the registrar, and after hearing arguments in chambers Lord Merrivale adjourned the summons into court.

Mr. Noel Middleton appeared for the petitioner ; Mr. Cotes-Preedy, K.C., and Mr. Bush James were for the respondent.

LORD MERRIVALE, after detailing the facts above summarized, said that the questions were what was the maintenance proper to be ordered under the statute for the petitioner during the joint lives of her and her former husband, how much of that should be secured, and whether some provision should be made for the successful petitioner if she survived the respondent. It was the rule not to allot a sum to the petitioner out of the income received by the respondent in the past but to order a provision for her for the future. In order to ascertain, as far as might be done, what would be the respondent's income when the order should come into operation, regard was had to the income which he had enjoyed, at any rate in recent years. When the potential income was ascertained, so far as was practicable, the normal course was to allot about one-third of the expected income of the respondent (when the wife's income was nil or negligible) to the petitioner.

The PRESIDENT continued:—A difficulty arose before the learned registrar as to figures concerning the earnings of the respondent in a series of years, and it was argued that he had become liable to pay out of a typical year's income a very heavy amount in income-tax and supertax. The parties debated before the learned registrar the effect of the direction which was given by the Court in the case of Dayrell-Steyning v. Dayrell-Steyning (38 The Times L.R., 898 ; [1922] P., 280), which was to the effect that, in apportioning maintenance to a wife upon the principles on which the Court acts, the amount should be apportioned out of the disposable income of the husband, after meeting his liability for taxes, and that amount should come to the wife under the same conditions of freedom from taxes as affected the residue which remained in the hands of the husband ; that is, that one should not be paying a greater sum of tax out of a notional amount of income and providing the other with a disproportionate income, tax free. Dayrell-Steyning v. Dayrell-Steyning (supra) had no other effect than that, and I do not think the language in which the judgment in that case is expressed is reasonably capable of any other interpretation than that. It was said by reason of some possible construction of that direction that the position of the respondent here was exceptional in this way. He had a very large income in normal years, derived from exertions which required personal skill on his part, and a high degree of confidence on the part of the persons who put themselves in his hands for treatment. He was not a registered medical practitioner, but he was a practitioner in curative processes, and obviously his personal skill and the confidence that he inspired were material factors. It was also material that he should be in good health. By reason of ill-health his earning capacity ceased during a substantial time, and, no doubt, he was left with the prospect of relying to a very considerable extent upon the resources which he had saved and accumulated. He had at that time accumulated funds which, at any rate at the face value of the investments, represented a sum of between £30,000 and £40,000, but that had been a good deal reduced. In the years before 1926 the respondent was earning an income which was assessed for taxation at £17,000 or £18,000 annually.

* Reported by WILLIAM LATEY, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

In 1926 that became greatly reduced, and the reduction continued during, at any rate, part of 1927. The income from earnings became little better than nominal as compared with the great earnings there had been. Then in 1927 the respondent's health improved, and it was agreed between the parties that he had quite recovered and was able to proceed to earn such an income as he had been accustomed to earn.

When the matter came before the learned registrar he had before him proof which he accepted, and about which the parties had not cavilled, that the taxable income of the respondent for the year 1927 would not be less than £7,500. That represented such earnings as he was able to make during that year and such income as he derived from investments. There was the one side of the account for the purpose of determining upon what basis the wife's maintenance in future should be computed. In the year 1927 the respondent was liable for income-tax and supertax to the amount of between £5,000 and £6,000, and acute conflict arose between the parties whether, basing the income for the calculation in future upon the earnings and income from investments for the year 1927, the registrar ought to deduct from the total income the amount payable by the respondent in that year in respect of income-tax and supertax. In view of the fact that it had to be determined what maintenance should be provided in future for the wife until further order it seems a startling proposition, but the husband's representatives contended before the registrar and before me that the income out of which the wife's maintenance was to be awarded was the residue of income remaining in 1927-28, after payment, or provision for payment, of the King's taxes which fell due in respect of that year, which left, of course, in that year a very small amount of total net income, something like £1,900.

It was argued for the wife that the calculation which is here made is a calculation which is to have future effect in determining what should be hereafter the maintenance allotted to the wife out of the income which is hereafter capable of being earned or is securable by the husband out of his investments. Before the registrar the respondent's contention prevailed, and the respondent, who had had past earnings at the rate of £15,000 to £20,000 a year, and had a prospect of having as good earnings for the future, was held to discharge his obligation towards the wife if he were ordered to pay her an income for the joint lives at the rate of £600 a year—a little less than a third of the residue of his normal income for 1927—and to secure £400 of that sum. Provision was made for each of the children at the rate of £150 per annum.

The question is whether the direction of the Court in Dayrell-Steyning v. Dayrell-Steyning (supra) properly has this result. That direction was that, for the purpose of computing the husband's income, a proportion of which, under the practice of the Court, would go to the wife, the husband's income should be regarded as the disposable amount which remains in his hands after he has provided the necessary expenses for earnings, including income-tax and supertax (at that time it included also excess profits duty). I cannot conceive that that direction can be supposed to have this startling result. The question here is what the husband is able to provide out of his earnings and income in future years for his wife by way of maintenance. How it affects that problem, that in a past year the husband, by reason of great earnings in years previously to that, should have been liable for income-tax which left him a small margin only out of his income in that year, I fail to understand.

It seems to me clear that a mistake has been made, and that the wife is entitled to an allotment of income out of such income as the respondent may be confidently expected to receive from year to year. Nobody professes to put that amount at less than £7,500 gross, i.e., from investments and earnings. The question is, what allowance in respect of that is proper to be made by reason of the husband's obligation to meet taxes as they fall due from year to year. As far as one can see the taxes which fall due in this year, and which seem likely to fall due in coming years, do not amount to more than something under £2,200. That is the sum which must be deducted from the total income so that what may be apportioned shall be the disposable amount remaining in the husband's hands, or the balance of the £7,500 after providing for the taxes from year to year. The sum which is left is the sum of £5,300 a year. Assuming in favour of the husband that the provision for the maintenance of the children is a liability which ought to be taken into account, this leaves an income of £5,000 a year net after providing for taxes. If you take into account an income which it was said by the wife is derived from property, you still have a substantial sum in excess of £4,800 a year, and it seems to me that, applying the ordinary principles which are applied by the Court, the amount to be allotted to the wife should be a sum during the joint lives of £1,600 a year until further order.

As to the amount secured, that depends upon the property in the way of investments or otherwise. Some evidence was given before me on that matter, but it was shown that, notwithstanding changes in investments in recent times, there is still a capital value realizable in the market at the present time of very nearly £22,000, representing an income of nearer £1,100 than £1,000 a year. I see no hardship in confirming the order that there should be secured to the wife for her life the maintenance which the learned registrar's order provided, that is, maintenance at the rate of £400 a year. Looking at the matter as a whole, I do not see any reason for disturbing the terms of the order which provides for the maintenance for the time being of the children. The variation that I make in the order is to substitute for the allotted sum of £600 a year for their joint lives the amount of £1,600 a year, of which £400 will be secured to the wife for life.

On the application of counsel for the respondent leave was given to appeal on security being given for the petitioner's costs of appeal in any event.

REX v. JUSTICES OF THE COUNTY OF LONDON—EX PARTE LOCKE, LANCASTER AND W. W. AND R. JOHNSON AND SONS, LIMITED, AND OTHERS.*

Rating—Metropolis—Quinquennial valuation—Appeal to quarter sessions—Congestion of business—Impossibility of hearing before date fixed by statute—Parties not ready—Discretion of quarter sessions to adjourn hearing —Valuation (Metropolis) Act, 1869 (32 and 33 Vict., c. 67), s. 42 (13).

By s. 42 (13) of the Valuation (Metropolis) Act, 1869, "The justices may hold the assessment sessions at any time after the 1st of February in the same year, which will enable them to determine all appeals (except where a valuation list or a valuation is ordered) before the ensuing 31st March."

Held, that when it is impossible for the justices to dispose of their list by March 31 they have jurisdiction after that date to hear an appeal of which notice was given at the proper time, and, if the parties are not ready for trial as soon as the justices are able to hear the appeal, the justices have a discretion to postpone the hearing so that they may have proper materials before them.

This was a rule nisi for a certiorari to bring up and quash a decision of the County of London Quarter Sessions, given on February 15, 1928, in an appeal by the Port of London Authority against the quinquennial valuation list of 1925 of the Poplar Assessment Committee in respect of the valuation of the Port of London Authority's docks in Poplar. The result of the appeal by the Port of London Authority was the reduction of the gross value from £310,580 to £130,000, and of the rateable value from £114,576 to £30,000, subject to a case being stated for the opinion of the Court. The main ground on which the rule was granted was that the decision of Quarter Sessions was given after March 31, 1926, contrary to the provisions of section 42 (13) of the Valuation (Metropolis) Act, 1869; or, alternatively, that if Quarter Sessions were entitled to hear quinquennial appeals after March 31 in the year in which such appeals were heard they could only do so where pressure of work involved that happening, and that, in the present case, adjournments of the hearing till 1928 were due entirely to arrangements made for the convenience of the parties to the appeal.

The rule was obtained at the instance of Messrs. Locke, Lancaster and W. W. and R. Johnson and Sons, Limited, Messrs. Hawkins and Tipton, Limited, and Mr. George James Loosemore, ratepayers of the Borough of Poplar. The following facts appeared from the affidavit filed on their behalf:—

(a) In the quinquennial valuation list made, signed, and deposited in 1925 by the Metropolitan Borough of Poplar, acting as Overseers of the Parish of Poplar, in accordance with the Valuation (Metropolis) Act, 1869, certain hereditaments occupied by the Port of London Authority in the parish were assessed at £310,580 gross and £114,576 rateable.

(b) The assessment committee of the Metropolitan Borough of Poplar, after hearing an objection to the list made by the Port of London Authority, affirmed the assessment and the list on or about December 3, 1925.

(c) On January 14, 1926, the Port of London Authority duly gave notice of appeal to the County of London Quarter Sessions.

(d) The appeal was duly entered, and the assessment committee gave notice of their intention to appear as respondents.

(e) On March 23, 1926, counsel for the appellants moved that the appeal should stand out of the list sine die. By consent, the motion was allowed.

(f) Thereafter, by agreement between the parties, the hearing was postponed, and in November, 1927, was still being postponed.

(g) In November, 1927, the parties discussed a date for the hearing, and on December 29, 1927, the Court purported to fix February 14 and 15, 1928.

(h) The delay in bringing on the hearing was entirely due to the action of the parties.

(j) On February 14 and 15, 1928, the Court purported to hear the appeal and reduced the assessment to £130,000 gross and £30,000 rateable.

The result would be that a sum of £124,797 would have to be repaid to the Port of London Authority (which had been paying rates on a rateable value of £90,000, the figure in the old valuation list) by the Borough Council of Poplar. That sum would have to be paid by the ratepayers and would involve a further rate of 3s. in the pound. The rates were already 24s. in the pound. Since 1926 a number of valuable hereditaments then rated had become and were still unoccupied and not rateable.

By section 42 of the Valuation (Metropolis) Act, 1869:—

"With respect to the times within which proceedings under this Act and the Acts incorporated herewith are to be done the following provisions shall have effect: that is to say. . . .

"(13) The justices may hold the assessment sessions at any time after the 1st of February in the same year, which will enable them to determine all appeals (except where a valuation list or a valuation is ordered) before the ensuing 31st March."

The Clerk to the County of London Quarter Sessions, in an affidavit, stated that Quarter Sessions, sitting as Assessment Sessions, did not sit in Quarter Sessions. Appeals were not entered for hearing at Quarter Sessions, and the Court had power under section 26 of the Valuation (Metropolis) Act, 1869, to adjourn from time to time. The limitations of time in the case of appeals to Quarter Sessions, as such, did not apply to appeals under that Act. Owing to the impossibility of hearing and determining all appeals by March 31, it had been the practice for many years not to force on the hearing of appeals where the investigation of facts and accounts of great length and complication were involved and the parties desired time for consideration. Even if the appeals were not settled, many questions of detail were agreed.

The present applicants had no locus standi before Quarter Sessions, and had no greater interest on which to found the application than all other ratepayers in the borough.

On numerous occasions the clerk, as he deposed, communicated with the solicitors to the parties with a view to fixing a date for the hearing. The Chairman accepted the reasons given as reasonable and proper for not putting the appeal in the list for hearing. The parties were in agreement as to the postponement, and the assessment committee would be estopped from taking the point now raised, but had supplied the applicants with particulars on which to base their application.

Ninety-nine appeals only were entered against the first valuation lists of 1870, over 3,000 against the 1920 list, and over 2,000 against the 1925 list, 36 of them from Poplar.

The provisions of the Act would be unworkable if the dates mentioned in it were held to be mandatory. It was impossible for all appeals to be heard before March 31. Under the Act they could not be heard before February 1, and Quarter Sessions had other business which had to be taken.

On March 23, 1926, this appeal, with others in which the Port of London Authority were appellants, relating to their hereditaments in other parishes, were ordered to stand over till the May sessions. On November 24, 1926, all the other appeals except the Poplar one were allowed by consent.

If £124,797 had to be repaid to the appellants they, as ratepayers, would have to bear their share of any increased rate. The delay had not prejudiced the applicants, for the net rateable value of the borough had increased by £2,935.

Mr. Whiteley, K.C., and Mr. E. H. Tindal Atkinson showed cause for the justices; Mr. Konstam, K.C., and Mr. E. H. Tindal Atkinson for the Port of London Authority; Mr. Scholefield, K.C., and Mr. H. A. Hill supported the rule. Mr. Sydney Turner and Mr. R. C. Lancaster attended on behalf of the Poplar Assessment Committee, but did not intervene in the argument.

Mr. WHITELEY said that Quarter Sessions were substituted for the old Assessment Sessions by the Local Government Act, 1888. The result was that, allowing for their other business, they had only about three weeks for hearing appeals before March 31. The Court of Appeal in Reg. v. London Justices (9 The Times L.R., 652; [1893] 2 Q.B., 476) held that the date was mandatory, subject to certain qualifications and practical limitations. If the delay were due to an extraordinary amount of business or other cause not within the control of the parties, the Court could hear the case at any time after March 31.

The LORD CHIEF JUSTICE observed that it was remarkable that there should have been no authority between 1893 and 1928.

Mr. KONSTAM submitted that when once it became impossible to hear all the appeals by March 31 the matter was at large, and the Court would not interfere with the discretion of Quarter Sessions.

He was stopped by the Court.

Mr. SCHOLEFIELD said that it was conceded that the scheme of the Act was to provide for the speedy disposal of appeals, and when one heard that this decision might involve an additional rate of 3s. in the pound one could realize the necessity for expedition. So far as the business of the Court was concerned, this case could have been heard a year or more before it was in fact heard.

The LORD CHIEF JUSTICE.—It is said against you that when once the statutory date is necessarily passed there is no further limitation.

Mr. SCHOLEFIELD.—My contention is that the jurisdiction extends so long as the necessity exists, and that means the necessity of the Court, not the wishes of the parties. Here the Court was urging the parties to fix a date for trial.

Mr. JUSTICE ACTON.—Surely the law must mean that there must be time for a proper and adequate trial by March 31, and if the parties say—and say reasonably—"We cannot be ready for trial by that date," is not that an impossibility in the sense of an impossibility of a proper trial?

Mr. SCHOLEFIELD.—I submit not. The power of adjournment in the Act is expressly limited to a date before March 31.

Mr. HILL followed, and contended that, inasmuch as the jurisdiction of Quarter Sessions was dependent on statute, its powers of adjournment were dependent on statute, and section 34 of the Valuation (Metropolis) Act, 1869, had cut down the general power of adjournment.

Mr. HILL submitted that the power of sessions to adjourn beyond March 31 depended on the application of the maxim Lex non cogit ad impossibilia, and, as soon as it became possible to hear, the jurisdiction to adjourn further was gone.

The LORD CHIEF JUSTICE.—"Possible to hear" must mean "possible to hear adequately."

The LORD CHIEF JUSTICE (Lord Hewart), in giving judgment, said that on January 14, 1926, notice of appeal was duly given by the Port of London Authority against the assessment of certain hereditaments in the quinquennial valuation of 1925. On February 1 the case for the appellants was lodged and on February 20 the case for the respondents was lodged. On March 23 the Court of Quarter Sessions allowed the appeal to stand over till May. On that date it was common ground that there was a number of appeals in the neighbourhood of 2,000 pending, of which over 400 were disposed of by March 31. The appeal of the Port of London Authority was disposed of on February 14 and 15, 1928, and the assessment was reduced subject to a case to be stated. It was in these circumstances that the applicants for the rule argued that the order so made in February, 1928, was ultra vires and void.

That contention was based on the provisions of section 42 (13) of the Valuation (Metropolis) Act, 1869, and other sections of that statute were referred to for the purpose of enforcing the argument that according to the scheme of the legislation these appeals were intended to be disposed of by March 31 of the year in which they arose. It was said that if delay occurred the sins of the fathers were not exactly visited on the children, but that at least the delay of the rating authorities resulted in unequal distribution of rates among ratepayers of different years. It was argued that only necessity could justify the postponement of the case beyond March 31. Much had been said upon the doctrine of necessity, but it was difficult to see how necessity was to work equally between those at the top and those at the bottom of the list.

Sortitur insignes et imos.

The matter had been considered in Reg. v. London Justices (9 The Times L.R., 652; [1893] 2 Q.B., 476), and it was significant that in 35 years there had been no subsequent decision. The Court was informed that the practice here complained of had been consistently followed during these 35 years. In that case Lord Esher, M.R., stated that the limitation was not "merely directory" and said at p. 488:—

"I think it is imperative; but I shall have presently to state what practical limitation or explanation I think can be put upon it; but I think it is a limitation of time enacted, and imperatively enacted, by the statute. . . . This Act must be read as all enactments are, subject to their not being made absurd by matters which never could have been within the calculation or consideration of the Legislature, and I think we must say that the Act is satisfied if the parties have entered their appeal within such a time as, according to the ordinary practice of the Court, would enable that particular case to be heard and determined by March 30, and that therefore the glut of business in the Court, and the inability of the Court to cope with it, is not to be brought into play against the parties, who, as far as they are concerned, have obeyed the imperative enactment of the statute by putting down their appeal at a time which would enable the Court, according to its ordinary course of practice, to hear and determine the case by March 30."

Similar language was used by Lord Justice Bowen and Lord Justice Kay. Indeed, while Lord Esher regarded the language as imperative, Lord Justice Bowen regarded it as having a midway position between imperative and directory, and Lord Justice Kay regarded it as directory only. But the judgment of Lord Esher might be taken as having settled the law.

In the present case it was common ground that these conditions were duly fulfilled. It was common ground that it was impossible for the Court to dispose of its list by March 31, and the Court had the uncontradicted evidence of the clerk to the Court of Quarter Sessions that

"The Court of Quarter Sessions did not allow time to pass by without seeking to bring the appeal to hearing, but was always ready and willing to hear the appeal. The Court from time to time had to consider and did consider the reasons for delay, and exercised its discretion in allowing postponements and ultimately fixing the date of hearing."

In his Lordship's opinion, when once the conditions prescribed by the Act were satisfied in the manner explained by Lord Esher, and a postponement of the hearing to a date beyond March 31 had taken place, it became a question for the discretion of Quarter Sessions to fix a date when the hearing was to take place. It seemed to him idle to suggest that some sort of hearing might have taken place before February, 1928. The hearing required was a proper hearing on proper materials, and when the Court had exercised its discretion in granting adjournments so that proper materials might be before it, the High Court could not embark on the insoluble problem whether, on each occasion, on the materials before it, the discretion of Quarter Sessions was exercised in an ideal manner.

In this case there was no ground for the suggestion that Quarter Sessions had no jurisdiction or that its order was void.

MR. JUSTICE ACTON and MR. JUSTICE BRANSON agreed.

House of Lords.
(Lord Buckmaster, Viscount Dunedin, Lord Phillimore, Lord Blanesburgh, and Lord Warrington of Clyffe.) 1928. July 18.

ENGELKE v. MUSMANN.*

International Law — Diplomatic privilege — Action to recover rent—Entry of appearance under protest—Plea of privilege by defendant —Consular secretary attached to German Embassy—Intervention of Attorney-General on behalf of Foreign Office.

In an action for arrears of rent due under a lease of a dwelling-house the defendant entered a conditional appearance under protest, and pleaded that being an official of the German Embassy he was protected by diplomatic privilege. It appeared that he was a "consular secretary" formerly working at the German Consulate, but that he had been transferred to the German Embassy. The Attorney-General upon the instructions of the Foreign Office appeared and informed the Court that the defendant was recognized by the Foreign Office as being on a list comprising the suite of the German Ambassador.

Held, that the statement of the Attorney-General on the instructions of the Foreign Office as to the status of a person claiming diplomatic privilege was conclusive.

Decision of the Court of Appeal (43 The Times L.R., 685 ; [1928] 1 K.B., 90) reversed.

This was an appeal from an order of the Court of Appeal (43 The Times L.R., 685 ; [1928] 1 K.B., 90) affirming, by a majority, an order of Mr. Justice Shearman, in Chambers, whereby an appeal from a refusal of the Master to order the appellant to be cross-examined on certain affidavits put in by him in support of a claim for immunity from civil process on the ground that he was in the service of the German Ambassador was allowed and the appellant was ordered to attend for cross-examination.

The questions raised by the appeal were (1) whether a statement by the Attorney-General on the instructions of the Foreign Office as to the status of a person claiming diplomatic privilege was conclusive ; and (2) whether, having regard to the materials available in the Courts below, the appellant, who claimed diplomatic immunity from civil process, should be ordered to be cross-examined in the Courts of this country on the affidavits in which his claim was preferred.

The facts sufficiently appear from the judgment of Lord Buckmaster.

Mr. Jowitt, K.C., Mr. Pritt, K.C., and Mr. W. T. Monckton appeared for the appellant ; Mr. Ritter for the respondent ; and the Attorney-General (Sir Thomas Inskip, K.C.) and Mr. Drucquer for the Attorney-General.

LORD BUCKMASTER.—My Lords, the privilege affording ambassadors and other accredited representatives of foreign countries immunity from all writs and processes is an ancient doctrine of the common law declared in terms by the Diplomatic Privileges Act, 1708 (7 Anne, c. 12).

No question is raised on this appeal affecting the existence or the extent of this protection. The sole point for determination is the method by which the status of any person who claims the benefit of this privilege is to be determined. For the appellant it is contended that the statement of the Attorney-General on the instructions of the Foreign Office is for this purpose conclusive, while the respondent asserts that any such dispute should be determined in the ordinary way according to the usual rules of evidence. The present appeal arises out of the following circumstances : On July 28, 1926, the respondent issued a writ in the King's Bench Division of the High Court claiming against the defendant rent alleged to be due under a lease dated August 18, 1924, and damages for breach of covenant. A conditional appearance was entered by the defendant and a summons was issued by him asking that the writ might be set aside on the ground that he had been a consular secretary on the staff of the German Embassy, London, since November 25, 1920, and had been notified as such to the British Foreign Office and that his name appeared in the Diplomatic List issued by the British Foreign Office. It is unnecessary to follow the varying fate of this application before the Master and the Judge for, pursuant to leave, another summons was issued by the appellant on October 26, 1926, asking the same relief as before. On this application, as on the former, the appellant filed an affidavit ; prolonged and fruitless proceedings in Chambers ensued until, finally, on March 4, 1927—eight months after the issue of the writ—Mr. Justice Shearman made an order that the appellant should attend for cross-examination on his affidavit, at the same time granting leave to appeal against his order. The appellant availed himself of this permission and appealed to the Court of Appeal, who, on June 23, 1927, confirmed the order of Mr. Justice Shearman, the Master of the Rolls dissenting, and from their judgment this appeal has been brought. In form, therefore, this appeal is against an order for cross-examination, but in substance the dispute is far more important.

On the first day of the hearing of the appeal the Attorney-General informed the Court on their invitation that the defendant "has been appointed as a member of the staff of the German Ambassador under the style of consular secretary and has been received in that capacity by the British Government. His name has been submitted to the Foreign Office by the Ambassador in the usual way, and his position as a member of the Embassy is, and has been since December, 1920, recognized without reservation or condition of any sort. He has been engaged, during the last 12 months at any rate, as a member of the staff of the commercial division of the Embassy. As such he has been obliged to take part from time to time in the general work of the Embassy staff, and particularly as regards the ciphering and deciphering of telegrams, that is, telegrams between the German Ambassador and his Government. He is responsible in all that he does to the German Ambassador." He further added that he had himself communicated with the Foreign Office, had ascertained and accepted and was able to say that he was satisfied that the information was correct as to the defendant's position at all relevant dates. If this statement as to status be accepted, no question arises upon the construction of the statute ; the defendant would then be entitled to the benefit of the privilege that he invokes. Lord Justice Scrutton, with whom Lord Justice Sargant agreed, felt himself unable to accept this statement as binding ; to do so would, in his opinion, be contrary to principle and unsupported by authority. I find myself unable to agree with this conclusion.

So far as the question of principle is concerned, the case decided in this House of Duff Development Company v. Government of Kelantan (40 The Times L.R., 566 ; [1924] A.C., 797) is a clear authority that the method of proving status either of sovereigns, or of the ambassadors who are their representatives, is by the very method that is challenged in the present case. The statute, however, draws no distinction between the ambassador and what, in the language of the Act of Parliament, is described as the "domestic or domestic servant of any such ambassador," and it seems difficult to understand, when the principle is admitted in regard to the one, that it should not apply in relation to the other ; for the privilege is the same in each case. With regard to the sovereignty of a particular State and whether or not a particular person is a sovereign ruler, the case referred to makes the general principle plain. As Lord Finlay said, at page 813 :—

"It has long been settled on any question of the status of any foreign power, the proper course is that the Court should apply to His Majesty's Government, and that in any such matter it is bound to act on the information given to them through the proper department. Such information is not in the nature of evidence ; it is a statement by the Sovereign of this country through one of his Ministers upon a matter which is peculiarly within his cognizance."

Lord Dunedin expressed the same opinion in these words, at page 820 :—

"It seems to me that once you trace the doctrine for the freedom of a foreign sovereign from interference by the Courts of other nations to comity, you necessarily concede that the home sovereign has in him the only power and right of recognition."

Now the acceptance and recognition of persons who form the staff of an ambassador are matters which, having regard to the practice in the conduct of foreign affairs, are equally based on the comity of nations and necessarily also within the cognizance of the Crown acting through the Foreign Office. They are in a position to know what are the duties performed and the persons who perform them, and it is plain that, though they trust the list put forward if it appears from their knowledge to be a list which might reasonably be accepted, yet the list itself is scrutinized, inquiries are made and, if necessary, persons are removed for sufficient reasons. That some such practice is contemplated under the Act itself is plain from the section which provides that no person shall be proceeded against for the arrest of a servant of the ambassador unless his name shall have been registered in the office of one of the principal Secretaries of State and transmitted to the Sheriffs of London and Middlesex, who are to hang the list up in some public place. This, of course, is a negative provision and does not show that the list should be accepted as evidence ; but it does contemplate the preparation of a list of persons for whom immunity is claimed and its publication in the manner therein provided. The list is not conclusive, nor is it the list itself on which reliance is to be placed, but on the statement of the Crown, speaking through the Attorney-General, that a particular person at the critical moment is qualified to be upon the list. When this statement has been made it is difficult to see how it can be questioned without the introduction of proceedings which in the person of the ambassador himself, and equally of his wife and family and staff, it would obviously be undesirable to institute.

But apart from the question of principle, it appears to me that there is valuable information to be found in the authorities. In the case of Crosse v. Talbot (8 Mod. Rep., 288) a question arose whether a particular person was on the staff of the Duke of Holstein's Resident here, and a certificate was produced that he was the valet de chambre of such Resident at certain wages. The Court, however, held that he appeared to be a mere nominal servant and that he consequently was not within the privilege, but the certificate of the Resident as to what his status actually was does not appear to have been challenged. In cases like Seacomb v. Bowlney (1 Wilson, 20), and Triquet v. Bath (3 Burr., 1478), the dispute was, in fact, tried upon affidavit and the only questions determined were whether these affidavits showed that the status was adequate to secure the protection. The latter case is interesting because it explains the origin of the passing of the statute of Anne. In Heathfield v. Chilton (4 Burr., 2015), the dispute was as to whether the person in whose service the defendant, who had been arrested was, was himself within the privilege. Lord Mansfield there said: "The application is not by the Attorney-General. . . That indeed would have shown that the Crown thought this person entitled to the character of a public minister. It now remains uncertain what his proper character is." Lord Mansfield also added that the registration of a particular person's name in the Secretary of State's office was not a condition precedent to his right of protection. In the case of Fisher v. Begrez (1 Cr. and M., 117), the question was whether a chorister was within the protection, and it was there held that the certificate itself was not a sufficient authority that the defendant was, as a chorister, a domestic servant, and therefore privileged.

Beyond this, the earlier cases throw little light upon the question, and this is possibly due to the fact that in all those cases, the defendant being the subject of arrest, application was immediately made on affidavit for his release ; and that the matter could be tried by affidavit, if no intervention took place and if the defendant so liked, is not in dispute. The later cases are more instructive.

In Macartney v. Garbutt (6 The Times L.R., 214; 24 Q.B.D., 368) a question arose whether a British subject accredited to Great Britain by a foreign government as a member of its Embassy was liable to distress on the furniture of his house for rent. Such distress had been levied and had been paid out by the plaintiff, who brought an action to recover back the sum. In the course of his judgment, Mr. Justice Mathew said that the plaintiff was an English subject, had been appointed by the Chinese Government English secretary to the Chinese Embassy, and had been received in that capacity by the British Government ; his name had been submitted to the Foreign Office in the usual way, and his position as a member of the Embassy recognized without reservation or condition of any sort. He would, therefore, seem to be clearly entitled to the privileges of the Corps Diplomatique. The importance of this statement is that the learned Judge bases his judgment upon the reception of the person as Secretary by the British Government, the submission of his name to the Foreign Office and his recognition by them. Now those circumstances could only be proved either by a person speaking on behalf of the Crown, as representing the Foreign Office, or by such person giving evidence and being subject to cross-examination, but, as soon as the matter is based upon the reception and recognition by the Foreign Office, it seems impossible to suggest a reason why such recognition should be good in the case of the Ambassador and bad in the case of his staff.

In the case of The Parlement Belge (5 P.D., 197) there is a very important statement by Lord Justice James. Lord Justice Brett appears to have doubted whether the recognition of an ambassador by the Crown could be accepted if the person in question had not, in fact, been sent as an ambassador, but Lord Justice James states (at p. 199) that that question is outside the authority of any municipal court, and adds: "I apprehend that we should be bound to act on the representation of the Foreign Office." And, in In re Suarez (34 The Times L.R., 127 ; [1918] 1 Ch., 176), it was decided in the Court of Appeal that a letter from the Foreign Office under the hand of an Assistant Secretary of State, stating that a Minister's name has been removed from the diplomatic list, is sufficient evidence that he had ceased to hold diplomatic office at the date of the letter.

It is, of course, obvious that the privilege claimed has serious results, as it excludes from their remedies in the Courts the persons with whom members of the ambassador's staff may have incurred obligations, and it is possible that it is open to abuse. It is of the essence of all privilege that it may be abused, but that question has nothing to do with the matter which we are called upon to decide ; the merits of the dispute out of which this question has arisen are in no way before us for consideration. The privilege itself depends upon maintaining the obligations of international law and the comity of nations. It would, indeed, be unfortunate if, after recognition had been afforded by His Majesty through the Foreign Office to persons as holding on the ambassadorial staff posts which entitled them to the privilege and after a statement as to their position had been afforded on behalf of the Crown through the Attorney-General, it was to be disregarded by the judiciary ; for, in such circumstances, the ensuing contest could not possibly enure to the public good.

Viscount Dunedin.—My Lords, I entirely concur with what has been said by the noble and learned lord on the Woolsack as to the unfortunate way in which this case was begun. Had the question remained merely as to whether the cross-examination was permissible upon an affidavit in which the appellant set forth his own status, I should have been of opinion with the Court below. But, in truth, the whole case was altered funditus when the Attorney-General intervened.

The respondent tried to convince us that, if this case was decided in favour of the appellant, it was opening the door to the granting of diplomatic privilege to the Consular Service. It is nothing of the sort. Mr. Engelke will enjoy diplomatic privilege not because he is styled Consular Secretary, but because he, as an accredited member of the Ambassador's household, has privilege as such and does not forfeit it because he does some consular work. In the case of Duff Development Co. v. Kelantan Government (40 The Times L.R., 566 ; [1924] A.C. 797), in this House it was pointed out that the acknowledgment of diplomatic privilege entitling to immunity from being sued in the tribunals of this country rests on comity, and that the Statute of Anne does no more than confirm the Common Law and annex certain penalties to those who transgress it. Mr. Engelke is, in the words of the statute, "a domestic of the Ambassador." In the Oxford Dictionary "domestic" as a substantive is defined as "a member of the household, one who dwells in the house, an inmate" ; and there is a quotation of 1656, "from that time he had his accesses to His Majesty's person as a domestique without ceremony." To prove that he is so rests on the fact that it has been brought to the notice of the Court through the Attorney-General, as the mouthpiece of the Foreign Office, that Mr. Engelke was presented to the Foreign Office as belonging to the personal staff of the Ambassador in the list supplied by him to the Foreign Office and accepted as such by the Foreign Office. In such a case the comment which I made in Duff's case (supra), and which I think was quoted by the Master of the Rolls, seems to me directly in point. The Attorney-General, in his very careful statement, shows that the acceptance of the list is no matter of necessity, but that it is subjected to careful scrutiny. This seems to me to obviate the possibility of abuse, or of such an extension of privilege as the inclusion of the whole consular service. The judgment of the Court of Appeal should be reversed and a declaration made that the appellant is entitled to diplomatic privilege.

Lord Phillimore.—My Lords, The plaintiff in this case brought an action claiming certain relief against the defendant in respect of the lease of a house. The defendant, who claims diplomatic privilege as one of the staff of the German Embassy, entered a conditional appearance and took out a summons for an order that the writ be set aside. In support of this summons he filed an affidavit by his solicitor, speaking partly to the deponent's own knowledge, but mainly upon information and belief. This affidavit was rejected, perhaps unfortunately, by Mr. Justice Talbot as being insufficient even to raise the point. Thereupon, the defendant filed his own affidavit, and then a further affidavit on his own behalf, and the plaintiff being minded to contest the accuracy of the statements contained in these affidavits applied to cross-examine the defendant upon them. The defendant, upon the instructions of the Ambassador declined to submit himself to cross-examination and after the matter had been to and fro in a not very edifying series of applications to Master and Judge it came before the Court of Apeal.

Before that Court the Attorney-General appeared, instructed by the Foreign Office, to give certain information as to the status of the defendant, and after he had given that information, the Court nevertheless, by a majority, affirmed the decision of the Judge at Chambers directing that the defendant should attend for the purpose of cross-examination. It is from this order of the Court of Appeal that the appeal has now been brought to your Lordships' House.

The description which the defendant gave of himself and which has been given of him by the Foreign Office is, that he is a consular secretary on the staff of the German Ambassador, and the argument for the plaintiff rested on the expression "consular" with a suggestion that an attempt was being made to get diplomatic privileges for a person who was not truly diplomatic but only in the consular service. For reasons which will appear in the course of this opinion, it is not necessary to go very deeply into this point, but I may observe that the positions of diplomat and consular employé are not mutually exclusive, and that indeed it has been in the past not uncommon to clothe a consul or consul-general with certain diplomatic functions and thereby to give him a diplomatic status. But the question before your Lordships turns on other matters.

If this case now turned upon the question whether the defendant should be cross-examined upon his affidavit or not, it may be that the result would be unfavourable to him. Where an application is made to stop a suit in limine and the application rests upon a disputed matter of fact, it would be right that the evidence should be scrutinized. On the other hand, where an applicant is claiming that he is privileged from litigation it seems a strange result if he is forced to litigate in order to obtain his exemption from litigation.

But as the defendant is now content to rely solely upon the certificate of the Foreign Office delivered to the Court by the Attorney-General, it is unnecessary to consider the question of cross-examination.

The objection taken on behalf of the plaintiff to the reception of this certificate and the criticism of its weight seem to me to rest upon misapprehensions as to the nature of diplomatic privilege.

By international law, which is part of the common law of this country, an Ambassador, by which term I intend to include diplomatic agents of all sorts—the stately Ambassador, in the restricted sense of the word, the special envoy, the resident Minister, and the Chargé d'Affaires—is sent by the one country and received by the other upon the terms that he has among his other diplomatic privileges immunity from legal process in the Courts of the country which receives him. The reasons for this immunity are well expressed in Magdalena Steam Navigation Co. v. Martin (2 El. and El., 94).

This immunity, being accorded to him in order that he may transact his Sovereign's business, is a privilege which he cannot waive unless under direction from his Sovereign.

The Ambassador further requires, in order that he may effectually do his Sovereign's business, that there should be a like immunity for his personal family, that is to say, his wife and his children, if living with him, his diplomatic family, as it is sometimes called, that is to say, his counsellors, secretaries and clerks, whom I take to be intended by the word "domestic" in the Statute of Anne, and his ordinary servants, described in the statute as "domestic servants," with a possible reservation in the case of domestic servants who are nationals of the receiving country. The privilege of all these persons is a derived privilege, created for the benefit of the Ambassador, and may be waived by him, but should, unless waived, be taken by them for the Ambassador's benefit.

But just as the receiving State may intimate that a proposed Ambassador will not be agreeable to it, and will be refused, so if the Ambassador tenders a person as a domestic or domestic servant, the receiving State may refuse to accept and recognize the man as such, and when the person tendered is a subject of the receiving country, conditions may be made. In old days, a resident Minister or Chargé d'Affaires was not infrequently a subject of the receiving country, distinguished from an envoy who, as the derivation of the word shows, would be sent from the one country to the other. I take it that in living memory our business at the Court of the ruler of Afghanistan was conducted on this footing. But generally now, the Ambassador is a subject of the sending and not of the receiving country, and is therefore said to be extra-territorial. But his domestic servants, or some of them, will almost certainly be subjects of the receiving country, and in certain cases some members of the staff may be drawn from the receiving country. The case of Macartney v. Garbutt (6 The Times L.R., 214; 24 Q.B.D., 368) affords such an instance. Sir Halliday Macartney was appointed English secretary to the Chinese Legation and, as the case narrates, his appointment was communicated to and accepted by the Foreign Office without conditions, though, as he was a British subject, it might have been made subject to the condition that no privilege was claimed for him. The Siamese Legation has had, to my knowledge, similar English secretaries, but whether they were accepted by the Foreign Office conditionally or unconditionally I know not.

When we come to the ordinary domestic servant, it may well be that, if he be a British subject, the Foreign Office may intimate that they cannot accept him so as to give him privilege. But according to English law (which may in respect of the domestic servant who is a national go somewhat beyond general international law), when once the man is tendered as a domestic or as a domestic servant, and the tender is accepted, the status is created and the privilege attaches.

When therefore the certificate from the Foreign Office was delivered by the Attorney-General, it was not, as suggested on behalf of the plaintiff, a piece of hearsay evidence, a mere narrative of what the Ambassador had told the Foreign Office. It was a statement of what the Secretary of State, on behalf of His Majesty, had done, not what he was doing ad hoc, or what he was believing and repeating, but what the Foreign Office had done. The certificate is no attempt on the part of the Executive to interfere with the Judiciary of the country. The status which gives the privilege has been already created by the Crown in virtue of its prerogative in order to administer its relations with a foreign country in accordance with international law.

For the plaintiff, reliance was not unnaturally placed upon a number of cases, principally in the 18th century, where privilege was asserted by an application to discharge the defendant, supported by an affidavit of the facts, whether made by or on behalf of the defendant ; and it was submitted that this was the only way in which the status (except in the case of the actual Ambassador) could be proved, with a further submission that the proper consequence would be that the deponent might be cross-examined. It would seem that the privilege might be claimed and proved in this manner, but there were reasons for this procedure which no longer exist, and there are objections to it in principle which seem to me to make it a less desirable course.

In these 18th century cases, the defendant seems always to have been a British subject. I should gather that in most of them he was not on the Sheriff's list, and I would insist upon this, not because of the direct importance of the list, but because he would have been on the list if he had been made known to the Foreign Office, and accepted as one of the Ambassador's retinue, and it follows, therefore, that he never had been tendered and accepted, and was reduced to proving his privilege in fact by showing his service.

My next observation would be that, according to the procedure of those days, process was initiated by arrest of the person, and that a defendant had perforce to submit so far to the jurisdiction as to procure his release by giving bail. Further, I would observe that counsel have told your Lordships that the result of their researches is that cross-examination upon affidavit was an unknown form of procedure till introduced by the Chancery Procedure Act of 1852, so that the affidavit of the 18th century was merely a solemn mode of making a claim. It was indeed the only way, as far as I know the old procedure, because I conceive that a suggestion on the roll would not be applicable, and that the only form of process would be by a rule nisi supported by affidavit.

Such defendants, not having been made known to the Secretary of State, could not well expect to have the benefit of the procedure suggested by Lord Mansfield in Heathfield v. Chilton (4 Burr., 2015). I quote his words: "I find this is not an application by the Attorney-General, by the direction and at the expense of the Crown. That, indeed, would have shewn that the Crown thought this person intituled to the character of a public minister."

The case of Fisher v. Begrez (1 Cr. and M., 117) is perhaps the most favourable to the plaintiff. There the claim of privilege was disallowed, and there are expressions in the report to the effect that the certificate from the Secretary of State was not conclusive ; but what is referred to is not a real certificate, but the Sheriff's list, and the reason given is that a man may well have been put on the list as being at the time in the suite of an Ambassador, and yet be no longer in that capacity. There was not, as in this case, a certificate de praesenti. It may be further noticed that the claim for privilege was made in respect of a writ of fi. fa., so that the case must have proceeded to judgment without any such claim having been made, and it seems to have been an afterthought.

The case of the Russian Ambassador, which led to the Statute 7 Anne, c. 12, is related by Lord Mansfield in the case of Triquet v. Bath (3 Burr., 1478), and is given more at length in Blackstone's commentaries, 2nd ed., Vol. 2. p. 255, repeated by Stephen. Blackstone got his account from Boyer's Annals, to which I have referred. Lord Mansfield, following, I think, the train of thought which he expressed later in Heathfield v. Chilton (supra), seems rather to complain that in that case there was no direct intervention by the Attorney-General. He observes as follows: "If proper application had been immediately made for his discharge from the arrest, the matter might and doubtless would have been set right. Instead of that, bail was put in, before any complaint was made." I do not, however, know what the unfortunate Ambassador could have done. His carriage was stopped, he was dragged out of it with violence and taken to a sponging house, where he had to remain till two distinguished persons put in bail for him. He then went straight to the Queen to complain, and the whole diplomatic corps joined in protesting, whereupon the delinquents were summoned before the Privy Council, of which it is stated that the Lord Chief Justice Holt was sworn a member, apparently in order that he might sit. One of the persons complained of was discharged, but the rest were committed to prison, and the Attorney-General was directed to file an information against them, on which they were convicted, judgment being reserved, in order to consider the international law ; but the Czar having been mollified by the passing of the Act of Parliament, and the presentation of an elaborately engrossed copy, desired that they should not be punished, and they were accordingly released.

It does not appear that any steps were taken to vacate the bail bond or dismiss the suit. Probably, any such step was deemed unnecessary. There was intervention by the Crown, but after a different fashion.

I have already observed that in my judgment there are objections in principle against driving a defendant to the course adopted in the 18th century cases. The object to be attained is immunity from the vexation of litigation with its impediments to the discharge of the functions of the domestic or domestic servant, as illustrated in the case of Magdalena Steam Navigation Company v. Martin (supra). Absolute freedom is difficult to procure. Litigation, as Lord Justice Mellish observed in Ex parte Edwards (L.R., 9 Ch. 138), usually begins ex parte, and a defendant served with a writ must enter an appearance, even if it be only a conditional appearance, or he will have judgment against him, and he must follow up appearance by a summons to set aside the writ. All this is unfortunate, and is intended to be provided against in our country by the Statute of Anne and the Sheriff's list. But the only compensation, if it be compensation, is to give the defendant his costs. If possible, there should be no further interference with him, but if he is put to file an affidavit it is a further step in de facto submission. If he has to attend for cross-examination, it is a further submission and not unlikely to interfere with the discharge of his other duties. Where the man's chief has not taken the precaution of tendering the man and procuring his acceptance, the man may still have to prove his status aliunde. But where the man has been tendered and accepted, the joint act creates a status, which can only be removed by showing that his duties have ceased or that he has engaged in trade.

My Lords, if I am not mistaken, when a question arises in the Law Courts as to whether a ruler is a Sovereign, and a proper Secretary of State is consulted, the right answer is not "A.B. is a Sovereign," but "A.B. is recognized by his Majesty as a Sovereign." So, I think, the exact inquiry in this case is not whether the defendant is a member of the ambassadorial staff but whether he has been accepted and recognized by the Crown as such a member, and it appears to me that he has so been.

Therefore, my Lords, I think that this appeal should be allowed.

LORD WARRINGTON OF CLYFFE.—My Lords, the appellant is defendant in an action brought against him by the respondent Musmann for the recovery of rents and damages for breach of covenants contained in a lease dated August 18, 1924, made between the respondent of the one part and the appellant of the other part of certain premises at Hampstead.

The appellant having entered a conditional appearance applied to have the writ and all subsequent proceedings set aside on the ground that he is a consular secretary on the staff of the German Embassy and, therefore, entitled to immunity from civil proceedings.

In support of this application he filed affidavits stating the nature of his employment and making the claim to immunity.

On March 4, 1927, Mr. Justice Shearman, on an appeal from a decision of Master Moseley, given in Chambers on February 15, 1927, ordered the appellant to attend for cross-examination, but gave leave to appeal.

The appeal came before the Court of Appeal on April 12 and May 30 and 31, 1927. The Attorney-General attended and at the request of the Court informed them that the appellant had been appointed a member of the staff of the German Embassy, under the style of consular secretary, and had been received in that capacity by the British Government, that his name had been submitted to the Foreign Office by the German Ambassador in the usual way, and that his position as a member of the Embassy was and had been since December, 1920, recognized without reservation or condition of any sort. He gave the Court certain further information as to the particulars of the appellant's employment which it is not necessary to state in detail, and stated that he gave the information both on the instructions of the Foreign Office and on his own responsibility as Attorney-General.

On June 23, 1927, the Court of Appeal by a majority (Lords Justices Scrutton and Sargant—the Master of the Rolls dissenting) made an order affirming the order of Mr. Justice Shearman. This is an appeal from that order.

On November 25, 1927, the Attorney-General lodged a petition to this House praying leave to intervene in this appeal and to lodge a case and to be heard thereon. The prayer of this petition was granted by the Appeal Committee, reserving to the respondent Musmann the right to take on the hearing of the appeal such preliminary objection to the Attorney-General being heard as he might be advised.

The Attorney-General accordingly lodged a case and appeared before your Lordships, but the respondent objecting to his being heard, and the Attorney-General stating that the printed case contained all that he desired to say, he did not address any argument to your Lordships.

The real question, therefore, and it is an important one, is whether in such a case information given by the Attorney-General in the circumstances stated above as to the diplomatic status of a person claiming immunity from civil process is conclusive as to the fact of such status. If it is, then cross-examination on an affidavit with the object of displacing the effect of the information would be irrelevant and useless and ought to be refused.

It must be borne in mind that all that is directly in issue is the fact of the appellant's status. Whether, that fact being established, a defendant is entitled to the immunity that he claims is a further question, which might have to be determined by the Court. In the present case, however, it does not appear that there is in issue any question of law or fact other than that of status.

It is now well settled that in certain matters connected with our relations with Foreign States it is for the Court to take judicial notice of the facts relating thereto, and further that in all matters of which the Court takes judicial cognizance the Court may have recourse to any proper source of information, and there is no question that in such a case as the present the source of information actually applied to was the proper source.

The information so obtained is not in the nature of evidence ; it is a statement by the Sovereign of this country through one of his Ministers upon a matter which is peculiarly within his cognizance, and the Court is bound to act on such a statement. (See the opinion of Lord Finlay in Duff Development Co. v. Kelantan Government (40 The Times L.R., 566 ; [1924] A.C., 797, at p. 813).

It is admitted that amongst the matters of which the Court is bound to take judicial cognizance are the status of an Ambassador himself and even that of a mere chargé d'affaires. In the case of Macartney v. Garbutt (6 The Times L.R., 214 ; 24 Q.B.D., 368) it would seem, though it is not quite clear, that the Court acted on information obtained from a Government Department, in that case the Home Secretary, as to the status of the English Secretary of the Chinese Embassy. But when once it is established, and I think it is, that the Court takes judicial cognizance of the status of any member of a Foreign Embassy, it is impossible on any principle to draw a distinction between one class of member and another and to say that the rule applies to the first and not to the second.

The Attorney-General states explicitly in paragraph 26 of his case that it is a necessary part of his Majesty's prerogative in his conduct of foreign affairs and his relations with foreign States and their representatives to accord or refuse recognition to any person as a member of a foreign ambassador's staff exercising diplomatic functions. The fact of recognition is of course peculiarly within the knowledge of the department according it, and a statement by or on behalf of the department that it has been accorded to any person must, in my opinion, come within the principles above referred to and be conclusive as to the status of that person.

It may be added that the Attorney-General states in his printed case that, for the purpose of obtaining recognition of the members of an ambassador's staff exercising diplomatic functions, a list of such members is furnished from time to time to the Secretary of State by every ambassador. The list is not accepted as of course on behalf of his Majesty, and after investigation it not infrequently happens that recognition is withheld from a person whose name appears upon the furnished list, either because his diplomatic status is in doubt, or because the number of persons for whom status is claimed appears to the Secretary of State to be excessive.

I have not thought it necessary to discuss the many cases which were cited in this House. It is enough to say that some of them support and no one of them is opposed to the view that I have above expressed.

I have also thought it unnecessary to say anything about the statute of Anne. It is well settled that the questions that we have been discussing do not depend on the statute but are principles of common law, having their origin in the idea of the comity of nations.

For the reasons above expressed I am of opinion that this appeal should succeed and the orders of the Court of Appeal and Mr. Justice Shearman should be discharged, and a declaration made as proposed from the Woolsack. The appellant does not ask for costs and the order will therefore be without costs here or below.

LORD BLANESBURGH concurred in the judgment of Lord Buckmaster.

K.B. Div.
(Acton and Branson, JJ.) 1928. July 12.

MORELLI v. FITCH AND GIBBONS.*

Sale of Goods—Implied condition—Merchantable quality—Bottle of wine—Defect in bottle—Injury to purchaser in uncorking—Liability of seller—Sale of Goods Act, 1893 (56 and 57 Vict., c. 71), s. 14 (2).

This was an appeal by the defendants from a decision of his Honour Judge Crawford, sitting at the Edmonton County Court.

The defendants, Messrs. Fitch and Gibbons, were the licensees of an off-licence shop known as "The Cross Keys," Edmonton Green. On January 21, 1928, the plaintiff, Mr. Charles Morelli, of Bury-street, Edmonton, purchased at the shop a bottle of Stone's ginger wine. He took the bottle home, and while he was extracting the cork by means of a corkscrew the neck of the bottle came away, with the result that he sustained considerable injuries to his left hand. In an action for damages the County Court Judge found that the bottle was bought by description from the defendants, who dealt in goods of that description; that there was a defect in the bottle rendering it unfit for the purpose for which it was required; and that the bottle was not of merchantable quality. He awarded the plaintiff £21 damages.

The defendants appealed.

Sir Reginald Mitchell Banks, K.C., and Mr. E. T. Rhymer appeared for the appellants; Mr. F. Soskice for the respondent.

MR. JUSTICE ACTON.—This is an appeal from a decision of his Honour Judge Crawford in a case tried before him in which the plaintiff, Mr. Charles Morelli, claimed from Messrs. Fitch and Gibbons, the defendants, damages for personal injuries arising out of a breach of the defendant's alleged implied warranty of fitness in regard to a bottle supplied under a contract of sale.

The facts are very short and very simple, but they give rise, no doubt, as Sir Reginald Mitchell Banks has said, to a question of some importance to those who deal in wares of the kind with which this case is concerned. The plaintiff was a person who, desiring to purchase a certain kind of cordial or wine, went to the shop of the defendants, who are retail dealers in wines and spirits, and apparently other cordials and so forth, which they sell in bottles, and the plaintiff was a person who had dealt with them on several occasions in the ordinary course of their business before the particular purchase with which we are concerned. On January 21, 1928, he went into the shop and was served by the wife of the manager, a Mrs. Martin. He asked her for a bottle of ginger wine, and upon her saying interrogatively, "2s 6d.?" he said, "No, I want Stone's ginger wine at 2s. 9d." She then got a bottle of this particular kind of ginger wine from the shelf, wrapped it up in paper, handed it to Mr. Morelli, who paid the sum of 2s. 9d. for it, took the bottle away with him and went home. Passing over matters which I do not think need be repeated, though they appear in the facts, what took place next was that Mr. Morelli, desiring to consume the contents of this bottle of ginger wine, applied a corkscrew to the cork in the bottle and, holding the bottle in his left hand, pulled the corkscrew with his right hand. The result was that the neck of the bottle came away altogether from the bottle; the bottle fell to the ground and the hand, that is to say the left hand, with which Mr. Morelli had been holding the bottle, was somewhat severely cut, and it was in respect of the cuts upon that hand and the consequences thereof that this action for damages was brought as on a breach of warranty arising out of the contract of sale between him and the defendants. In the result the learned Judge arrived at certain findings of fact which he has set out with great care in his note of the trial which is now before us. Those findings were as follows: "(1) I believed and accepted the evidence given by the plaintiff. I find that his evidence is accurate in all material respects. (2) I find that the corkscrew used was proper and suitable for the purpose of extracting the cork. (3) I find that the plaintiff attempted to extract the cork in a reasonable and proper manner and with due care. (4) I find that the bottle broke when the cork was so being extracted. (5) I find that there was some defect in the bottle which rendered it unfit for the purpose for which it was required by reason of its being in such a condition that when the cork was being extracted in a proper and reasonable manner it broke and that by reason of such defect it was not of merchantable quality. (6) I find that the bottle of ginger wine was bought by description from the defendants and that they dealt in goods of that description." It is upon these facts, and the findings at which the learned Judge arrived upon the facts, that this appeal is brought by the defendants, who contend that the learned Judge was wrong in law in the conclusions at which he arrived.

Under finding No. 5 there is one point to which perhaps it is expedient to refer in passing in order that it may be laid aside. The finding under that head, that there was some defect in the bottle which rendered it unfit for the purpose for which it was required, seems by implication to have some reference to subsection 1 of section 14 of the Sale of Goods Act, 1893, but it is, as I understand, common ground between counsel upon either side that the question which the learned Judge was asked to determine and did determine accordingly was a question outside and independent of subsection 1 of section 14 and was a question arising under subsection 2 of section 14, the familiar words of which are as follows: "Where goods are bought by description from a seller who deals in goods of that description (whether he be the manufacturer or not), there is an implied condition that the goods shall be of merchantable quality; provided that if the buyer has examined the goods, there shall be no implied condition as regards defects which such examination ought to have revealed." It is perhaps strictly unnecessary, but desirable for sake of clarity, to point out that if the present action was founded upon the assumption that there was in this case such an implied condition as is dealt with in subsection 2 of section 14 of the Sale of Goods Act, 1893, and a breach of that implied condition, the plaintiff treated, as he was entitled to do, the breach of that condition as a breach of warranty and sought damages accordingly for a breach of warranty.

The question then arises whether, as Sir Reginald Mitchell Banks has argued, the learned Judge was wrong in the conclusion at which he arrived. The argument that he was wrong really began with the contention that the learned Judge was wrong in law in finding, as he did, under clause 6 of his findings, that the bottle of ginger wine in question was bought by description from the defendants. Now that which was bought, as appears from the evidence, in regard to which there is no controversy or question, was a bottle of Stone's ginger wine, which appears to be a well-known brand of that kind of cordial, at the price of 2s. 9d., which appears to be the well-known and recognized price for a bottle of that particular commodity. Having regard to the decision in the case of Wren v. Holt (19 The Times L.R., 292; [1903] 1 K.B., 610) and the later case of Bristol Tramways and Carriage Company v. Fiat Motors, Limited (26 The Times L.R., 629; [1910] 2 K.B., 831), it seems to me clear that there was here, as the learned Judge has decided, a sale by the defendants to the plaintiff of a bottle of ginger wine at the price of 2s. 9d. by description, and there is no question in the present case that the defendants deal in goods of that description. In this context perhaps special reference should be made to the passage to which our attention has been drawn in the case of Bristol Tramways and Carriage Company v. Fiat Motors, Limited (supra), in the judgment of Lord Justice Farwell at p. 840. The learned Lord Justice there says: "The implied condition that the goods are of merchantable quality applies to all goods bought from a seller who deals in goods of that description, whether they are sold under a patent or trade name or otherwise; the only proviso in subsection 2, namely, examination by the buyer, is negatived by Mr. Justice Lawrance's finding of fact in this case. The phrase 'merchantable quality' seems more appropriate to a retail purchaser buying from a wholesale firm than to private buyers, and to natural products, such as grain, wool, or flour, than to a complicated machine, but it is clear that it extends to both: the definition of 'goods' in section 62 makes that word include 'all chattels personal other than things in action and money,' and 'quality of goods' includes their state or condition." It seems to me clear that, having regard to these decisions, and especially to the passage which I have quoted from Lord Justice Farwell, it is impossible to say that the learned Judge was not perfectly right in coming to the conclusion that there was here a sale of goods, namely, this bottle of Stone's ginger wine, by description by the defendants to the plaintiff. It, therefore, clearly appears, in my opinion, that the bottle of Stone's ginger wine was a chattel which was bought by description from sellers who dealt in goods of that description, although they were not the manufacturers thereof, and, therefore, according to the provisions of subsection 2 of section 14 of the Sale of Goods Act, 1893, there was, as the learned Judge decided, an implied condition that the goods should be of merchantable quality.

That being so, upon the findings of fact of the learned Judge, which are, indeed, not assailed for the purpose of the present appeal, it seems to me impossible to say that the learned Judge was wrong in arriving at the conclusion that there was a breach of that implied condition or warranty that the goods should be of merchantable quality. That there was some defect in the bottle which rendered it unfit for the purpose for which it was required is, as I have pointed out, a matter which we can pass over, but the defect was one which also rendered it not of merchantable quality. With regard to the proviso to the subsection, it equally appears from the findings of the learned Judge that the defect which he finds to have existed in this bottle, as the result of which it broke and injured the plaintiff's hand, was a defect from which no such examination as was available to the plaintiff of the article which he had purchased would or could reasonably have revealed to him.

In these circumstances my decision is that the learned Judge was right throughout in the conclusion of law at which he arrived upon the facts as he found them, and that there was no reason whatever why it was not open to him to find the facts as he did. Although it is outside our province to enquire into the facts, if there is evidence to support those facts, I think it may fairly be said that there can be little doubt that any tribunal of fact would have arrived at the same conclusion on the facts as that at which the learned Judge arrived.

In these circumstances, in my opinion, this appeal fails and ought to be dismissed.

MR. JUSTICE BRANSON.—I agree. The first ground upon which it was contended on behalf of the appellants that the learned Judge was wrong was that he was wrong in law in holding that the purchase in this case was a purchase by description within section 14, subsection 2, of the Sale of Goods Act, 1893. In support of that contention reference was made to a passage in the judgment of Lord Justice Vaughan Williams in Wren v. Holt (19 The Times L.R., 292; [1903] 1 K.B., 610, at p. 615), in which he says: "I do not think, taking the generally accepted view of lawyers as to the meaning to be attached to the words 'by description' as applied to a sale, that a sale of goods over a counter, where the seller deals in the description of goods sold, is a sale of goods by description within this subsection." I confess that the meaning of the learned Lord Justice is not very clear to my mind, and were it not for the fact that in that case the sale, which the Court held was in substance a sale of Holden's beer over the counter, was held to be a sale by description, I think one might have to consider further the question of the meaning of that passage. But in view of the decision of the Court of Appeal in Wren v. Holt (supra), that a sale of beer in a beerhouse, which upon the findings of the jury the Court held to be in substance a sale of Holden's beer, was a sale by description and brought the case within subsection 2 of section 14, it seems to me to be clear beyond argument that the sale in this case of Stone's ginger wine across the counter was equally a sale which the learned County Court Judge, acting as the tribunal of fact in this case as the jury acted in the other, was entitled to find to be a sale by description so as to bring the case within subsection 2 of section 14.

The same thing follows from a consideration of the case of the Bristol Tramways and Carriage Company v. Fiat Motors, Limited (26 The Times L.R., 629 ; [1910] 2 K.B., 831). I do not propose to refer to that again, as my Lord has read the most relevant passage in the case in the course of his judgment.

The next point taken was that there was no evidence upon which the learned County Court Judge could come to the conclusion that this bottle was not of merchantable quality, for it was contended that the defect in it, which caused it to break, was not a defect which an ordinary reasonable examination would have disclosed, and, therefore, inasmuch as the plaintiff, if he had been minded to resell, could have resold it, it could not be said that the bottle was not of merchantable quality. In my view, that contention is entirely unsound. I think that the question whether the article is of merchantable quality or not depends upon the true state of the article and not upon whether its state can be discovered by a reasonable examination of it. That that is so seems to me to follow quite clearly from the proviso to subsection 2 of section 14 of the Sale of Goods Act, 1893, which makes it clear that, even if the buyer has examined the goods, the implied condition makes the seller liable for a latent defect in those goods. This ground also to my mind fails, and the result is that I agree that the learned County Court Judge has come to a correct conclusion on the law of this case. I agree, if it is open to one to express an opinion on a question of fact which has been decided by the learned Judge, that upon the evidence I should probably have come to the same conclusion myself. In the result I think this appeal should be dismissed, with costs.

Leave to appeal was granted.

WELD v. PETRE.*

Mortgage—Redemption—Shares in company—Non-payment of interest—Retention of shares by mortgagee for long period but without foreclosure—Subsequent increase in value of shares and payment of dividends—Summons to redeem—Delay—Laches—Claim for dividends received in excess of mortgage interest—Relief granted on summons—Rules of the Supreme Court, Order LV., r. 5 a.

In 1900 B. mortgaged shares in a company to L. to secure a loan with interest, the shares being afterwards registered in the mortgagee's name, and further shares being added to them. Dividends were received by L. sufficient to clear the interest up to 1908, when they ceased, and the shares became of little value, L. retaining them, without foreclosing. In 1916 dividends were resumed, and they and the value of the shares increased enormously, so that by 1921 L. had received dividends sufficient to pay off the loan and interest. L. died in 1923, and in 1926 the plaintiffs, who were entitled to the equity of redemption in the shares, took out a summons claiming redemption, and also repayment of the excess of the amount of dividends received by L. or his executors over and above the amount due under the mortgage.

Held, affirming a decision of Russell, J. (44 The Times L.R., 457), that equity would not deprive a mortgagor of his right to redeem if the debt had been or could be repaid, the security was still available, and the position of the mortgagee had not been altered to his prejudice by the delay ; also that the limit of twelve years applicable by the Real Property Limitation Act, 1874, in the case of a mortgage of realty would not, by equitable principles, be extended so as to support a plea of delay and laches and be made applicable to a mortgage of personalty.

Held, further, reversing the decision of Russell, J. (supra), that an order for payment of the excess claimed against the mortgagee could, by the provisions of Order LV., r. 5 a, be obtained upon originating summons.

This was an appeal from a decision of Mr. Justice Russell (44 The Times L.R., 457). The facts are fully stated in the report of the case below, but were, more briefly, as follows :—

The plaintiffs were entitled to the equity of redemption in shares of a limited company, and they took out a summons to redeem them, and also for repayment of money received in dividends in excess of that due under the mortgage. The defendants, the executors of the mortgagee, resisted, on the ground that the plaintiffs had lost their right through long delay and laches, and that, on equitable principles, the Court ought to refuse them the relief sought.

The shares in question, which were originally 300 Ordinary shares of £5 each, fully paid, in the Cornbrook Brewery Company, Limited, were the property of Mr. Henry Weld-Blundell, who mortgaged them in February, 1900, to Mr. Joseph Francis Lescher to secure a loan of £1,000 for three months with interest at 6 per cent. The shares were registered in the mortgagee's name on December 10, 1900, and the mortgagor died on September 5, 1901. His executors were his widow, the plaintiff Mr. Herbert Joseph Weld, and Mr. William Dalglish Bellasis.

The executors were unable or unwilling to pay off the £1,000, and in July, 1902, they offered the mortgagee 200 more shares as additional security. These were registered in his name on August 14, 1902. The estate of the mortgagor proved insolvent, but his brother Charles, who was a large creditor, came to the rescue and took over some of the assets at the value of £8,534 and then settled these assets for the benefit of his brother's widow and daughter by a settlement dated September 1, 1902. Among the assets so acquired and settled were the 500 shares subject to the mortgage and other shares of the same company. The interest which fell due to the mortgagee on August 5, 1903, was not punctually paid, and as a result the mortgagee obtained further securities from the trustees of the settlement to the extent of another 100 shares, which were registered in his name on October 16, 1903.

Mr. Lescher, the mortgagee, was thus in possession of 600 shares of £5 each. A dividend which he received at the rate of 2 per cent. less tax cleared the interest on the loan up to February 4, 1904, and by means of similar dividends interest was cleared up to February 5, 1908. In 1908 the mortgagee became desirous of having his loan repaid because, according to his letters, he had been appointed chairman of petty sessions and did not wish, while in that position, to be a holder of brewery Ordinary shares. A correspondence ensued, in which the mortgagee threatened to sell and to take legal proceedings, and which culminated in a letter of June 18, 1908, from the mortgagee to the trustees' solicitors : "I have your letter of the 15th inst. The course you therein recommend will incur further pourparlers which is not my intention—and I mean acting promptly and at once, however unpleasant such a course may be."

Mr. Lescher, however, did nothing at all. He never sold or foreclosed. Bad times came to the company and no dividend was paid on its Ordinary shares, nor was there any trace during this time of Mr. Lescher's demanding or receiving interest on the £1,000. During the War prosperity came to the company, and in respect of 1916 and following years substantial dividends free of tax were paid on the Ordinary shares to the mortgagee. In 1920 the 600 shares of £5 each were subdivided into 3,000 shares of £1 each, and 1,500 bonus shares were allotted to Mr. Lescher.

The prosperity of the company was well known to the trustees of the settlement, for they held other Ordinary shares of the company. Besides this, the plaintiff, Mr. Herbert Joseph Weld, who was one of the trustees, had throughout been a director of the company. By 1921 the dividends received by Mr. Lescher were sufficient to pay off the loan.

On January 5, 1923, Mr. Weld, who was also the solicitor to the trustees, wrote a letter addressed to Mr. Lescher : "Adverting to the advance made by you to the late Mr. Henry Weld-Blundell on security of some Cornbrook shares, it has been suggested to me by one of the family that I should approach you in the matter in view of the fact that by this time your debt must have been largely reduced, if not paid off, out of the dividends. Would you be prepared to transfer the shares back to Mrs. Weld-Blundell and her daughter on payment of the principal due together with a reasonable rate of interest over the whole period during which the debt has run ? As you are no doubt aware, Mrs. Henry Weld-Blundell and her daughter are not well off, and I shall be glad if you will give the matter your consideration." Mr. Lescher never received that letter. He died on January 7, 1923, and the letter was answered by his daughter, who said the matter was for the executors and lawyers, whose address she gave.

The defendants were the executors of Mr. Lescher and proved his will in April, 1923. In the same year the company issued further bonus shares, with the result that 2,250 Ordinary shares were added to Mr. Lescher's holding, so that the total holding had become 6,750 shares.

On October 4, 1926, the trustees' solicitors wrote to the solicitors to Mr. Lescher's executors claiming to redeem the security. Correspondence ensued, but the right to redeem was disputed on the ground that, owing to the delay and laches of the applicants, either the right to redeem had been lost or the Court would withhold its assistance. Eventually a summons for redemption was issued on July 30, 1927.

Mr. Justice Russell held that equity would not deprive a mortgagor of his right to redeem if, when the right was asserted, the debt had been or could be repaid and if the security was available and no one's position had been altered in the meantime. He therefore made an order on the mortgagee's executors to reassign the shares to the plaintiffs, but made no order as to any excess over the principal moneys and interest received by the mortgagee on the ground that a personal order for payment against a mortgagee could not be obtained by originating summons, but only in proceedings commanded by writ.

The defendants appealed.

Mr. Spens, K.C., and Mr. Evershed appeared for the appellants ; and Mr. Jenkins, K.C., and Mr. B. A. Hall for the respondents.

Lord Hanworth, M.R.—It is quite unnecessary to restate the facts, which are fully and accurately set out in the judgment of Mr. Justice Russell. I agree with his summary of the facts arising upon the evidence, and upon them that the plaintiffs are prima facie entitled to the order for redemption that they seek.

I agree also that there was no bargain by which Mr. Lescher could be supposed to have acquired or held the shares freed from any right to redeem them. Nor was any foreclosure carried out by Mr. Lescher. It appears to me that his attitude as expressed in his letter of the 18th June, 1908, shows that he recognized that he was a mortgagee, and that he refrained from taking the course which he appreciated was an unpleasant one, and left the matter to drift as it was—a loan the repayment of which was remote, secured by a mortgage of shares which were of small (if any) value.

So the matter rested, at any rate up to 1916, for there was no change in the relevant facts. It was not until the dividends were declared and received by Mr. Lescher that this dormant transaction was quickened into life by a part payment of the arrears of interest which had continued to acrue. The country was then in the throes of the Great War and I see no reason to suppose that immediate activity or assertion of their rights by the parties on either side was to be expected or called for.

There is no Statute of Limitations which applies to bar the right of redemption, and the appellants rely upon delay and laches for such a time as ought to lead the Court to refuse the relief asked for, on the ground that the Court will take the standard of the Statute of Limitations as the measure to be approximately applied, and that, as there was no recognition by Mr. Lescher of his position as a mortgagee later, at any rate, than June, 1908, a twelve years period and more had elapsed before this summons was issued on the 30th July, 1927.

It is said that the Real Property Limitation Act, 1874, provides such a limit or standard of 12 years. Lord Justice Lindley in Jay v. Johnstone (9 The Times L.R., 125 ; [1893] 1 Q.B., 189, at p. 191) says that the key to that Act is to be found in the preamble and in section 9. The preamble says "whereas it is expedient further to limit the times within which actions or suits may be brought for the recovery of land or rent and of charges thereon." Section 7 applies the twelve years limit to actions and suits by a mortgagor in cases where the mortgagee has obtained possession, or receipt of the profits of any land or receipt of any rent comprised in his mortgage, and section 8 applies the same limit to actions to recover any sum secured by any mortgage . . . or otherwise charged upon or payable out of any land or rent. Neither of these sections refers to mortgages of personalty.

Then by section 9, the sections of the Act 3 and 4 William IV., Cap. 27, except those specifically mentioned, are retained "in full force and shall be construed together with this Act." The excepted sections are section 2 which refers to making an entry upon or to recover land ; section 5, to a reversioner's right to recover land ; section 16, which provides in respect of actions to recover land and allowance of time to persons under a disability, with a total limit of the allowance, under section 17, of forty years ; section 23, which imposes a limit of twenty years where there is possession of land under an assurance of a tenant in tail which does not bar the remainders ; sections 28 and 40, which are the sections replaced by sections 7 and 8 of the Act of 1874.

It thus appears that, except in the case of land and charges upon it, no alteration is made bringing the limits down from twenty to twelve years ; and that the other limits remain in full force.

In my judgment, there is no ground whatever for the application of the twelve years rule to proceedings for the redemption of a mortgage of personalty. Such an attempt at a so-called analogy was rejected by Mr. Justice Kay in Mellersh v. Brown (45 Ch. D., 225), and in In re Powers (30 Ch. D., 291) the Court of Appeal decided that a bond for a sum of money which, if paid by the surety, would have entitled him to the benefit of the mortgage of land on which the sum was lent to the mortgagor at the request of the surety, was not secured upon land and was not affected by the twelve years limit. The distinction between claims relating to land and to personalty are in my judgment clearly and explicitly retained, and there is no basis for applying a twelve years limit in the present case.

I have had the advantage of reading the judgments which will be delivered by Lords Justices Lawrence and Sankey and in view of the exhaustive examination of the cases cited to us, and others, it appears to me to be quite unnecessary to go over the same ground. I agree with them in relation to both the appeal and the cross-appeal, and with the order proposed by Lord Justice Lawrence.

Lord Justice Lawrence.—The main question on this appeal is whether the plaintiffs have lost their right to redeem the shares in question.

It is admitted that there is no Statute of Limitation which applies to the case, and consequently that there is no statutory bar to the plaintiffs' claim for redemption.

The appellants however contended that the Court ought to act upon the analogy of the Statute of Limitations relating to land, and consequently ought to hold that the plaintiffs' claim for redemption was barred after a lapse of twelve years from the date of the last acknowledgment by the mortgagee in the month of June, 1908.

The proposition that the Court in the case of a mortgage of property other than land ought to act upon the analogy of the Statute of Limitations relating to land was emphatically negatived by Mr. Justice Kay upwards of 37 years ago in the case of Mellersh v. Brown (45 Ch. D., 225) which, so far as I know, has never been questioned. The learned Judge in the course of his judgment states as follows (45 Ch. D., at p. 229) : "If the Legislature has enacted that there shall be that limit with regard to real estate and has not so enacted with regard to personal estate, on what ground am I to follow that analogy ? It is not an analogy between the arrears of interest recoverable on a legal debt and those recoverable on an equitable debt. No doubt equity in the case of an equitable debt follows the simple analogy afforded to it by the law applicable to a legal debt ; but I never heard that a Court of Equity is under any obligation to follow as regards personal estate the analogy of a statute which applies to real estate. That is not an analogy within the application of the rule that equity follows the law ; but the reasoning is that whereas the Legislature has enacted that in the case of a charge on real estate only six years' arrears of interest shall be recoverable against the estate, and whereas it has not enacted anything of the kind with regard to personal estate : therefore—what? I should have thought the result was inevitable that as to personal estate the rule is not to be observed and the idea of there being any analogy is one which I do not understand." The cases of London and Midland Bank v. Mitchell (15 The Times L.R., 420 ; [1899] 2 Ch., 161) and In re Stucley (22 The Times L.R., 33 ; [1906] 1 Ch., 67) furnish further examples of the Court's refusal to apply the analogy of limitations relating to land to mortgages of property other than land. Although the cases to which I have referred were cases in which a mortgagee was claiming foreclosure, yet the principle on which they were decided, in my opinion, applies equally to a case such as the present where a mortgagor or his assignee is claiming redemption, with the result that the old decisions in which the Courts of Equity before the Real Property Limitation Act, 1833, either by analogy or in obedience to a statute barring a remedy at law, adopted the same period as a bar to equitable relief (the reasons for which adoption were clearly stated by Lord Redesdale in Hovenden v. Lord Annesley (2 Sch. and Lef., 607, at pp. 630-632), have no application to the present case. On these grounds I am of opinion that the contention of the appellants that the Court ought in this case to act on the analogy of the Real Property Limitation Act, 1874, is not well founded.

Further, it is clear that as the mortgagee has acknowledged the plaintiffs' right of redemption at a date less than 20 years before the commencement of this action the appellants cannot successfully maintain that the Court ought to presume a release by the plaintiffs of their equity of redemption.

In the absence of any statutory bar or any presumption of a release, the question in the present case resolves itself into whether the Court ought to refuse relief on the ground of acquiescence or laches.

The difference between acquiescence and laches was clearly pointed out by the House of Lords in Archbold v. Scully (9 H.L.C., 360). I need only quote the following passage from the speech of Lord Wensleydale (9 H.L.C., at p. 383): "Where there is a Statute of Limitations the objection of simple laches does not apply until the expiration of the time allowed by the statute. But acquiescence is a different thing ; it means more than laches. If a party, who could object, lies by and knowingly permits another to incur an expense in doing an act under the belief that it would not be objected to, and so a kind of permission may be said to be given to another to alter his condition, he may be said to acquiesce ; but the fact of simply neglecting to enforce a claim for the period during which the law permits him to delay, without losing his right, I conceive cannot be any equitable bar."

In the present case the appellants have adduced no evidence whatever tending to show that either the mortgagee during his lifetime or the appellants since his death has or have altered his or their position on the faith of the plaintiffs' inaction. Had it been proved that any such alteration had taken place I am of opinion that a much shorter period of delay than the one in question here would have constituted a sufficient ground for refusing relief. In the absence of any such proof, however, it is plain that the appellants cannot rely upon acquiescence as a defence to the plaintiffs' claim, and I did not understand Mr. Spens seriously to contend that they could. In the result the only ground upon which the appellants can found their argument against relief is delay or laches, which for present purposes I treat as synonomous terms.

The principle applicable to a case where long delay is set up as a defence to equitable relief is stated by Sir Barnes Peacock in the following well-known passage in the judgment of the Privy Council in Lindsay Petroleum Co. v. Hurd (L.R., 5 P.C., 221, at p. 239) : "Now the doctrine of laches in Courts of Equity is not an arbitrary or a technical doctrine. Where it would be practically unjust to give a remedy, either because the party has, by his conduct, done that which might fairly be regarded as equivalent to a waiver of it, or where by his conduct and neglect he has, though perhaps not waiving that remedy, yet put the other party in a situation in which it would not be reasonable to place him if the remedy were afterwards to be asserted, in either of these cases, lapse of time and delay are most material. But in every case, if an argument against relief, which otherwise would be just, is founded upon mere delay, that delay of course not amounting to a bar by any Statute of Limitations, the validity of that defence must be tried upon principles substantially equitable. Two circumstances, always important in such cases, are the length of the delay and the nature of the acts done during the interval, which might affect either party and cause a balance of justice or injustice in taking the one course or the other, so far as relates to the remedy."

In Erlanger v. New Sombrero Phosphate Company (3 App. Cas., 1218) Lord Blackburn, after quoting the above passage says (3 App. Cas., at p. 1279) : "I have looked in vain for any authority which gives a more distinct and definite rule than this ; and I think, from the nature of the inquiry, it must always be a question of more or less, depending on the degree of diligence which might reasonably be required, and the degree of change which has occurred, whether the balance of justice or injustice is in favour of granting the remedy or withholding it. The determination of such a question must largely depend on the turn of mind of those who have to decide, and must therefore be subject to uncertainty ; but that, I think, is inherent in the nature of the inquiry."

In Masonic and General Life Assurance Company v. Sharpe (8 The Times L.R., 194 ; [1892] 1 Ch., 154, at p. 168) Lord Justice Lindley stated that the rule that staleness of demand as distinguished from the Statute of Limitations and analogy to it may furnish a defence in equity to an equitable claim was settled at least as early as Smith v. Clay (Amb., 645), and after referring to Lindsay Petroleum Company v. Hurd (supra) and Erlanger v. New Sombrero Phosphate Company (supra) said : "A defence based on staleness of demand renders it necessary to consider the time which has elapsed and the balance of justice or injustice in affording or refusing relief." The learned Lord Justice, in holding that the delay in that case was no bar, laid stress on the fact that the appellants there had lost no evidence nor any remedy, and on the fact that they had adduced no evidence to prove that their testator had been induced by the plaintiffs' delay to alter his position for the worse.

The real difficulty lies in applying the principle enunciated in these cases to the facts of the present case.

In the first place, I think that counsel for the appellants were right in their contention that the delay ought, in the circumstances, to be considered as having commenced in June, 1908, and as having continued until the month of October, 1926, when the plaintiffs definitely asserted their present claim—that is to say, for a period of 18 years and 4 months. During this period the plaintiffs made no payments of principal or interest in respect of the mortgage debt, nor did they in any way assert their right to redeem ; after June, 1908, neither the mortgagee nor the appellants did anything which amounted to a recognition of the plaintiffs' right to redeem. In these circumstances, the fact that the dividends which were received by the mortgagee did not amount to a sufficient sum to pay off the mortgage until the year 1921 does not, in my opinion, operate to cut out from the period of delay the years which elapsed before that date. The fact that a mortgagee is in receipt of the income of the mortgaged property (be such income large or small) and that in case of redemption he is bound to give credit for such income against the amount owing on his security does not, in my opinion, prevent time from running against an owner of the equity of redemption who neither pays any principal or interest in respect of the mortgage debt nor asserts his right to redeem. Nor do I think that the fact that the plaintiffs were under no personal liability to the mortgagee prevents time from running against them as owners of the equity of redemption. If the mortgage in the present case had been a mortgage of land, I am clearly of opinion that the plaintiffs' claim to redeem would, under the Real Property Limitation Act, 1874, have been barred in June, 1920.

It cannot be denied that a mortgagor who sleeps on his rights, for such a long interval of time as has occurred here, runs a very serious risk of finding when he at last awakes and bestirs himself that the mortgagee has in the meantime altered his position on the faith of the delay and that his right to relief has been lost. But I know of no case where mere delay of less than 20 years has of itself been held a sufficient ground for refusing relief to a mortgagor of personal estate claiming to redeem the mortgage.

Counsel for the appellants in support of their argument on this point relied upon the cases of Floyer v. Lavington (1 P. Wms., 268) and Lockwood v. Ewer (9 Mod., 275). These cases, however, do not, in my opinion, assist the appellants' contention. In both the period of delay was more than 20 years ; moreover, in both there were special circumstances which pointed to there having been acquiescence and not merely delay. In the former (where the delay was apparently 60 years) the mortgage debt was to be repaid by half-yearly instalments and the mortgagee had sold the rentcharge, the subject-matter of his security, to a purchaser, who had settled it. In the latter (where the delay was more than 20 years) the mortgagee had been compelled to pay calls on the stock, the subject-matter of his security, and further had sold out the stock and "united it to his own gross stock," whatever this may mean. In Brooks v. Muckleston ([1909] 2 Ch., 519), another case cited to us, the delay was 48 years. Counsel for the appellants also relied upon the following observations of Lord Redesdale in Hovenden v. Lord Annesley (2 Sch. and L., 607, at p. 636): "I think the rule has been so laid down, that every new right of action in equity that accrues to the party, whatever it may be, must be acted upon at the utmost within 20 years. Thus, in the case of redemption of a mortgage, if the mortgagee has been in possession for a great length of time but has acknowledged that his possession was as mortgagee, and therefore liable to redemption, a right of action accrues upon that acknowledgment. But if not pursued within 20 years it is like the case at law of a promise of payment beyond the six years, and non assumpsit infra sex annos pleaded: and so in every case of equitable title (not being the case of a trustee whose possession is consistent with the title of the claimant), it must be pursued within 20 years after the title accrues. This was so considered by Lord Camden, in Smith v. Clay (3 Bro. C.C., 639 n), referring to Jenner v. Tracy (3 P. Wms., 288*n*), that the same length of time should bar a redemption that would bar any other equity." This passage does not help the plaintiffs, as the period there referred to is 20 years. Further, I am clearly of opinion that there is no rigid rule that every equity must be acted upon at the utmost within 20 years, and if not so acted upon will be barred. Every case must obviously depend upon its own circumstances, and Mr. Spens freely admitted that he could not support any such hard and fast rule. Moreover, both Lord Redesdale in Hovenden v. Lord Annesley (supra) and Lord Camden in Smith v. Clay (supra) when referring to the right of redemption being barred after 20 years evidently had in mind a mortgage of land.

In my opinion, therefore, the delay which has taken place in the present case is not of itself sufficient to disentitle the plaintiffs to relief.

The next matter to be considered is whether anything has taken place during the interval which would render it practically unjust to give the plaintiffs their remedy. The only facts relied upon by the appellants in support of their contention on this point are, first, that the shares became valuable and that by the month of July, 1921, the mortgagee had received dividends sufficient to pay off the total amount due to him under his mortgage, and, secondly, that the mortgagee died in the month of January, 1923, and it is alleged (although there is no evidence on this point) that estate duty has been paid on the shares on the faith that they formed part of the mortgagee's estate.

The facts so relied upon do not, in my opinion, render it inequitable to grant the relief claimed by the plaintiffs, nor, so far as I can see, is there any obstacle in the way of granting such relief. Nobody has been prejudiced by the delay. The mortgagee retained the shares up to the time of his death, and they are now in the hands of the appellants, as his executors, who have refrained from distributing them as part of the mortgagee's estate pending the decision of the Court in the present case. There is no difficulty in accounting for the dividends received by the mortgagee and by the appellants. There has been no expenditure in connexion with the shares, and the appellants have not lost any evidence or remedy. Moreover, the mortgagee had notice that the plaintiffs were trustees of the equity of redemption and therefore he must be taken to have known that they could not properly abandon their equity of redemption, whilst the plaintiffs may have placed some reliance upon the fact that the mortgagee could not properly sell the shares without first giving them a reasonable notice, and could not foreclose without making them parties to the proceedings and giving them an opportunity to redeem.

The fact that the plaintiffs were acquainted with the affairs of the company and ought to have known that the mortgage debt had been paid off in 1921 does not, in my opinion, in the circumstances afford any ground for refusing relief, though it would, in my opinion, have been conclusive against the plaintiffs if the appellants could have proved that the mortgagee had altered his position for the worse on the footing of such payment off and in the belief that the plaintiffs had abandoned their right to redeem. If it be the fact that the appellants have included the shares in their residuary account and have paid estate duty on them, such fact does not, in my opinion, in the circumstances constitute a sufficient ground for refusing relief. The appellants have placed so little reliance upon this fact that they have not even mentioned it in their evidence. They, no doubt, relied on being able to obtain a return of the duty if the Court were to hold that the plaintiffs were entitled to redeem.

On the whole, I have arrived at the conclusion that nothing has happened during the interval between June, 1908, and October, 1926, long though it was, to render it inequitable now to make a decree for redemption, and, accordingly, that Mr. Justice Russell was right in holding that the plaintiffs were entitled to such a decree.

The learned Judge has, however, declined to insert in the decree an order for payment by the defendants to the plaintiffs of the amount by which the mortgagee and his estate have been overpaid, on the ground that such an order is not one which can be obtained on an originating summons. With the greatest respect for the opinion of the learned Judge, I cannot agree with his decision on this point.

Order lv., rule 5*a*, provides (inter alia) that a mortgagor may take out as of course an originating summons for redemption, reconveyance and delivery of possession by the mortgagee.

The common redemption judgment against a mortgagee in possession where it is alleged that he has been overpaid contains an order on him to pay to the mortgagor the amount, if any, which shall be certified to be due from him in excess of the amount due for principal, interest, and costs (see Seton, 6th edition, Vol III., p. 1926). In my opinion, there is nothing in rule 5*a* which prevents the Court from making such an order upon an originating summons. It is not like the case of a mortgagee endeavouring to obtain, in addition to the usual foreclosure decree, a personal judgment against the mortgagor for payment of the mortgage debt. Such a personal judgment cannot be obtained on an originating summons, because it forms no part of the common order for foreclosure, and therefore does not come within Order lv., rule 5*a*. The order in a redemption action for payment by a mortgagee of the amount by which he has been overpaid, in my opinion, stands on an entirely different footing. Such an order is properly contained in a common order for redemption, because it is incidental to and consequential upon the main relief granted by such an order. An owner of the equity of redemption on redeeming is entitled to a return not only of the mortgaged property itself, but also of the fruits of that property (in the shape of income or otherwise) received by the mortgagee in excess of the amount due on his security. To hold that the Court could not make an order for the payment of such excess on an originating summons would mean that although the Court could, on such a summons, grant the main relief to which the plaintiff was entitled, an action would have to be commenced by writ before it could grant the incidental relief. Moreover, after a decree for redemption, there could be no defence to an order for the payment of the excess which the mortgagee could not raise in chambers before the Master on the making of the necessary certificate of the amount due in respect of the excess.

In the result, I am of the opinion that the plaintiffs succeed on their cross-appeal. The insertion of the order asked for by the plaintiffs involves remodelling the order by the learned Judge.

The appellants have, by their counsel, admitted assets for the purposes of this action, and on this footing the proper order to make on this appeal is, in my judgment, as follows:—

Dismiss the appeal with costs.

On the plaintiffs' cross-appeal: Discharge order of Mr. Justice Russell, and in lieu thereof order as follows:—

Let the following enquiry and accounts be made and taken, that is to say: 1, an enquiry of what shares are now subject to the mortgage or charges in the originating summons mentioned. 2, An account of what is due to the defendants under and by virtue of the said mortgage or charges and for their costs of this action and costs to be taxed. 3, An account of what is due to the defendants under and by virtue of the said mortgage or charges and for their costs of this action and costs to be taxed. 4, An account of the dividends on the shares for the time being subject to the said mortgage or charges received by Joseph Francis Lescher, decd., and by the defendants, the executors of his will since his decease, or any of them or by any other person or persons by the order or for the uses of the said J. F. Lescher, or of the defendants or any of them or which without the wilful default of the said J. F. Lescher or of the defendants or any of them might have been so received. And let what shall appear to be due on taking account No. 3 be deducted from what shall appear to be due to the defendants on account No. 2 and the balance be certified. And let, upon the plaintiffs paying to the defendants what, if anything, shall be certified to be due to them after such deduction as aforesaid, the defendants transfer the shares now subject to the said mortgage or charges to the plaintiffs or as they shall direct free and clear, &c., and deliver up, &c. But in default of the plaintiffs' paying to the defendants what shall be certified to be due to them after such deduction within the time aforesaid, let this action be dismissed out of this Court with costs to be taxed, &c. But if it shall appear on taking the said accounts that there is nothing due to the defendants, let the defendants within 21 days after the Master's certificate transfer the said shares, &c. And let the defendants within the time aforesaid pay to the plaintiffs the amount if any which shall be certified to be due from the defendants in excess of the amount due to them as aforesaid (the defendants having admitted assets of the said J. F. Lescher for that purpose), such amount to be certified. Liberty to apply.

The appellants must pay the costs of the plaintiffs' cross-appeal.

Lord Justice Sankey stated the facts, and continued.—Admittedly, no Statute of Limitations applies, but the defendants contend that equity should follow the law. They say that at the beginning of the last century equity in dealing with mortgagees of land followed or acted in the analogy of the statute, and held that where a mortgagee of land had been in possession for 20 years equity would not readily assist the mortgagor to recover the property, and that the doctrine of stale demand would bar his claim.

Then the defendants say that, by analogy, the rule was applied in cases of mortgages of personalty.

So far the argument proceeds on the lines referred to in Coote on Mortgages, 9th edition (1927), at p. 1093: "Before the passing of the statute for the limitation of actions relating to real property, there was no statutory limitation of time within which a suit in equity might have been brought for foreclosure of the equity of redemption in mortgaged land. But the statute 21 Jac. I., c. 16, s. 1 (b), enacted that no entry into lands, tenements, or hereditaments should be made but within 20 years after the right or title to the same should have accrued or descended. The Courts of equity . . . adopted the statutory rule by way of analogy and applied it to similar cases in equity, and accordingly precluded a mortgagee of land from bringing a suit in equity for foreclosure more than 20 years after his cause of action at law for ejectment had arisen."

By the Real Property Limitation Act, 1833, the period within which actions for the recovery of land must be brought was fixed at 20 years next after the time at which the right to bring such action should have first accrued, and by the Real Property Limitation Act, 1874, the period was fixed at 12 years.

The defendants' argument then proceeded that equity should follow or act upon the analogy of this later statute, and should apply the period of 12 years to mortgages of personalty, and that, therefore, in this case, the Court should not assist the plaintiffs to redeem the shares, having regard to the fact that the last acknowledgment made by the mortgagee that he was holding as mortgagee was as far back as 1908.

It may be remarked that there is no case in the reports which supports any such contention, and no recognized text-book which gives any countenance to it.

The rule begins to emerge in Floyer v. Lavington (1 P. Wms., 268), decided in 1714, and apparently disclosing a very great lapse of time—viz., 60 years. Lord Chancellor Cowper conceived "the rent charge to be not redeemable at so great a distance of time, and that this Court had heretofore gone too far in permitting redemptions."

In Lockwood v. Ewer (9 Mod., 275), decided in 1742, Lord Hardwicke refused to decree a redemption. He said (9 Mod., at p. 278) that it would be of mischievous consequence if he should decree a redemption, for the bill would never have been brought if the East India Stock had not increased in value, which was merely an accident, and could not have been foreseen at the time the mortgage was made. The time there was over 20 years. In Aggas v. Pickerell in 1745 (3 Atk., 225) a plea of limitations was allowed to a bill for redemption after a mortgagee of land had been in possession of the mortgaged premises at least 30 years, the Lord Chancellor (Lord Hardwicke) saying, "How is it possible to give a greater allowance to length of time than the statute of limitations does?"

In Case 114, Anon., in 1746 (3 Atk., 313), the Lord Chancellor (Lord Hardwicke) apparently was not prepossessed in favour of the plaintiff, whom he described as a "prowling assignee" of the equity of redemption of land, but he said "the rule in relation to redemptions . . . which was analogous to the Statute of Limitations is a very right and proper rule." He added (3 Atk., at p. 314): "I am of opinion that though no single circumstance, abstracted from the rest, will be sufficient to entitle the plaintiff to a decree, yet, taking them altogether, they are of weight enough to entitle the plaintiff to a decree."

That I conceive to be the true rule. Taking the circumstances altogether, are they of weight enough to entitle the plaintiff to a decree ?

In Smith v. Clay in 1767 (3 Bro. C.C., 640*n*) it is said : "The reporter having been favoured with a more accurate note of Lord Camden's judgment in this case than has hitherto appeared in print, he flatters himself the publication of it will be acceptable to the profession and has therefore inserted it here." The note itself is in fact from Lord Camden's own handwriting in his notebook and states : "A Court of Equity which is never active in relief against conscience, or public convenience, has always refused its aid to stale demands, where the party has slept upon his right and acquiesced for a great length of time. Nothing can call forth this Court into activity but conscience, good faith, and reasonable diligence. . . . Laches and neglect are always discountenanced, and therefore from the beginning of this jurisdiction there was always a limitation to suits in this Court."

In that case it was held that a bill of review may be barred by delay of 20 years, but the Lord Chancellor goes on : "As the Court has no legislative authority it could not properly define the time of bar by a positive rule to an hour, a minute, or a year ; it was governed by circumstances. But as often as Parliament had limited the time of actions and remedies to a certain period in legal proceedings, the Court of Chancery adopted that rule and applied to similar cases in equity. For when the Legislature had fixed the time at law it would have been preposterous for equity (which by its own proper authority always maintained a limitation) to countenance laches beyond the period that law had been confined to by Parliament. And therefore in all cases where the legal right has been barred by Parliament, the equitable right to the same thing has been concluded by the same bar."

I do not think that this means that a Court of equity is always to adopt the period fixed by Parliament, for, by the hypothesis in this particular case, no period has been fixed by Parliament. The Court is governed by the circumstances of each case. See, too, per Lord Redesdale in Hovenden v. Lord Annesley (2 Sch. and L., 607, at p. 636), where he reviews the previous cases, and per Sir Geo. Jessel, M.R., in Sutton v. Sutton (22 Ch. D., 511, at p. 515). In Archbold v. Scully (9 H.L.C., 360) Lord Campbell, the Lord Chancellor, said (9 H.L.C., at p. 371) : "The real question in the case seems to me to be whether the appellant is barred by the lapse of time between 1835 and 1857, when his bill (or cause petition) was filed. If any new rights had been created in this interval or if anyone would be prejudiced by the delay, that is, by the appellant being now enabled to make good his claim, I should be clearly of opinion that he is barred by laches or acquiescence or whatever name may be given to his long sleep over his rights. But I do not discover any obstacle of this sort to the relief which he prays."

Lord Wensleydale made the same remarks (9 H.L.C., at p. 383). In Erlanger v. New Sombrero Phosphate Company (3 App. Cas., 1218), a great authority on the common law, Lord Blackburn, uttered a note of warning on the principles of delay, although the matter under discussion had nothing to do with that now under consideration. Quoting from Lindsay Petroleum Company v. Hurd (L.R., 5 P.C., 221), he says (3 App. Cas., at p. 1279) : "In every case if an argument against relief which otherwise would be just is founded upon mere delay, that delay of course not amounting to a bar by any Statute of Limitations, the validity of that defence must be tried upon principles substantially equitable." "I think," he continued in his own words, "from the nature of the inquiry it must always be a question of more or less, depending on the degree of diligence which might reasonably be required and the degree of change which has occurred, whether the balance of justice or injustice is in favour of granting the remedy or withholding it. The determination of such a question must largely depend upon the turn of mind of those who have to decide, and must therefore be subject to uncertainty."

It is not necessary to go through all the cases, because they are only illustrations of the application of the rule to the particular facts of the case, and those cited show what facts have from time to time been taken into consideration. Two examples are : London and Midland Bank v. Mitchell (15 The Times L.R., 420 ; [1899] 2 Ch., 161) and Brooks v. Muckleston ([1909] 2 Ch., 519), decisions of Mr. Justice Stirling and Mr. Justice Joyce respectively.

Story's Equity Jurisprudence, 12th ed. (1877), at page 1030, states, in my view, the true rule. The learned author begins by saying, "Let us now pass to a brief consideration of the doctrine of equity applicable to mortgages and pledges of personal property," and contends that in mortgages of personal property, although the prescribed condition has not been fulfilled, there exists, as in mortgages of land, an equity of redemption which may be asserted by the mortgagor if he brings his bill to redeem within a reasonable time. That, in my view, is the difference in principle between mortgages of land, as governed by statute, and mortgages of personalty, the redemption of which depends upon equitable doctrines founded upon what is just and reasonable, having regard to all the circumstances of the case.

Nowhere is it suggested in the text-books that the period of 20 years should now be reduced to 12.

In Robbins' Law of Mortgages (1897), page 742, the law as to redemption of mortgaged personalty is stated as in Coote, and no suggestion is made of a 12 years' rule. In Fisher's Law of Mortgage, 6th ed. (1910), page 717, the question of the remedy in equity for redemption of pledges of goods and stock is discussed ; again with no mention of a period of 12 years. The author says: "The privilege of redemption will be sparingly allowed if the action appear to have been brought on account of an accidental increase in the value of the pledge." With regard to a pledge, it is suggested it may be redeemed at any time during the lifetime of the pledgor, except during outlawry.

It will therefore be seen that there are no decided cases and no text-books of authority which support the contention that the Court should now adopt the 12 years' rule.

I doubt the wisdom of laying down a hard and fast rule in equity, that any particular number of years should bar a mortgagor's right to redeem personal property : that would be to make equity governed by an Act of Parliament, whereas Parliament has not thought fit to legislate for this particular case.

In my opinion, the Court, in deciding the problem, must have regard to all the circumstances of the case. Unreasonable delay may bar the mortgagor's right to redeem. What is reasonable is a question of fact. No doubt, length of time is a material consideration and an important fact. On the other hand, an equally important fact is the consideration whether there has been any change in the position of the mortgagee or anyone claiming under him, so as to make it neither just nor convenient nor, indeed, possible to restore the parties to the original position. Again, the recognized legal exceptions contained in the statute which prevent time from running must be taken into consideration. Beyond that there is the fact, in the present case, that, for some years during the period in question, a war was going on, during which some people did not insist upon or put forward their rights. In the present case the sole question, in my view, is whether the delay of the mortgagors in applying to redeem is such that it ought to bar their right. Here there has been no such change in the position of the parties as to make it impossible to restore them to their original position. To that position they can be remitted without difficulty, without inconvenience, and without injustice to themselves or prejudice to third parties. That there has been delay must be conceded. If the period is taken, as the learned Judge in the Court below took it, from the date when the debt was satisfied, in 1921, it is clear that the subsequent delay is not sufficient to bar ; but I do not think that the Court ought to adopt the period of 12 years contended for by the appellants, and even if the delay has to be reckoned from June, 1908, I see nothing to compel us, having regard to all the circumstances, to say that it is so long that it ought to bar the plaintiffs' claim.

In my opinion the appeal should be dismissed.

Upon the cross-appeal I wish to say nothing except that I agree with what has been said by the other members of the Court.

LITTAUER GLOVE CORPORATION v. F. W. MILLINGTON (1920), LIMITED.*

Company—Residence—Foreign State—Jurisdiction of State Courts—Test of residence.

To constitute residence by a British company in a foreign State so as to render the company subject to the jurisdiction of the Courts of that State, the company must to some extent carry on business in that State at a definite and reasonably permanent place.

His Lordship gave judgment for the defendants in this action, which raised the question whether under international law, a judgment of the Supreme Court of the State of New York was enforceable in the English Courts when the defendants were a corporation and were only present in that State by means of a director doing business there.

The action was brought by the Littauer Glove Corporation, an American company, of 235, Fourth-avenue, New York, who claimed (inter alia) from Fred W. Millington (1920), Limited, of Industry House, 57, Dale-street, Manchester, £5,369 16s. 9d., being the equivalent of $23,868, alleged to be due from the defendants under a judgment of the Supreme Court of the State of New York, dated May 9, 1922. Interest was claimed from that date.

The defendants denied that the American Court in question had any jurisdiction over them.

Mr. C. T. Le Quesne, K.C., and Mr. Frank Gahan appeared for the plaintiffs ; Mr. Singleton, K.C., and Mr. E. Stewart-Brown for the defendants.

Mr. Singleton said that the defendants' contention was that, if the plaintiffs ever began an action against them in the State of New York, and if the Court there adjudged that the plaintiffs should recover the amount sued for—neither of which matters was admitted—that Court had no jurisdiction over the subject matter of the action. They (the defendants) were not subjects of, or resident, or present, or domiciled in, and owed no allegiance to, the State of New York, and were not subject to the jurisdiction of the Court. They did not appear in the action and were never served with any process.

To succeed, the plaintiffs must prove that the defendants had a fixed place of business in the State of New York, so as to make them resident and liable to the jurisdiction of the Court there. He cited Emanuel v. Symon (24 The Times L.R., 85 ; [1908] 1 K.B., 302) ; Turnbull v. Walker (9 The Times L.R., 99) ; Schibsby v. Westerholz (L.R., 6 Q.B., 155) ; Carrick v. Hancock (12 The Times L.R., 59) ; *Dunlop Pneumatic Tyre Company, Ltd. v. Actien-Gesellschaft für Motor und Motorfahrzeugbau vorm. Mr. Richard H. Millington, managing director of the defendant company, said that he went to the United States in 1922. He was in New York four or five nights, and stayed at an hotel. He did business for his company in New York and various other places which he visited. He was served personally with the writ in the American action in the office of the Union Mills, New York, to which address some of his letters had been sent. His company owned no property of any kind in the United States. They took no part in the proceedings against them, and entered no appearance.

In cross-examination by Mr. Le Quesne, the witness said that at one time it was his and his brother's custom to be in New York in the early part of the year. They went to buy, not to sell, goods.

That concluded the case for the defendants.

Mr. W. H. Wilson, called on behalf of the plaintiffs, said that on March 30, 1922, he served Mr. R. H. Millington with the writ in the New York action.

Mr. Le Quesne said that the question was whether the defendant company were resident in the State of New York so as to come within the jurisdiction of the Court there. He submitted that it was not necessary for him to show that the defendants were carrying on their business at a fixed place. It was not disputed that it was not necessary to show that the company were carrying on the whole of their business where the debt was incurred, and he contended that the defendants were carrying on business wherever they were buying goods.

His LORDSHIP.—Do you say that a company resides wherever its commercial travellers put up?

Mr. LE QUESNE.—Yes ; I submit that the company is resident by its travellers, and would be subject to process of the country in which they happened to be. For income-tax purposes it has been held that a company can be resident in several places at once.

Counsel cited, in addition to cases referred to by Mr. SINGLETON, Logan v. Bank of Scotland (20 The Times L.R., 640 ; [1904] 2 K.B., 495) ; and New York Life Insurance Co. v. Public Trustee (40 The Times L.R., 430 ; [1924] 2 Ch., 101, at p. 120).

His LORDSHIP, in giving judgment, said that the action was partly brought on a judgment of the Supreme Court of the State of New York in respect of goods sold and delivered.

The plaintiffs were manufacturers in the State of New York ; the defendants were an English limited liability company. The defendants' registered office and principal place of business were in Manchester, and they had branches in London and elsewhere. They were clothiers' merchants, buying from manufacturers in various parts of the world and selling to wholesalers.

The chairman of the defendant company was Mr. Fred Millington, and the managing director was his brother, Mr. Richard Millington, who had given evidence.

It had been the practice for one of them to visit the United States on purely business visits, the object being that they should see samples and make purchases.

In 1922 Mr. Millington arrived in New York on March 17, and left on that day for St. Johnsville, about eight hours distant. The principal suppliers of the defendant company in the United States were the Union Mills Corporation at St. Johnsville. That corporation had a sales office in New York at 377, Broadway. Mr. Millington stayed at St. Johnsville two days. After that he returned to New York, and then visited Tennessee, Georgia, and Philadelphia, and in each of these States he placed orders.

On March 28 he returned to New York and stayed at an hotel. While in New York he made some use of the office of the Union Mills Corporation. He said that he transacted no business there except what he did with that corporation, seeing samples and buying goods.

On March 30 he was served at that office with some process of the Supreme Court of the State of New York, and on March 31 he went to St. Johnsville for the week-end.

On April 1 the plaintiffs took out a summons against the defendants. On April 3 Mr. Millington returned to New York, and on that day, while he was in the office of the Union Mills, he was served with process in the present matter. He entered no appearance, took no step in the proceedings, and did not submit to the jurisdiction of the American Court. On April 4 he sailed for England. The plaintiffs proceeded with their action and obtained judgment in default of appearance.

He (his Lordship) had to decide whether at the time of the beginning of the action—namely, April 1, 1922—the defendant company were resident in the State of New York so as to have the benefit and be under the protection of the laws of that State.

What was meant by saying that a business corporation was resident in a foreign jurisdiction for that purpose? That depended on whether, on the day in question, it was carrying on business in the foreign State so that it could fairly and properly be said to be then resident in that State. If the defendant company were resident in the State of New York on April 1, 1922, where in that State were they resident? Mr. Le Quesne said that they were resident in Broadway, New York, but there must be some place of residence on which one could put a finger. There was no suggestion that the name of the defendant company was in any way displayed at the address in Broadway, or that any letter-paper of the company was used there, or that any business was done there except what the company did with firms in other parts of the United States. If the defendant company were resident in Broadway, it would follow that they were resident wherever Mr. Millington did business. He was, however, nothing more than a commercial traveller on that tour.

If the company had 40 or 50 travellers ranging all over the world, was it to be said that the company were resident wherever the travellers put up at an hotel and took orders ? He (his Lordship) did not rely on the expression "fixed place," but on what was the fair meaning of "residence." The inference which he drew from the cases cited was that there must be some carrying on of business at a definite and, to some reasonable extent, permanent place. There was no residence within the jurisdiction on the part of the defendant company, and the action on that point must fail.

There would be judgment for the defendant company, with costs, so far as this was an action on a foreign judgment, and the rest of the case would go to the Official Referee.

EGYPTIAN DELTA LAND AND INVESTMENT COMPANY, LIMITED v. TODD.*

Revenue—Income - tax—Company—Residence—Real business abroad—Whether resident in this country—Income Tax Act, 1918 (8 and 9 Geo. V., c. 40), Sched. D, Cases IV. and V.

A company which is registered in this country but carries on its real business abroad does not necessarily reside in this country, so as to be liable to income-tax, because it is obliged by law to perform in this country certain duties which cannot be performed abroad, such as having a registered office and keeping a register of shareholders. For income-tax purposes a company resides where its real business is carried on.

Decision of the Court of Appeal (43 The Times L.R., 275 ; [1928] 1 K.B., 152) reversed.

This was an appeal from an order of the Court of Appeal (43 The Times L.R., 275 ; [1928] 1 K.B., 152), affirming an order of Mr. Justice Rowlatt (43 The Times L.R., 70), on a case stated by the Commissioners for the General Purposes of the Income Tax Acts for the City of London.

* Reported by H. B. HEMMING, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The question raised by the appeal was whether a company incorporated under the Companies Acts must necessarily be held to be resident in the United Kingdom, although it merely fulfilled the strict statutory requirements cast on it by those Acts, and its business and affairs were entirely controlled, managed, and carried on outside the United Kingdom.

The appellant company was incorporated in 1904 under the Companies Acts with a nominal capital of £500,000. Its main objects were to acquire, hold, sell, let, or otherwise dispose of and deal in land situate in any district in Egypt served, or thereafter to be served, by railways belonging to the Egyptian Delta Light Railways, Limited, and to develop the resources of such lands in such ways as might seem capable of improving the property and undertaking of the company.

In 1907, in pursuance of special resolutions passed in that behalf, the business of the company was transferred to Cairo, and since that date had been controlled, managed, directed, and carried on entirely in Cairo, with the following results. In 1907 all the London directors retired, and a new board of directors was appointed, consisting of four members all permanently resident in Cairo. Since 1907 there had been no meeting of directors in the United Kingdom ; the secretary-general of the company resided in Egypt ; the seal had been removed to and was kept in Egypt ; the minute books and all the books of account had been removed to Egypt, and remained there ; and the banking account of the company was with the National Bank of Egypt at Cairo. The company's former account with the London agency of the same bank had never been formally closed, but was only used by the London agency for debiting small disbursements, not exceeding £8 or £9 in any year, made by the agency on instructions from Egypt, no cheques being drawn on the account.

The register of transfers was kept in Cairo, where transfers of shares were passed before being registered in London. Dividends were declared in and paid exclusively from Cairo. All meetings of the company were held in Cairo. The reports of the directors were sent out from Cairo, and there was a duplicate register of shareholders in Cairo. To comply with the requirements of the Companies Acts there was a registered office of the company in London, at which the registers of members and directors and also a register of bearer warrants were kept. To meet those statutory requirements the company paid a fee to Mr. F. J. Horne, who carried on the business of secretary of public companies, and who provided them with a registered office at his address at Gresham House, Old Broad-street, where the name of the company, together with the names of five other companies, appeared on the door. For those services and for small incidental expenses Mr. Horne received £35 per quarter, which he paid into an account in his own name with the London agency of the National Bank of Egypt. No separate room or part of a room was appropriated to the company.

The General Commissioners found that the London secretary's position was purely formal, and that he had no authority to do anything more than the law required the company to do here.

Assessments to income-tax having been made on the company under Schedule D on rents and interest on mortgages for the six tax years 1919-20 to 1924-25, the company appealed.

The General Commissioners, distinguishing Swedish Central Railway Company, Limited v. Thompson (41 The Times L.R., 385 ; [1925] A.C., 495), found that the company was not resident in this country for the purposes of the Income Tax Acts, and allowed the appeal.

Mr. Justice Rowlatt reversed the decision of the General Commissioners, and the Court of Appeal (the Master of the Rolls (Lord Hanworth), Lord Justice Sargant, and Lord Justice Lawrence) affirmed his judgment.

Mr. Macmillan, K.C., the Hon. Geoffrey Lawrence, K.C., and Mr. Bremner appeared for the appellants ; the Attorney-General, who, when the case was argued, was Sir Douglas Hogg, K.C., and Mr. R. P. Hills for the Crown.

VISCOUNT SUMNER.—My Lords: The General Commissioners' finding, upon evidence which was sufficient to support it, was in favour of the subjects. It can only be challenged upon some ground of law sufficient to enable the Inland Revenue to succeed, which they overlooked. Accordingly the respondent contends, and necessarily so, that incorporation under the Companies (Consolidation) Act, 1908, with the attendant statutory obligations, in itself and as a matter of law makes a British company a "person resident in the United Kingdom" within the Income Tax Act, 1918. If this had been merely a factor to be considered along with others relating to the company's affairs it would have been, like other questions of fact and of degree, a matter for the General Commissioners and their finding in favour of the appellants would be conclusive.

The word "resident," used for over a century in these taxing Acts, was introduced long before limited liability was freely recognized by the law, but in and before 1853 all incorporations were brought under charge. None existed with the precise forms of incorporation and obligation enacted for companies with limited liability since 1862. The words "a person resident" were, of course, used of incorporated persons without any reference to the provisions subsequently enacted.

My Lords, I think it follows that the first question here is the interpretation of the Companies (Consolidation) Act, 1908, and not that of the Income Tax Acts. Only if its provisions make an English limited liability company resident in England does any further question arise. Now the Companies (Consolidation) Act, 1908, says nothing about the "residence" of the companies incorporated under it and as regards income-tax it was passed alio intuitu. The question is not "Where does such a company reside, if it must reside somewhere?" but "Has the Act of 1908 constituted for companies any residence at all?"—a thing not in any case analogous to the residence of an individual. Residence is not inherent in a company in the nature of things and residence for the purpose of taxation is matter for express legislation.

Furthermore, down even to 1853 most taxpayers were natural persons. As to number it is so still, though whether they now pay more than do companies I do not know. Throughout the Income Tax Acts "resident," with its various qualifications "actually," "ordinarily," "occasionally," "temporarily" and so forth, is used in a sense in every way appropriate to natural persons, but only artificially applicable to incorporated persons and never really appropriate. Indeed, I think that "a person ordinarily resident in the United Kingdom" as used in the Income Tax Acts, is so inappropriate a term for a person, albeit an artificial one, who is always and by law immovably resident in the United Kingdom, that it cannot be sustained ; and so the Legislature itself seems to have thought, for I find in section 39 of the Finance (No. 2) Act, 1915 (a cognate enactment to the Income Tax Act), the provision that "the . . . businesses, to which this Part of this Act applies, are all . . . businesses . . . carried on in the United Kingdom, or owned or carried on in any other place by persons ordinarily resident in the United Kingdom," which is the formula thought necessary to include the English businesses of companies and to bring them under excess profits duty.

At first, perhaps, the Courts might have said that, as a corporation could not "reside" anywhere in any true sense, they must leave it to the Legislature to enact residence in an artificial sense, but they felt bound to make the Acts work as they found them and arrived at a compromise, under which certain propositions, I think, are now well settled. The word "resident," it is laid down, has to be applied to artificial persons by analogy from natural persons. With these residence depends on personal facts. Place of birth, nationality and allegiance are not the tests, nor is domicile, except in a sense that makes it barely distinguishable from residence. Voluntary choice and habitual and repeated action are mainly material, such as making a home, keeping an establishment, pursuing a settled object in or at a particular place. A man can change his residence at will, except that a certain duration of time or fixity of decision is requisite, and, but for the peculiar cases of a convict in gaol or a lunatic lawfully detained in a madhouse, I do not think that residence is ever determined for a natural person simply by the law. Accordingly, under the decisions as well as in principle "resident" is a term exceedingly unsuited to describe a statutory person, which can never be non-resident because, by the law of its being, it is a fixture. The analogy that is really possible between a natural person and a company is that of carrying on business at a place, great or small, and in my opinion for the purpose of income-tax, both on the words of the Acts and on the cases, the residence of a foreign company is preponderantly, if not exclusively, determined by this kind of fact.

Turning now to the Companies (Consolidation) Act, 1908, a form of incorporation is indeed prescribed, but how does that affect the matter any more than the sealing of a Royal charter or the Royal assent to a private Bill? This at most does no more than bring the embryo company to the birth, which in a natural person is not the test. The first effect of the incorporation is to make the new company amenable to English law and English law Courts and to give it the status of an English company, but these things only place it in the same position as a British subject born or domiciled here, or as a natural person, who, "resident" or not, is within reach of English legal process. Then the company is to be wound up or to get leave to alter its memorandum or to reduce its capital in an English Court of law. The domiciled Englishman is similarly under this personal law as to marriage and divorce, intestate administration and bankruptcy. An English company must, under English law, pay its debts and may be fined, but so may anyone else who can be duly served with process for acts justiciable in this country. There is no analogy to "residence" here in the sense settled by the decisions for natural persons. These matters depend on the duty of obedience to English law.

What does the Companies (Consolidation) Act, 1908, say more? A company must have a registered office in the United Kingdom, though it can move it about. Then it must keep certain lists and registers and allow inquirers to inspect them, and, although failure in any of these respects does not ipso facto work its dissolution nor is performance of these essential and important obligations a condition concurrent to its continuing to be incorporated, heavy fines may be inflicted for non-performance and, if not paid, may, I assume, lead to winding-up. My Lords, between these requirements and the case of a natural person there is no analogy at all, for the natural person is not subject to them. How then do they constitute a residence such as is shared by a natural person and is analogous to his? It is said that the company is always really present at its registered office and, if you seek it, there you will find it. I can make little of this. The Income Tax Acts themselves distinguish between being "in" this country and being "resident" here (No. 2 of the Miscellaneous Rules applicable to schedule D), and Mr. Cadwalader in Cooper v. Cadwalader (5 Tax Cas., 101) and Miss Reid in Reid v. Inland Revenue Commissioners ([1926] S.C., 589) are examples of persons who had a "residence" here, though they were themselves nearly always elsewhere. At night and on Sundays and holidays you will not find the company at its head office, except in a mystical sense, but I would point out that a truer analogy and a more satisfying residence is to be found in "keeping house and doing business" there than in a continuous statutory presence, even during the hours of darkness and of Divine worship. I respectfully find this argument too transcendental for acceptance. Furthermore, all these requirements are enacted for other purposes than those of taxing profits and gains. As far as the Companies (Consolidation) Act, 1908, goes no business need be done at this office and no profits or losses made there. Nobody in authority need be present, perhaps nobody at all. The inspection of these registers and so on is the price paid for limitation of liability. It is directed for the assistance of creditors or intending creditors. It is not devised in order to attract tax. That is the business of a special taxing Act.

It is, I think, a legitimate test to see what is the minimum action by the company which will satisfy the Act, for, if the argument for the Crown is right, even that minimum must inevitably result in "residence" here. The head office need not be in any frequented or convenient place. It may be shared with any number of other persons, natural or incorporated. Whatever has to be done may be left, as it was here, to an independent contractor. No officer of the company nor even any servant need attend. The provisions of the Income Tax Act, 1918, which regulate the place at which a taxpayer is to be assessed, ignore altogether the head office of a company which does not carry on its business there. (See Rule 4 (1) of the Miscellaneous Rules applicable to Schedule D.) Either the place of trade or the place of manufacture or the "ordinary residence" is to be the place. If the appellant company has no place of trade here and does nothing at its head office but the minimum and occasional formalities required by the Act it is surely an impossible straining of plain words to call that its "ordinary residence." I cannot find anything to forbid the discharge of these obligations by purely mechanical means. A name on a doorpost; a letter-box in a door accessible to the public; a glass-fronted case under a lamp containing the lists required so placed that they may always be read from outside, with an occasional visit of a clerk to alter the lists and take away the letters, would seem to satisfy the Act —though, of course, I express no decided opinion about it. In so far as service may be by post or delivery at the office the letter-box suffices. If it has to be personal the Act merely authorizes someone whom the company arranges to have there—an office-keeper or a typist—to accept service, a thing which the company might have done for itself. Notices and returns could be sent to the Registrar from abroad. Though the spirit of the company may be imagined to brood over these arrangements, I do not see how the company itself is there at all. The office is its English address, but its business may be elsewhere. If this is "residence" I think it is "residence" not by analogy to that of a natural person but by an independent metaphor. At any rate, if it is to be called "residence" only the Legislature can do it. In doing so a Court of construction would not be interpreting the Act but amending it. Either the Companies (Consolidation) Act, 1908, should say "a company registered under this Act is always resident at its registered office for all purposes," though "residence" is a matter quite outside the scope of an Act which deals only with a company's constitution, obligations and rights, or the Income Tax Act should say "a company registered under the Companies Acts shall be deemed to be at all times a person resident in the United Kingdom for income-tax purposes," which would raise a crop of difficulties for the Inland Revenue in other directions to be dealt with when the time comes.

As to the authorities, this point exactly in its present form appears not to have been actually decided before this case, but in my opinion the Swedish Central Railway case (41 The Times L.R., 385; [1925] A.C., 495) does not at all conclude it, and, on the other hand, the whole current of authority since the Cesena Sulphur Company's case (1 Ex.D., 428) has been such as to make the point one which should be decided against the Revenue and should not be reopened.

All that was decided in the Swedish Central Railway case (supra) was that the company could have two residences, one in England as well as one in Sweden. Your Lordships were not asked to decide more. It is true that by admission the controlling power over the business was in Sweden, but other business was done in London, the character and importance of which, though set out in the case, was not discussed at the Bar. It was a matter of degree on the facts, and your Lordships cannot be deemed to have come to some unexpressed conclusion on that ground merely because you did not for yourselves declare either that there was no evidence of business carried on in England or that there was no need to discuss the carrying on of business, because the effect of registration was conclusive. Nor is it decisive of the point to say now that the business done in England was only administrative. It was in fact a good deal more, and in the static condition of the company's affairs it was not much less important than the Swedish part. If new questions arose the Swedish directors could settle them, but as things were little had to be done anywhere except "administration," as is often the case with companies, and that was fairly divided between the two countries. I would particularly draw attention to the powerful judgments of my noble and learned friend Lord Atkinson and of Lord Justice Atkin as showing how strong are the grounds for saying that since the De Beers case (22 The Times L.R., 756; [1906] A.C., 455) the test of taxable residence for any company has been settled to be the carrying on of business here and not the bare operation of the Companies (Consolidation) Act, 1908.

In the Court of Appeal the majority in the Swedish Central Railway case (supra) held not only that a company could have more residences than one but that the English registration, together with the English statutory requirements, would suffice to constitute such residence, even though the central control of the business carried on was abroad. This was the argument for the Crown, advanced then, so far as I know, for the first time in any case, by Sir Patrick Hastings. Before your Lordships Sir Douglas Hogg presented the case in a rather different form ([1925] A.C., at pp. 498-499): "Unless it is established that central control is the sole and conclusive test of residence . . . the finding of the Commissioners disposes of the case. . . . If necessary, it is submitted that a company has a residence where its registered office is, though it may also have a residence where its central control abides." It is, I think, plain that your Lordships' House affirmed the judgment of the Court of Appeal on the first of these two grounds only, for the Lord Chancellor says at page 501: "An individual may clearly have more than one residence . . . and on principle there appears to be no reason why a company should not be in the same position. The central management and control of a company may be divided and it may 'keep house and do business' in more than one place; and, if so, it may have more than one residence." This was said with reference to the fact that there was evidence, on which the Special Commissioners could act, of business done in England sufficient in importance and in amount to give a residence on that ground. The Lord Chancellor then, at page 505, expressly reserved the point now in debate. No other noble Lord went beyond his above-quoted words and Lord Buckmaster, at page 519, after referring to New Zealand Shipping Company, Limited v. Thew (8 Tax Cas., 208) says, "For purposes of our income-tax the real and not a merely nominal residence was here, and if there were also residence elsewhere that did not displace it. The reference to the registered office is important; it is, to my mind, one of the critical facts in determination of residence in this country, but not necessarily the sole and exclusive fact." This was in accordance with the whole current of authority down to that time, and I would observe that the importance of the fact was for the Special Commissioners.

My Lords, as I venture to think that the law has been already decided against the respondent's proposition or, if not formally decided, has so long been taken at the Bar and on the Bench to be settled, I must, I fear, defend this position even at the cost of treading again the weary road of the tax cases. This question was a live question over fifty years ago. It was formally contended in Attorney-General v. Alexander (L.R., 10 Ex. 20, at p. 28) that a corporation's "seat and residence can only be in the country where it is constituted," a labour-saving proposition that must have commended itself very strongly and would hardly be rejected, if it could reasonably have been entertained. The case was decided on the ground that, apart from questions of residence in the country of incorporation, the claim for tax failed because the bank did not carry on business here, as the Attorney-General claimed that it did. I will, however, quote his argument. At page 26 he says:—"Such a body has no locality except by its acts and must be said to reside where its substantial business is carried on," and at page 30, Chief Baron Kelly says, "If . . . this corporation can be said to be resident anywhere . . . it must be resident in Constantinople, where alone it has its 'seat,'" not, that is, its place of incorporation but its chief place of business, while Baron Amphlett, at page 37, makes his opinion plain that the locality of this seat alone and not the place of incorporation determines the question of residence. In the Cesena Sulphur and Calcutta Jute Companies' cases (1 Ex.D., 428), the Attorney-General again contended, alternatively to the carrying on of business here, that the "seat and residence can only be in the country where it is created and constituted." For this sundry United States cases were referred to, which were not much in point, but the challenge was boldly taken up by counsel for the Calcutta Jute Company, who says at page 442, "the test of residence, at least for fiscal purposes, is not where the company is incorporated, but where is the real trading carried on."

How, then, do the learned Barons deal with the point thus clearly raised before them? At page 445, Chief Baron Kelly answers the question, "what is the meaning of the word 'residing' as applied to a joint stock company?" thus: "Whether there may or may not be more than one place at which the same joint stock company can reside, I express no opinion at present—a joint stock company resides where its place of incorporation is, where the meetings of the whole company . . . are held and where its governing body meets in bodily presence . . . and exercises the powers conferred upon it . . . ." Baron Huddleston, at page 452, says, "I adopt Mr. Matthews's suggestion that 16 and 17 Vict., c. 34, when it speaks of 'residing,' does not mean an artificial residence. It means an actual residence." Then he shows at page 453 how and in what sense actual residence is used, when, negativing the Crown's contention that "if a company was registered in England it must be held to reside in England," he says, "Registration like the birth of an individual is a fact which must be taken into consideration . . . but it is only a circumstance," and he goes on to review as other circumstances all the direction and control and administration which take place in England, leading to the conclusion that when those circumstances show the main place of business to be here, then and thereby the company resides here.

Your Lordships will observe that so much of the respondent's present contention as rests on an English company's "residence" in the country of its incorporation was raised in the Cesena case (supra) by Sir John Holker (Attorney-General), and was negatived by both the learned Judges of the Court of Exchequer. So much was an express decision and is now in point, and the Cesena case (supra) has not only never been overruled but it has far too long been cited with respect to be overruled now, nor were your Lordships asked to do so. How are we to decline to follow it? No doubt the case could have been decided, as it was decided, without dealing with this point, but are we to say that the Court's rejection of it, which was explicit, was therefore a mere obiter dictum now, or that the point remains open because the Attorney-General argued it without mentioning the statutory obligations which the Companies Acts imposed? All that remains is an argument, which Sir John Holker (not ignorant of the Companies Acts, I am sure) elected to pass by, namely, the statutory obligations of such a company. Surely this does not reopen the decision.

Before passing from the Cesena case (supra) the case of Imperial Continental Gas Association v. Nicholson (37 L.T., 717), also decided by Chief Baron Kelly and Baron Huddleston shortly afterwards, ought to be mentioned. In it the same differences in language between the two judgments is to be noticed. Both agreed that, as regards the question of Schedule D, the two cases are on all fours. Chief Baron Kelly (p. 721) says "this being a foreign undertaking . . . belonging to a joint stock company, established, incorporated, and resident in England . . . the whole of the profits . . . are assessable to income-tax in this country," while Baron Huddleston says (p. 722), "here . . . according to the decision of the Court in the Calcutta Jute Mills case (supra), the business is carried on at the place whence the orders emanate. That is the central point where the business is carried on . . . and where the whole transactions occur and . . . it would be assessed here."

So matters stood for over thirty years. Importance chiefly attached to the place where control of the business was exercised (see San Paulo (Brazilian) Railway Company, Limited v. Carter; 12 The Times L.R., 107; [1896] A.C., 31), the place of incorporation being a subordinate matter and the subsequent statutory requirements attracting no attention at all. Then in 1906 the De Beers case (supra), albeit that of a foreign company, was decided in terms which in my opinion render it conclusive of the present issue.

It was at one time thought that the authority of the Cesena Company's case (supra) had been shaken (see per Mr. Justice Charles in London Bank of Mexico and South America v. Apthorpe; [1891] 1 Q.B., at p. 388), and in 1904, in Goerz and Co. v. Bell (20 The Times L.R., 348; [1904] 2 K.B., 136), "residence" again came up for discussion before Mr. Justice Channell. Though registered abroad, the Goerz Company had its head office in London, where the directing and controlling power was exercised, and the case directly raised the question, whether a company, registered abroad and not in the United Kingdom, can reside here for income-tax purposes. Wingate's case (24 R., 939), which was cited in Goerz and Co.'s case (supra), was one in which a foreign company, though taxed because it carried on the whole of its business here, was yet held to have been "resident" abroad. In Goerz and Co.'s case (supra) the Attorney-General contended, and so Mr. Justice Channell held, that registration was only one point to be considered and that the carrying on of the business of the company was the substantial test. After suggesting that a company may possibly have two residences, he asks whether the registration and incorporation abroad prevented residence in the United Kingdom, and replies that the English Companies Acts provide in the registered office of a company the place where anyone who wants to find the company officially must go to find it, and adds that the company in question merely provided by its articles that all summonses and notices should be served at its head office, in effect saying that "so far as the company has a local habitation it is at the head office," but, as the control and direction were exercised from London, which was the true head office, he finally held that, notwithstanding the South African registration and incorporation, the company was resident in London and was chargeable accordingly. "If it were necessary to decide between Johannesburg and London," he says, "I think that the considerations which go to make up the local habitation of such a body rather show that this company is to be found in London and not in Johannesburg." This sentence supports the finding of the General Commissioners in the present case, but how the previous observations can assist the Inland Revenue I am at a loss to imagine, while the statement positively made in Egyptian Hotels, Limited v. Mitchell (30 The Times L.R., 457; [1914] 3 K.B., 118, at p. 132) without discussion, that residence follows from incorporation here, must be read in its context, namely, a business carried on here by a person who is charged as a "resident" here.

It was in this state of the authorities that the De Beers case (supra) was decided in the House of Lords in 1906. The appellants argued that "a company resides where it is registered and nowhere else," a proposition which, even in a case relating to a foreign company, almost necessarily involved some consideration of the effect of the Companies Acts in this connexion, whether it was discussed or not. This perfectly general proposition, which had been advanced by former Crown counsel almost in the same terms in the Cesena case (supra), was now met by a total denial. Sir Robert Finlay (Attorney-General) was not heard in the House of Lords, it is true, but in the Court below he is reported as saying "the question where a company resides is mainly a question of fact. The place of its incorporation or registration is one circumstance, but only a circumstance, to be taken into account," accepting and citing the Cesena Sulphur Company's case (supra) as authority, equally in the case of a foreign as in that of an English company. In an often-quoted passage Lord Loreburn rejected the appellants' contention. The process of deciding the residence of a company, he said, was one of seeing where it really keeps house and does business, not of considering the place or the form of its incorporation or the statutory obligations imposed by the lex loci. He then said that the Cesena case (supra) and the Calcutta Jute case (supra), in the former of which he had himself appeared as counsel, had been acted on for thirty years and involved the principle that a company resides for purposes of income-tax where its real business is carried on, and "the real business is carried on where the central management and control actually abides." "I regard that," he said, "as the true rule," and Lords Macnaghten and Robertson concurred without more, while Lord James of Hereford added a remark, which shows how prominently the question of the place of registration was before the mind of the House.

So far, my Lords, it does not seem to have occurred to any Judge that there might be two kinds of residence or two tests of its acquisition, one for the purpose of entangling foreign companies in British taxation, and another for that of tying British companies down, so that they cannot wholly escape it. I submit that such a doctrine is illogical in form and in substance unjust. Residence may no doubt be constituted by various kinds of acts, but how it can be constituted in one place by doing something there and, at the same time, in another place by doing nothing I cannot understand.

In considering the true effect of the decision in the De Beers case (supra) the following matters have to be borne in mind. (1) At that time and for twenty years afterwards it was assumed that a limited liability company could not have two residences for income-tax purposes; either it resided abroad or it did not. (2) The Cesena Sulphur Company's case (supra) was open to review both in the Court of Appeal and in the House of Lords and, although it had stood for thirty years, it had been criticized in the meantime, and what appeared to be its principal ruling was expressly challenged. (3) It was, therefore, natural and proper to consider not only the fact that the De Beers Company was registered abroad but the circumstances of that registration. To this I wish to direct attention. The De Beers Company was incorporated, as the report of the case before Mr. Justice Phillimore states, under section 3 of the Act 13 of 1888 of the Cape of Good Hope, which enabled a company, registered with limited liability under the Cape Colony Act No. 4 of 1861, to become a body corporate on satisfying certain formalities. The material provisions of the Act of 1861 were that it applied to partnerships of more than twenty-five members, and to partnerships whereof the capital was divided into shares transferable without the express consent of all the members. Such partnerships could obtain from the Colonial Registrar of Deeds a certificate of registration with limited liability. They had to lodge with him their deed of settlement, executed by not less than twenty-five shareholders holding not less than three-fourths of the nominal capital and endorsed with a certificate that not less than 10 per cent. had been paid up by them, and the Registrar was to receive and to keep a copy of such deed with a list of the shareholders and of the number of their shares. Thereafter the joint stock company had to expose its name on the outside of every office where its business was carried on. No increase could be made in its capital until it had been registered with the Registrar, with proof of payment of 10 per cent. on the increased capital, and, in case of the execution of new or supplementary deeds of settlement, copies had to be lodged with him. Twice a year the directors had to make a return to the Registrar of every transfer made in the company's share register and of the changes in the names of the existing shareholders by marriage or otherwise. The returns, deeds, and registers thus kept by the Registrar were open to public inspection on payment of a fee, not exceeding one shilling, and copies might be taken and were to be receivable in evidence. The performance of these obligations was enforced by liability to fines, and the certificate of registration conferred on members the benefit of limited liability.

My Lords, I think it is evident that in choosing between registration and carrying on business as the proper test for the single residence of the De Beers Company it was proper to inquire into the circumstances of its registration and not merely to act upon the fact and the place, and, as it was proper and natural to do so, I presume that it was done. The report does not mention any argument of counsel or judicial observation upon the Act above cited, but, even if counsel can be supposed to have overlooked it, one must presume that the Lords Justices and the noble and learned Lords did not neglect to consider all relevant materials. This Act is, I think, sufficiently in pari materia, both in its scheme and in its details, with the Companies (Consolidation) Act, 1908, to have brought before the minds of both tribunals all the considerations on which the counsel for the Crown have relied in the present case. Accordingly it seems to me that the decision against the South African registration as the determining factor of the company's residence was really in the circumstances a judicial negation of the Attorney-General's argument and is more than a mere adoption of the previous decision, that registration alone, apart from consequent statutory obligation, will not establish residence. Having adopted that view, the further adoption of control and carrying on of business as the test alike for the De Beers Company and for the Cesena Sulphur Company followed in logical course. I submit that, even technically, the De Beers case (supra) is a binding authority to-day. Even if it be otherwise and there be no technical decision of the issue, whether a British company may not acquire a taxable residence here both by carrying on business here and by being incorporated here under the limited liability Acts, still, that a House so composed should, after consideration, have adopted a canon, so expressed as to lay down one rule supported by one train of reasoning, without meaning that "the rule" applied equally to companies of both kinds exclusively of any other rule or reasoning, is, I confess, more than I can credit.

I will refer to two later cases in your Lordships' House (fully recognizing that in neither case was the issue of a British company's residence directly raised), for the purpose of citing language so used as to suggest that there is no vital distinction between the tests applicable to a foreign and those applicable to a British company alleged to reside here. In American Thread Company v. Joyce (29 The Times L.R., 266 ; 6 Tax Cas., 163, at p. 165) Lord Halsbury, referring, I think, to the San Paulo (Brazilian) Railway case (supra) says, "I myself have taken the same view of this, I think, some years before the De Beers case (supra), and that view has been since, I think, adopted in this House more than once, that the real test, which, after all, is only a question of analogy—you cannot talk about a company residing anywhere—and that which has been accepted as a test, is where what we should call the head office in popular language is, and where the business of the company is really directed and carried on in that sense." This expression of opinion can only mean that for both British and foreign companies alike the test is where on the facts (including among all the others the fact of incorporation here or there) the company's business is really directed and carried on.

In Mitchell v. Egyptian Hotels, Limited (31 The Times L.R., 546 ; [1915] A.C., 1022) the argument of Sir John Simon (Attorney-General) (pp. 1034, 1035) is, "In De Beers Consolidated Mines, Limited v. Howe (supra) Lord Loreburn lays down the principle as the result of the cases as follows: 'The real business is carried on where the central management and control actually abides,' and the Commissioners find substantially in the terms of that judgment. Lord Loreburn also states his opinion, following Cesena Sulphur Company v. Nicholson (supra), that a company resides for purposes of income-tax where its real business is carried on . . . That statement involves that a trading company carries on some part at least of its business at the place where it resides, and this company admittedly resides in this country." The admission here mentioned of course was as to the transaction of a part of the business here and did not refer to the English incorporation, on which, as on the Companies (Consolidation) Act, 1908, no stress was laid. There is a further case, John Hood and Co., Limited v. Magee (7 Tax Cas., 321), in which a United Kingdom company was again held to be chargeable under Case I of Schedule D, because in fact an important, and indeed the chief, part of its business was carried on at Belfast, and the De Beers case (supra) was discussed without any suggestion that the test mentioned in it was not as universal as its language would imply. Finally I would call attention to Bradbury v. English Sewing Cotton Company, Limited (39 The Times L.R., 590 ; [1923] A.C., 744), in which the references made to the rule laid down in the De Beers case (supra) both in argument for the successful parties (p. 747) and in the opinions delivered (pp. 753, 755 and 765) by the Lord Chancellor and Lords Shaw and Wrenbury, respectively, are all made in terms that mention no second sense of residence and suggest no alternative to Lord Loreburn's rule, whether the company in question be foreign, as it was there, or British, as in the present case.

I wish, however, to refer specially to New Zealand Shipping Company v. Thew (supra), though again this is the case of a company incorporated abroad. Lord Sterndale and Lord Justice Warrington in the Court of Appeal and Lord Buckmaster in your Lordships' House (see especially p. 229), in whose opinion all the other noble and learned Lords present concurred, all speak of the rule laid down in the De Beers case (supra) as if no other mode of determining any company's residence was known to them or could be put forward. Lord Sterndale quotes at p. 223 Lord Loreburn's rule and adds, "I think that that is just as accurate a statement of law now as it was at the time it was pronounced." Accurate it may have been, but, if the present argument for the respondent is to be sustained, it was sadly lacking in precision, for it bears all the appearance of a universal test. Lord Sterndale proceeds to say that these principles cannot possibly be affected by the statutory obligation of a company registered abroad to file its articles at Somerset House on beginning business here, and Lord Justice Warrington, as he then was, says of this (p. 228), as I think may truly be said of the statutory requirements imposed on English companies, "It is merely one of the conditions which must be fulfilled before they can lawfully do so. When that condition is fulfilled, then they can lawfully carry on the business ; and if the circumstances are such as to bring them within the principle to which I have referred, they are just as much carrying on the business in this country as if they had not been compelled to file and had not filed their articles." I would also like to quote in this connexion the observation of Lord Warrington in Lysaght's case (44 The Times L.R., 374 ; [1928] A.C., 234) (which, it is true, is not a case of a company), "I have reluctantly come to the conclusion that it is now settled by authority that the question of residence or ordinary residence is one of degree, that there is no technical or special meaning attached to either expression for the purposes of the Income Tax Act."

My Lords, in support of my view that this rule of income-tax law has long been deemed to be settled by common consent I would refer to the opinion of the legal profession as it may be gathered from books of admitted authority. Dowell's work first appeared in 1874 and contained no note on the residence of a British company. His second edition, 1885, after citing the Cesena case (supra) said (p. 208) : "The residence of a joint stock company incorporated and registered in England is in the United Kingdom and therefore the company is chargeable on profits from business carried on abroad as well as from business carried on in the United Kingdom" ; and this was repeated in the 3rd edition in 1890 (p. 221). In 1895 the 4th edition (pp. 244 and 245) modified this as follows : "In order to give effect to the Act as applied to joint stock companies we must suppose that a company has a residence. . . . In determining the question of residence, registration must be taken into consideration. It is a strong circumstance, but only a circumstance ; it is a fact to be considered with all the others ; but where a company" (does acts as in the Cesena Company's case, supra) "it is a company residing in the United Kingdom." For this the Cesena case (supra), the Calcutta Jute case (supra), and the Imperial Continental Gas case (supra) are cited. The 6th edition, 1908, adds that the principle of the decision in the Cesena case (supra) was approved in the Goerz Company's case (supra) and in the De Beers Company's case (supra), and the 7th edition, 1913, contents itself with a summary of all decided cases to date. Conversely I have endeavoured to find in the great authorities on the Companies Acts, Lindley and Buckley, using the editions for which those celebrated authors were personally responsible, any warrant for the view of those Acts in their relation to income-tax for which the respondent contends. They cite the case that has so often been referred to, but the proposition that an English limited liability company is by law always a resident in the United Kingdom is conspicuously absent. Thus I find in Lindley on Companies, 5th ed., 1889, the last revision by the learned author himself, the statement that "a registered company does not necessarily dwell where its registered office is situate," citing the Cesena case (supra) and Keynsham Blue Lias Lime Co., Limited v. Baker (2 H. and C., 729), and my noble and learned friend Lord Wrenbury, in his last revision, 9th ed., 1909, says, p. 154, "For the purposes of the Income Tax Acts the place of registration of a company is not, any more than the birthplace of an individual, conclusive as to its residence. A company registered here, with a registered office here and governed by a board, which meets here, is no doubt resident here (Cesena case, supra), but also a company registered abroad, whose head office and directors' meetings are here, is resident here (Goerz case, supra). The test of residence is not registration but where the company does its real business, where the central management and control abide (De Beers case, supra)." Similarly Professor Dicey, in the first and second editions of his Conflict of Laws, which were wholly his own, dwells in his Rule 19 on the principal place of business as being the domicile of a trading company and then describes the same test as determining its residence, and, in his Appendix on income-tax law, his note on the De Beers case (supra) is "what should be noted is the close connexion between residence in the United Kingdom and the carrying on business there. In the case of a trading corporation or company the two things can hardly be separated, for the simple reason that such a company has not, in fact, any residence but resides, from a legal point of view, in the country where the central control and management of its affairs is to be found," a proposition only slightly modified on p. 777 of the 2nd ed. No one of these great authorities doubts, any more than Lord Lorcburn doubted, that the test is the same for English companies as for foreign ones, or entertains any idea that for income-tax purposes performance of the statutory obligations of a registered company has any different significance from that of mere registration. Similarly I have looked into the cases relating to the jurisdiction of County Courts over companies. I do not say that they afford much assistance, but they show that the combination of the place where the business is carried on has long been an integral fact along with that of the registered head office in deciding where a company "dwells" within the County Courts Act 9 and 10 Vict., c. 95, s. 128 (Taylor v. Crowland Gas and Coke Co., 11 Ex., 1) and in Keynsham Blue Lias Lime Co., Limited v. Baker (supra), where the two were not the same ; it was the place of manufacture, where the contract sued on was made, and not the London head office, where the directors met, that satisfied the word "dwells." In neither case were the statutory requirements of the Acts, under which the respective companies were incorporated, treated as having any importance.

I venture to submit that a long current of judicial expressions, whether technically obiter or not, the general agreement of the most valuable textbooks and the course taken in argument by so many Law Officers of the Crown afford sufficient warrant for saying that the rule is settled and ought not to be disturbed. Sir Richard Baggallay and Sir John Holker advanced the present contention, though not on all the present grounds, but it was not accepted. Thenceforward one Law Officer after another until very recently has treated the rule as having been concluded, under circumstances that implied that the rule was an exhaustive one. Did they all miss the point or did they dismiss it as untenable ?

In my opinion these eminent men did not miss the point, but, apart from the unsuitability of the word "resident" to the technicalities of the Companies Acts, they saw that the interests of the Revenue demanded a different construction. With Victorian rates of income-tax it was long before it became worth while for English companies, which exploited foreign trades or properties, to incur the trouble and expense of removing the management from England. They were content to rely on the foreign locality of their enterprise. The crude attempt to rely on the place of incorporation, which was made in reply by the Crown, failed at once and was advisedly dropped for, had it succeeded, the Revenue could not have charged foreign companies trading here. It had not yet been foreseen that the doctrine of double residence could be applied to companies, still less that, if it could, double tests of residence could be tolerated, namely, incorporation for English companies and actual trading for foreign ones, a right about face attitude condemned in Bradbury's case by Lord Cave, L.C. ([1923] A.C., at pp. 753, 754) as intolerable.

My Lords, on reference to the Income Tax Act, 1918, I think it must appear that the Legislature itself has by that Act recognized the principle, which I submit was established by the previous current of authority, that for income-tax purposes the residence of an English limited liability company depends not on its English registration and statutory obligations but on the facts as to the mode and place in which it controls and directs its affairs. The initial words of No. 7 of the General Rules applicable to all schedules "where a non-resident person, not being a British subject, or a British, Indian, Dominion, or Colonial firm or company, or branch thereof, carries on business with a resident person . . . &c.," appear to me in plain English to assume that a "person," being a British company, may be a "non-resident person," and this without any qualification dependent on the manner of its incorporation. If so, the fundamental proposition, on which the argument for the respondent has been rested, is conclusively negatived.

It is, however, contended that the rule, properly construed, refers only to such persons, including companies, as are non-resident, and therefore cannot relate or refer to any companies, which by law must be always resident. There are British companies which can be non-resident, such, for example, as have been incorporated by some statute or Royal Charter, not containing provisions equivalent in effect to those pointed out in the Companies (Consolidation) Act, 1908, and to these, but to these only, the rule applies.

My Lords, I have not been able to adopt this view. It begs the whole question. It has been admitted that all the other "persons" mentioned after the words "not being" are used unrestrictedly and in this respect the drafting was said to have been "loose," but surely, unless express words to the contrary are to be found, words of exception like these are simply used in order to take the things enumerated out of the prior general words, because they would otherwise be included in them. In effect, I think this rule, had it been drafted in paragraphs, one dealing with British subjects, the next with British companies, the next with British firms, and so on, would have meant and rightly should have read "Any non-resident British company, which carries on business with a resident person . . . ." The matter is not to be brushed aside as the result of unskilful drafting or of hasty discussion in Committee. It was argued that a rule framed alio intuitu should not be read as unsettling the settled law as to the residence of English limited liability companies, but the truth is that it was framed for the purpose of applying to a new case the income-tax law as it then stood and was understood to have been interpreted by the Courts, and to use it for the purpose of declaring by a tacit assumption a novel interpretation of the Companies (Consolidation) Act, 1908, in the teeth of the decisions of the Court, would have been contrary to all the principles on which taxing legislation is framed. It is not thus that draftsmen perform their difficult task. Of course, in later stages changes occur which, being the work of many minds and different processes of thought, may mar the symmetrical draft, which was the work of one. For this no apology is ever made, though we are often asked to show it suitable judicial indulgence, but I think this contention fails, as soon as the origin of Rule 7 is historically considered.

It was first enacted as section 31 (3) of the Finance (No. 2) Act of 1915, a section which added to the previous rules on the subject of non-residence and extended them, till the Consolidation Act of 1918 converted them into a code dealing with the whole topic. Section 31 of the Act of 1915 begins : "(1) Section 41 of the Income Tax Act, 1842 . . . shall, so far as it relates to the taxation of non-residents, be extended" in two particular respects. "(2) A non-resident person shall be chargeable . . . in the name of the branch, factor, agent, receiver, or manager" through whom the profits chargeable arose. Then follows in subsection (3) the provision which is now General Rule No. 7. Section 41 of the Act of 1842 provided a method of vicariously charging certain incapacitated natural persons and was not framed for the purpose of charging incorporated persons ; nor had it anything to do with the system of incorporating companies with limited liability. Where then there was added to that section a provision relating to a wholly different category of chargeable persons, namely, companies, one would expect that the new provision would deal with companies generally, except in so far as express limiting words were employed, but one would not expect that a provision, dealing with the chargeability of non-resident companies, would leave the chargeability of the most important class of such companies to be inferred only from an assumed construction of a non-taxing Act, which had not till that time been laid down by a uniform current of decisions. I am clearly of opinion that this General Rule adopts and, in effect, declares the view of the law as to the residence of companies generally, which had previously been assumed and acted on in the decisions for a generation or more, and gives statutory recognition to them, and, if so, the respondent's argument cannot be accepted.

The matter is one of very general importance. Many companies have, at the cost of some trouble and expense, transferred their control and management abroad on the faith of decisions, or if you will dicta, to the effect that by so doing they could legitimately reduce the burden of their taxation. Are they now to reconsider their position and, if so, in what direction ? The present contention shuts out English companies from the advantages with regard to income from Colonial and other securities, which the Act secures to such natural persons as change their residence in terms of the Rules, for companies cannot so change it. Such a discrimination must affect the question of the future incorporation of new concerns in England and the further question must arise whether British status and British protection are in business worth the price. It is a pity that among the above-mentioned advantages were those offered generally to investors by the Treasury on the issue of certain War Loans, for English companies, though they may hold the stocks, cannot have the benefit of exemption from tax, since they cannot be persons "not ordinarily resident in the United Kingdom," section 46 (1). Most of all is it to be regretted, if this grave change is to be brought about, because the Crown adopts a line of argument which appears to be the contrary of that long put forward on its behalf and thus obtains, as a matter of construction, something, as it seems to me, which the Legislature alone can make law.

In my opinion the decision of the General Commissioners was right and the appeal should be allowed.

LORD ATKINSON.—My Lords, I have had the privilege and advantage of reading more than once and have carefully studied the judgment which my noble and learned friend on the Woolsack has just delivered. I think the conclusions at which he has arrived are sound and are borne out by the facts to which he has referred. In my view his judgment is sound in every particular.

LORD BUCKMASTER (read by LORD ATKINSON).—My Lords, by Schedule D of the Income Tax Act, 1918, tax is charged in respect of profits or gains arising or accruing "to any person residing in the United Kingdom" from the property there specified. By Rule 1 of the General Rules every body of persons is chargeable like a person, and by section 237 "body of persons" means among other things "any company."

The appellants are a company incorporated in England under the Companies Acts, and the only question raised on this appeal is whether, by reason solely of the fact that its registered office must be here, such a company is a person "residing" in the United Kingdom within the meaning of Schedule D.

The difficulty which this question presents is due to the fact that residence is essentially a condition applicable to men and the tests for its determination, such as living and sleeping, can have no proper counterpart in an abstract entity such as an incorporated company, which can neither live nor sleep. It must, however, be assumed that a company has a residence, and if the question is looked at entirely apart from authority, I should have thought that the place of the registered office was also the place where the abstraction known as "a company" resided. It is the place where all notices must be served. It constitutes its address for purposes of receipt of all notices of legal process ; the books which the company is compelled by law to keep must be there kept and held ready for inspection ; and it seems to me a fair inference that this is consequently a place where it resides.

The matter cannot, however, be considered in this separate and detached way. In the first place, the decision in Cesena Sulphur Company and Calcutta Jute Mills v. Nicholson (1 Ex.D., 428), if not in express terms, yet by necessary inferential implication, decided that a company registered in this country did not have a residence here by reason of that fact alone; subsequent authorities have accepted this conclusion and companies have arranged their business upon the hypothesis that it was exact. The most definite statement to this effect is to be found in the words of Lord Loreburn in De Beers Consolidated Mines, Limited v. Howe (22 The Times L.R., 756; [1906] A.C., 455) where he says, "The decision, . . . now 30 years ago, involved the principle that a company resides for purposes of income-tax where its real business is carried on. Those decisions have been acted upon ever since."

In order to see exactly what was the effect of this decision the cases need further examination. They were decided together. The Cesena Sulphur Company was a company which was registered both here and in Italy, and the Calcutta Jute Mills Company was registered only here. It is plain that had the Court regarded the fact that incorporation here, with its necessary consequences of having a registered office and other associated obligations, was sufficient to establish residence the cases might have been decided upon that ground, but they clearly were not, and, though there are passages in the judgment of Chief Baron Kelly at p. 444 which suggest that the registered office might be regarded as a residence, the subsequent statements show that he turned once more to the consideration of where the control of the business was and held that that decided the residence in England. Baron Huddleston spoke more definitely on the matter at p. 453. The argument that registration was conclusive of residence was advanced by the Attorney-General, but this argument the learned Judge rejected in these words:—

"Registration, like the birth of an individual, is a fact which must be taken into consideration in determining the question of residence. It may be a strong circumstance, but it is only a circumstance. It would be idle to say that in the case of an individual the birth was conclusive of the residence. . . . In the case of a corporation the place of its registration is the place of its birth and is a fact to be considered with all the others."

The decision, therefore, did clearly declare that the real place of business was a test of residence, and until the decision of this House in the case of Swedish Central Railway Company, Limited v. Thompson (41 The Times L.R., 385; [1925] A.C., 495) no one seems to have suggested that residence need not be unique.

It was subsequent to and probably consequent upon that decision that this dispute arose, and pursuant to its authority the Court of Appeal have held that as a residence may be dual the existence of a registered office here is one of its decisive tests.

In forming this opinion, however, a matter which does not appear to have been fully argued has been overlooked. In 1915 a new rule was added to the General Rules of the Income Tax Acts, incorporated in the Act of 1918 as Rule 7, which begins in these terms:—

"Where a non-resident person, not being a British subject or a British, Indian, Dominion, or Colonial firm or company . . . carries on business with a resident person. . . ."

This rule clearly is based on the hypothesis that a British company need not reside here since it may be "non-resident."

If, therefore, the phrase "British company" includes a company incorporated under the Companies Acts it is obvious that the place where its registered office may be is not the critical consideration for determining residence, since such a company must have its registered office here and could not, therefore, be non-resident.

The only road of escape from this difficulty is the one pointed out by the Attorney-General, which lies in saying that the words "British company" have a limited meaning and only deal with such companies as need not have a registered office and can, therefore, be non-resident, as, for example, companies incorporated by Royal Charter.

This argument results in cutting down the phrase "British company" to a relatively insignificant number of companies and depriving it of its most obvious meaning, and that without any reason capable of being extracted from the rule. Had that been the real purpose of the statute it should have been, as it easily could, more simply and directly expressed.

In my opinion, however, such was not its meaning or its purpose. In 1915 the Cesena case (supra) had been decided for nearly 50 years, the test it laid down had again and again been applied, and the statement of Baron Huddleston had not been contradicted in any considered judgment, the statement of Lord Wrenbury in Egyptian Hotels, Limited v. Mitchell (30 The Times L.R., 457; [1914] 3 K.B., 118, at p. 132) being really nothing but an interjection. The result was that in 1915 residence for a company was sought for by examining its seat of business, and registration as a sole test was overlooked. It was in these circumstances that the Act of 1915 was passed, and its effect was to give legislative sanction to the view that registration alone was not decisive of residence.

It is for this reason that in my opinion the appeal succeeds and should be allowed with costs.

LORD WARRINGTON OF CLYFFE.—My Lords, the question in this case is whether or not the appellant company was in the years of assessment a person residing in the United Kingdom within the meaning of Schedule D of the Income Tax Act, 1918, construed, of course, with due regard to other relevant provisions of the Act.

The company was incorporated on April 20, 1904, under the Companies Acts, 1862-1900, as a company limited by shares. By the memorandum of association it was stated in accordance with the statute that the registered office of the company is situate in England.

The actual registered office is at Gresham House, Old Broad-street, in the City of London. This is, in fact, the office of Mr. F. J. Horne, who carries on there the business of secretary of public companies and performs there on behalf of the company and certain other companies the functions necessary to be performed by them in order to comply with the requirements of the Companies Acts. The names of the companies for whom he acts are on the door of the office.

The business of the company is carried on in Egypt and its affairs are controlled and managed there.

The case thus raises the question whether a company incorporated under the Companies Acts, and therefore having a registered office in the United Kingdom, at which under the statutes certain duties have to be and are in fact performed on its behalf, and notices and other documents affecting the company are to be served, is as a legal consequence of these facts a person residing in the United Kingdom within the meaning of the Income Tax Act, 1918.

Assessments to income-tax for the years 1919-20 to 1924-25 under Schedule D, cases IV. and V., having been made upon the company by the Commissioners of Inland Revenue, the company appealed to the General Commissioners of Income Tax for the City of London. The General Commissioners found that the company was not resident in this country. At the request of the present respondent they stated a case for the opinion of the Court. The case came before Mr. Justice Rowlatt in the King's Bench Division on November 23, 1926, and he allowed the respondent's appeal from the decision of the General Commissioners. His judgment was on February 18, 1927, affirmed by the Court of Appeal. Hence the present appeal to this House.

The statutory provisions relating to this and all other companies incorporated under the Companies Acts are now contained in the Companies (Consolidation) Act, 1908.

Under that Act every company is to have a registered office to which all communications and notices may be addressed. Every company is to keep a register of its members containing certain particulars enumerated in the statute (section 25). An annual list of members, with a summary specifying a large number of particulars relating to its capital and its liabilities and assets, is to be prepared and is to be contained in a separate part of the register of members (section 26 (3)). A copy of every instrument creating any mortgage or charge requiring registration under the Act is to be kept at the registered office and such copies are to be open to inspection by any creditor or member of the company. The register of members, and therefore, of course, the annual list and summary which are part of it, are to be kept at the registered office, and under certain conditions are to be open to inspection by members and other persons, and any member or other person may require a copy of the register, or of the list or summary or of any part thereof respectively, on payment of the prescribed sum. Every company is to keep at its registered office a register containing the names, addresses, and occupations of its directors or managers. A document may be served on a company by leaving it at or sending it by post to the registered office. This provision extends to service of a writ and of a petition for winding up and such service is equivalent to personal service. Service may be thus effected at any time of the day or night.

By No. 1 of the General Rules applicable to all Schedules of the Income Tax Act, 1918, it is provided that every body of persons is to be chargeable to tax in like manner as any person is chargeable under the provisions of the Act.

Inasmuch, therefore, as tax is imposed upon a person residing in the United Kingdom it is clear that the artificial person, a company under the Companies Acts, amongst other bodies of persons is regarded as capable of residing in the United Kingdom, although of course, inasmuch as it neither eats nor sleeps nor performs any of the physical or social functions of a natural person, the fact of residence depends upon considerations other than those which determine the residence of an individual.

Independently of authority, and in the absence of any relevant provisions of the Income Tax Act, 1918, throwing light on the meaning attributed by the Legislature to the words "residing" and "resident" as used in the Act, I should probably have been of opinion that the provisions of the Companies (Consolidation) Act, 1908, to which I have referred lead to the conclusion that, whatever other residence the company may have, the Legislature has provided that the registered office shall be a residence.

Certain corporate functions imposed upon it by the Act are to be performed at that place. Service of the most important documents, which in the case of individual persons must be served personally, may be effected by their being left at or sent by post to the registered office without restriction as to time.

The cumulative effect of these provisions apparently creates for the company a statutory home where it is to perform the corporate functions above mentioned, and where it is regarded as at all times present and ready to receive such documents and communications as are left or sent there.

This state of things would go some way to establish that in the case of a registered company there are present those conditions which, in the case of an artificial person, may constitute a residence in that part of the United Kingdom in which by the terms of its memorandum of association the registered office is situate.

But I have to consider the authorities and such relevant provisions as may be found in the Act of 1918 and to determine whether the opinion which I have above expressed can be maintained in view particularly of the provisions of the Act.

At the date of the passing of the Act of 1918 the authorities were in this position:—

In Cesena Company, Limited v. Nicholson and Calcutta Jute Company, Limited v. Nicholson (1 Ex.D., 428) Baron Huddleston expressed himself as follows (p. 453): "In the present argument the Attorney-General advanced a proposition to which I cannot assent. He suggested that the registration of a company was conclusive of its residence, that if a company was registered in England it must be held to reside in England. I think the answer which was given during the argument is a good one. It is this: registration, like the birth of an individual, is a fact which must be taken into consideration in determining the question of residence. It may be a strong circumstance, but it is only a circumstance. It would be idle to say that in the case of an individual the birth was conclusive of the residence. So drawing an analogy between an actual and an artificial person you may say that in the case of a corporation the place of its registration is the place of its birth and is a fact to be considered with all the others. If you find that a company which is registered in a particular country, acts in that country, has its office and receives dividends in that country, you may say that those facts, coupled with the registration, lead you to the conclusion that its residence is in that country." The decision, however, was given on the ground that in both cases the company in question carried on substantial business in this country.

In De Beers Consolidated Mines, Limited v. Howe (22 The Times L.R., 756; [1906] A.C., 455) it was decided in this House that in the case of a company registered abroad the test of residence is where it really keeps house and does its real business and the real business is carried on where the central management and control actually abide.

In 1918 it was, I think, assumed that the general current of authority, and in particular the Cesena case (supra), the De Beers case (supra) and certain other cases as to foreign companies had settled the question as to British companies, viz., that the mere fact of incorporation in this country, though an important circumstance, would not involve residence here, though the provisions of the Companies (Consolidation) Act, 1908, as to the registered office referred to above were not considered in those cases. In this assumed state of the law the Act of 1918 was passed, and there is in that Act one provision which to my mind shows conclusively that the Legislature accepted and acted on that view of the law. It is found in No. 7 of the rules applicable to all

"Where a non-resident person, not being a British subject or a British, Indian, Dominion, or Colonial firm or company or branch thereof carries on business with a resident person," and certain facts and circumstances appear to the Commissioners, then "the non-resident person shall be assessable and chargeable to tax in the name of the resident person as if the resident person were an agent of the non-resident person."

This rule appears to me clearly to assume that a British company, equally with an individual British subject, might for the purposes of the Act be a non-resident person. I can see no legitimate reason for excluding from the expression "British company" a company registered under the Companies Acts; in fact, the rule as a whole indicates to my mind that such companies were those principally referred to. The result is that, as every British company is under a statutory obligation to have a registered office to which there are attached by statute the incidents and characteristics above referred to, every such company, notwithstanding the provisions as to the registered office, may for the purposes of the Act be a non-resident company.

If this be the true construction of the Act it cannot be maintained that as a matter of law the General Commissioners were bound to decide that the appellant company was resident in this country. The question before them was thus one of fact; there was ample evidence on which they could find as they did and it was not competent to Mr. Justice Rowlatt and the Court of Appeal to reverse their decision. The appeal ought to be allowed with costs here and below.

It is right to add that though the point was raised in the Court of Appeal it appears not to have been pressed and there is no reference to it in any of the judgments. It was not mentioned by counsel at your Lordships' Bar, but was raised by one of your Lordships after the original argument and the case was restored that it might be dealt with.

The case of the Swedish Central Railway Company v. Thompson (41 The Times L.R., 385; [1925] A.C., 495) was decided subsequently to the Act of 1918. The point on which as I think this case turns was not raised. There are, however, dicta in my judgment in that case in the Court of Appeal ([1924] 2 K.B., 255) which cannot be supported in view of the present decision.

Court of Appeal: (Scrutton, Lawrence, and Greer, L.JJ.) 1928. July 17.

G. AND T. EARLE, LIMITED v. HEMSWORTH R.D.C.*

Contract—Building contract—Retention fund—Specific fund — Assignment — Debentures—Floating charge—Appointment of receiver—Priorities.

By a lump sum building contract entered into in 1922 between S. and Co., Limited ("the contractors") and the defendants, provision was made for interim payments on the architect's certificates, to be given monthly at the rate of 90 per cent. of the value of all work executed. The remaining 10 per cent. ("the retention fund") was to be retained and deposited in a bank until the final adjustment of accounts. The contract was varied by consent, and in the events that happened the retention fund amounted to £1,000 at the beginning of 1924; this was never deposited in a bank and remained a merely notional fund, but both parties treated it as a separate sum capable of being earmarked. It was included, without distinction, in the architect's final certificate for £1,848 10s. 2d., on January 28, 1927. Meanwhile, the plaintiffs, who were supplying cement to the contractors, found that the latter were getting into arrears with their payments, and to obtain further credit the contractors, being then indebted to the plaintiffs in the sum of £671 on April 7, 1924, assigned to them the retention fund by a document in these terms: "In reduction of the amount now or to be owing from us to you for goods supplied by you, we hereby assign to you all moneys now or hereafter to become due to us from the Hemsworth R.D.C. for retention moneys in respect of the G. Housing Scheme, and for which your receipt shall be a sufficient discharge. . . ." Due notice of that assignment was given to the defendants next day.

The contractors had at various dates between 1900 and February 2, 1924, issued to the Manchester and County Bank, Limited, a number of debentures charging the undertaking of the contractors and all their property, both present and future, the charge being a specific charge on the contractors' freehold and leasehold property, machinery, goodwill, and uncalled capital, and a floating charge on all the company's other assets, subject to a proviso that the contractors were not to be at liberty to create any mortgage or charge on any of their assets in priority to the debentures. On October 13, 1924, a receiver for the debenture-holders was appointed, who duly entered into possession. On October 20, 1924, a resolution was passed for the voluntary winding up of the company. The receiver refused to recognize the right of the plaintiffs to payment under their assignment in priority to the debenture-holders, and on the architect's final certificate being given in January, 1927, the defendants declined to interplead and paid the retention moneys to the receiver for the debenture-holders, and the plaintiffs thereupon brought their action on their assignment. The Judge gave judgment for the plaintiffs, and the defendants appealed, not raising any question as to priorities, but contending that the assignors ought to have been joined as parties.

Held, that the retention money, although not becoming payable until a later date than the assignment, constituted a debt or legal thing in action which could be assigned, and could be sued for in an action without joining the assignors as parties ; and that the assignment was a good assignment, and the plaintiffs were entitled to recover on it.

Decision of Wright, J. (44 The Times L.R., 605), affirmed.

This was an appeal by the defendants from a judgment of Mr. Justice Wright (44 The Times L.R., 605) in an action in which the plaintiffs claimed to recover £1,000, being retention money due from the defendants to certain contractors under a building contract. The plaintiffs claimed under an assignment of the retention fund to them dated April 7, 1924. The facts are stated in the head-note and in the judgment.

Mr. W. Norman Raeburn, K.C., and Mr. N. L. Macaskie appeared for the appellants ; and Mr. Alexander Neilson, K.C., and Mr. W. H. Owen for the respondents.

Lord Justice Scrutton.—I begin my judgment in this case by saying that I entirely agree with the judgment of Mr. Justice Wright, but out of deference to the argument that Mr. Raeburn has presented with his usual fairness and clearness I will say a few words.

The Rural District Council who are appealing have put themselves in the unfortunate position of paying a sum of money to one person and finding themselves sued for the same sum of money by a second person, and unfortunately they have only themselves to thank for it. They might very well have interpleaded and left the two contending parties to fight for the sum themselves, but they have chosen to pay one of the contending parties and now find themselves liable to pay the other contending party.

The question arises in this way. A company for which Messrs. Wagstaff and Sons were architects were executing a building scheme for the Council, or rather two schemes. The particular scheme in question relates to what is called the Grimethorpe contract, and the Grimethorpe contract, which is based upon a specification and priced bill of quantities was for the sum of £49,459 8s. 3d., referred to as the contract price. On the question how the contract price was to be paid one refers to clause 29: "(1) Interim payments. No money shall become due to the contractor unless and until the architect shall certify in writing the amount thereof and that the contractor is entitled thereto. (2) When work to the value of £1,000 has been executed and thereafter at monthly intervals the architect shall certify in writing to the contractor and the employers the amount from time to time payable to the contractor under this contract and shall issue such monthly certificate not later than the 15th day of each month following that in which the first certificate is given and the employers shall within fourteen days of the date of issue of the certificate pay to the contractor the sum so certified. (3) The amount to be certified by the architect on his first and monthly certificates as due to the contractor shall be at the rate of 90 per cent. of the value of all work." That means of course that the architect will value the work according to the bill of quantities and specification ; he will find so much, say £1,000, done by value and he will issue a certificate that 90 per cent. of it, £900, is payable to the contractor. "The balance of 10 per cent. of the value of the work shall be retained until the sum so retained (hereinafter called 'the retention fund') amounts to £2,472 after which the contractor shall be entitled to be paid monthly to the full value of all work executed and material supplied." The certificates proceeded so far that £2,472 was being retained by the Council, and being retained because the contractor had done work of that value for which he would be entitled to be paid though the sum was not yet payable. If the contract had been carried out, instead of being varied, the proceedings would have gone on in this way. "One half of the retention fund shall be paid (subject to the conditions set out herein) to the contractor at the completion or occupation of the works and the other half together with any further sum found due to the contractor at the final adjustment of the accounts by the quantity surveyor shall be paid six months after completion or occupation of the works provided that all defects for which the contractor is liable are made good and that he has otherwise discharged his liabilities under the contract. (4) The sums forming the retention fund shall be deposited by the employers as they accrue in a bank to be agreed." It is curious that the contract uses that word "accrue" because the word "accrue" after being used by Lord Esher in Brice v. Bannister (3 Q.B.D., 569) is used again by the Divisional Court in Walker v. Bradford Old Bank, Limited (12 Q.B.D., 511) as describing a debt that can be assigned—"If an accruing debt arising out of contract be assigned," and the words here used about the retention fund are "as they accrue." The terms of the contract were not carried out, but what happened was that in the case of the Grimethorpe contract first of all £972 was paid to the contractor reducing the retention money to £1,500, and then on the completion of half the number of the houses the £1,500 was further reduced by £500, leaving therefore a retention fund of £1,000 on the Grimethorpe contract, the remaining £1,000 to be retained until the final certificate. A final certificate was given ultimately which showed that £1,800 was due to the contractors. In the meantime the contractors, wanting cement to complete their houses and having got a certain amount from the plaintiffs for which they had not paid, desired to have still more cement, and in order to obtain more cement they on April 7, 1924, made an assignment to the plaintiffs in the following terms : "In part reduction of the amount now or to be owing from us to you for goods supplied by you, we hereby assign to you all moneys now or hereafter to become due to us from the Hemsworth Rural District Council for retention moneys." At that time all the retention fund had accrued ; it had not been put in the bank as originally proposed but it had all been deducted and it had been reduced to £1,000, labelled retention moneys, by these two payments in variation of the contract, but there was a fund of £1,000 retention moneys earmarked because it represented the value of work already done under the contract.

The question is whether that assignment is a good assignment. The person to whom the Rural District Council in fact paid the money is the receiver for the contractors' debenture-holders who had a floating charge on all assets of the contractors which crystallized, to use a phrase used in the cases, some time after the date of this assignment when a receiver was appointed in consequence of a default under the terms of the debentures. The question then is, as raised by Mr. Raeburn, whether this is such an assignment, to use the language of the Law of Property Act, 1925, section 136, of a debt or other legal thing in action that the assignee can sue without joining the assignor as a party. As I understood Mr. Raeburn's argument that is the sole question. He has not gone into the extremely interesting and intricate question of equitable priorities, and I take his objection to be: This is not an assignment of a debt or other legal thing in action and, not being such an assignment, it cannot be sued for in any proceeding unless the assignor is joined as a party. In the view which I take of the cases which have been cited it has been effectively determined by a series of cases binding upon us that where the thing assigned arises out of an existing contract, although it may not become payable until a later date than the assignment, it is a debt or other legal thing in action which can be assigned and sued for without joining the assignor as a party. Two of the three cases which Mr. Raeburn cited to us on the question of these assignments, first of all the case of Ex parte Moss—In re Toward (14 Q.B.D., 310), which was a ship case in which Mr. Justice Mathew treated the assignment of a retention fund under a building contract as being clearly within the language of the Supreme Court of Judicature Act, 1873, and secondly the decision in Drew v. Josolyne (4 The Times L.R., 717) where under the building contract itself the retention fund was treated as a matter that might be assigned under the language of that Act, and the language of the Divisional Court in Walker v. Bradford Old Bank, Limited (supra), "If an accruing debt arising out of contract be assigned," and the very wide definition by Mr. Justice Channell in Torkington v. Magee (18 The Times L.R., 703; [1902] 2 K.B., 427; 19 The Times L.R., 331; [1903] 1 K.B., 644) appear to me to show that the Judge below has taken the right view when he decided that this particular retention fund assignment is a matter which comes within the language of the Supreme Court of Judicature Act, 1873, or the Law of Property Act, 1925, and indeed to my own knowledge this view has been constantly acted on by builders and their assignees and persons concerned with them in building contracts for a very considerable time.

I therefore come to the conclusion that this appeal must be dismissed, with costs.

LORD JUSTICE LAWRENCE and LORD JUSTICE GREER concurred.

Chan. Div. (Romer, J.) } 1928. July 31.

IN RE GROVE-GRADY—PLOWDEN v. LAWRENCE.*

Will—Bequest—Validity—Charitable bequest—Animals' benevolent society.

The Court upheld the validity of a bequest for the maintenance of an animals' benevolent society, on the ground that a gift to prevent cruelty to the lower animals was a good charitable gift even though it included animals harmful to the human race.

This was a summons taken out by the trustees of the will of Mrs. Sarah Martha Grove-Grady, who died in 1925, for the determination by the Court of the question, inter alia, whether a bequest of her residuary estate for the establishment, on certain conditions, of an institution to be called "The Beaumont Animals' Benevolent Society" was a valid charitable bequest.

Mr. Grant, K.C., and Mr. Byrne appeared for the applicants; Mr. Wilfrid Greene, K.C., and Mr. Daynes for the next-of-kin of the testatrix; the Solicitor-General (Sir Boyd Merriman, K.C.) and Mr. Stafford Crossman for the Attorney-General; and Mr. W. P. Donald and Mr. J. Single for other parties interested under the will; and Mr. Alfred Adams held a watching brief for the National Anti-Vivisection Society.

Mr. GRANT, in opening, said that the testatrix was a devoted lover of animals and a determined anti-vivisectionist.

One of the questions in respect of which the decision of the Court was sought arose under a clause in the will by which the testatrix devised and bequeathed her residuary estate to her trustees upon trust, to form a trust fund for the founding, establishing, and maintaining of a charitable institution to be called "The Beaumont Animals' Benevolent Society":—

"Under such rules and regulations and under such Committee of Management not exceeding ten members and otherwise in all respects as my trustees shall in their absolute discretion think fit, and having regard to my wish that the expense of management shall be kept as low as possible Provided that all members of the Committee and of the Governing Body and all officials of the said Society shall be and always have been declared Anti-vivisectionists and opponents of all sport involving the pursuit or death of any stag deer fox hare rabbit bird fish or any other animal and to have for its objects [(1) the provision of refuges for the preservation of 'all animals birds or other creatures not human'; (2) the distribution of any part of the yearly income of the trust fund amongst such Societies or Homes for the benefit of animals generally or for the benefit of individual cases British or Foreign as the Committee of 'The Beaumont Animals' Benevolent Society' might think fit]; (3) the founding establishing endowing supporting maintaining or providing of hospitals or homes for animals in Great Britain having no declared vivisectionist upon the Governing Body or bodies thereof or in any way connected with the management thereof."

Mr. GREENE said that the gift was bad and was not a charitable gift. To form a society of the kind referred to, it was necessary to find people who had always been declared opponents of all sport. The condition was too loosely and too vaguely expressed. A trust for the preservation of animals was not necessarily a charity. The question was whether the trust was beneficial to the community. A trust involving the preservation of pests, such as rabbits or mosquitoes, was not charitable.

A gift in favour of animals could only be a good charitable gift if it were for the benefit of the community. Such a gift could only be for the benefit of the community if it conduced to its moral, physical, or intellectual well-being. It followed that a gift for the benefit of animals, as such, was not necessarily charitable, since its object was the mere preservation of animals without any necessary element of benefit to the community. In the present case that necessary element of benefit was not to be found in the gift, since it contemplated equally the preservation of useless, or even harmful, animals. Whether anything was prejudicial or beneficial to the community was a question of fact for the Court and did not depend on the views of a testator. If a trust embraced both charitable and non-charitable objects the whole gift was bad. Even if the gift were charitable, the directions as to the constitution of the society were so essential a part of the gift as to make the intention particular and not general, with the result that if these directions could not be complied with the gift failed. In his submission the directions were so vague and uncertain that they could not be complied with.

The SOLICITOR-GENERAL said that the question was whether this was a charitable gift at all. The bearing of the anti-vivisection point was very indirect. The testatrix wished her directions to be carried out by a body of persons with an anti-vivisectionist mentality. The case was amply covered by authority (In re Wedgwood—Allen v. Wedgwood, 31 The Times L.R., 43 ; [1915] 1 Ch., 113), and there was nothing in the present trust for animals per se which prevented the direction from being a perfectly good charitable purpose. The testatrix, in her reference in the clause to opponents of all sport, was not thinking of fantastic questions, such as relating to the pursuit of butterflies, but meant persons opposed to the pursuit of killing animals for purposes of sport.

Mr. JUSTICE ROMER, in his considered judgment, said that there were several indications to be found in the clause that the dominating intention in the mind of the testatrix was the protection of the lower animals from cruelty and suffering. It had been established by authority which was binding on him, and it was conceded by the heir-at-law and next-of-kin, that a gift the object of which was to prevent suffering and cruelty to the lower animals was charitable (In re Wedgwood, 31 The Times L.R., 43 ; [1915] 1 Ch., 113).

The question which he had to put to himself was : Did a trust for the benefit of the lower animals tend to promote public morality ? In his opinion that question must be answered in the affirmative. Its tendency was to stimulate humane and generous sentiments in man towards these animals and by these feelings to promote feelings of humanity and morality generally and to repress brutality and thus elevate the human race. It was, however, urged in opposition to that conclusion that, whatever might be said in favour of a trust for animals beneficial to mankind, it ought not to prevail in the case of a trust which included within its scope animals which were positively harmful to the human race ; and this, it was said, was a trust of that kind. But the same objection was unsuccessfully put forward in In re Wedgwood (supra).

The next objection on the part of the heir-at-law and next-of-kin to the validity of the trust was that it included a trust for the benefit of individual animals (Cooper-Dean v. Stevens, 5 The Times L.R., 404 ; 41 Ch.D., 552).

In his opinion, the phrase "individual cases" in the will referred to particular species of animals and not to any individual animal. For the objects of the gift were societies and homes, and it would be fantastic to suppose that the testatrix had in mind or contemplated the possibility of a society or home for the benefit of one or more individual animals. She was thinking of such societies or homes as existed for the benefit of, say, dogs or horses generally. Such societies or homes were, without question, charitable. For these reasons he was of opinion that the trusts declared of the residuary estate were charitable.

It remained, however, to consider the effect of the condition imposed by the testatrix as to the constitution of the committee and governing body of the "Beaumont Animals' Benevolent Society."

The contention had been advanced that the condition was so essential a part of the gift as to make the intention of the testatrix with regard to her residuary estate a particular and not a general charitable intention ; that the condition could not be complied with; and that the gift of residue accordingly failed. Even if it were considered that the condition was of the character alleged, why could it not be complied with? It was said that no one could truthfully assert that he had always been a declared anti-vivisectionist and an opponent of all sport involving the pursuit or death of any animal. That was true, without any question, if the investigation into the views of the candidates for service on the committee, governing body, and staff was to be carried back to the cradle. But the condition must be interpreted reasonably, and, if so interpreted, need not go back beyond the time when the candidate attained to years of discretion. If the investigation were confined in that way he could not think that there would be any difficulty at all in complying with the condition. In his opinion the trusts declared of the residuary estate were valid.

The term "landlord," in section 2 (1) of the Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions Act, 1923, is not to be construed as requiring a contract of tenancy ; it must be construed in the looser sense of "owner," or in the sense of a person who, at a later stage, is going to appear in legal proceedings as landlord contesting with the tenant the terms of his tenancy.

Cohen v. Gold (43 The Times L.R., 376 ; [1927] 1 K.B., 865) overruled.

Ratkinsky v. Jacobs (44 The Times L.R., 548) approved.

The words "the tenant" in section 2 (2) of the Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions Act, 1923, refer to the sitting tenant—i.e., to the particular person who is the tenant when the lease referred to in the subsection is granted, and to no other person.

LLOYD v. COOK.

This was an appeal by the landlord from a decision (44 The Times L.R., 455) of a Divisonal Court—Mr. Justice Salter and Mr. Justice Charles—who had allowed an appeal by the tenant from a decision of his Honour Judge Hill Kelly, given at Bloomsbury County Court, which raised the question whether a fresh letting of part of premises which had been decontrolled was outside the protection of the Rent Restriction Acts.

The appellant, Mrs. Kate Cook, was the holder of a 99 years' lease of premises known as 14, Eversholt-street, Camden Town, N.W.1. Three rooms on the third floor of that house had been let to a Mr. Churchman, who vacated possession on August 12, 1926. Mrs. Cook thereupon prepared one of these rooms for the use of her son, who came in and occupied it as soon as it was ready. She had the other two whitewashed and prepared with a view to another letting.

On August 28, 1926, she let these two rooms on a weekly tenancy at a rent of 14s. a week to the respondent, Mr. Frederick Charles Lloyd. Mr. Lloyd applied to the Registrar to have the standard rent of his rooms fixed by an apportionment of the rent of the whole house, on the ground that his rooms constituted a "dwelling-house" protected by the Rent Restriction Acts. The Registrar granted the application, and fixed the standard rent at 5s. 8d. a week, but the County Court Judge reversed that decision on appeal, and held that Mr. Lloyd's rooms were no longer protected by the Acts, having become decontrolled by virtue of section 2 (1) of the Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions Act, 1923.

From that decision the tenant, Mr. Lloyd, appealed to a Divisional Court.

The Divisional Court held that, notwithstanding the decontrol of the three rooms, the subsequent letting of two of these rooms to Mr. Lloyd as a separate dwelling-house on a fresh tenancy was not outside the protection of the Rent Restriction Acts, and that the tenant was entitled to an apportionment.

The landlord appealed.

Mr. Montgomery, K.C., Mr. J. C. Lockwood, and Mr. Gordon Clark appeared for the appellant; and Mr. John Duncan for the respondent.

Mr. MONTGOMERY, in opening the appeal, said that the landlord, Mrs. Cook, had obtained possession of the dwelling-house consisting of the three rooms at some time subsequent to July 31, 1923, and the whole house consisting of the three rooms had been decontrolled under section 2 of the Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions Act, 1923. Either the two rooms which were subsequently let to Mr. Lloyd were to be regarded as part of the dwelling-house consisting of three rooms—in which case they were decontrolled by section 2 of the Act of 1923, because the whole of the three rooms were decontrolled—or the two rooms were to be treated as a new dwelling-house, let for the first time on August 28, 1926, when they were let to Mr. Lloyd—in which case the Act did not apply.

It could not be said that Mrs. Cook had not come into possession of the two rooms in question, because the two rooms were not a separate dwelling-house when she came into possession of the three rooms.

Mr. JOHN DUNCAN, for the respondent, contended that the two rooms let to Mr. Lloyd constituted a new and separate dwelling-house. It was a separate entity from the dwelling-house consisting of the three rooms. The whole did not, in law, include the part in this case. There were here two separate dwelling-houses and two separate lettings, and the new letting to the respondent, Mr. Lloyd, was subject to the protection of the Rent Restriction Acts, and Mr. Lloyd was entitled to an apportionment of his rent. Moreover, the appellant was not the landlord who had been in possession of the premises for the purposes of section 2 of the Act of 1923. The respondent ought to succeed.

GOUDGE v. BROUGHTON.

This was an appeal by the plaintiff, Mr. James Alfred Goudge, the owner of premises known as Under Beeches Stables, at Redhill, from a judgment of a Divisional Court—Mr. Justice Salter and Mr. Justice Talbot—allowing an appeal by the defendant, Mrs. Mary Broughton, from a judgment of the Deputy County Court Judge at Redhill County Court ordering the defendant to give up possession of the premises.

The plaintiff bought the premises from the former owner in October, 1925. The former owner's gardener was then in possession. The gardener remained in possession as caretaker, paying no rent. In December, 1926, the plaintiff let the premises to the defendant. The gardener remained on for some time, and ultimately went out of his own accord. The defendant then remained in sole occupation of the premises until she received the plaintiff's notice to quit. The tenancy was a monthly one at a rent which was within the limits of the Rent Restriction Acts, and proper notice to quit was given.

The question was whether the plaintiff had brought himself within section 2 of the Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions Act, 1923, and was entitled to possession. The section provides:—

"(1) Where the landlord of a dwelling-house to which the principal Act applies is in possession of the whole of the dwelling-house at the passing of this Act [i.e., July 31, 1923] or comes into possession of the whole of the dwelling-house at any time after the passing of this Act, then from and after the passing of this Act, or from and after the date when the landlord subsequently comes into possession, as the case may be, the principal Act shall cease to apply to the dwelling-house. . . ."

By subsection (3):—

"For the purposes of this section the expression 'possession' shall be construed as meaning 'actual possession,' and a landlord shall not be deemed to have come into possession by reason only of a change of tenancy made with his consent."

The Deputy County Court Judge came to the conclusion that the premises were decontrolled and that Cohen v. Gold (43 The Times L.R., 376; [1927] 1 K.B., 865) did not apply.

The Divisional Court came to the conclusion that they were bound by Cohen v. Gold (supra) and that the present case was not distinguishable from that case. They accordingly reversed the decision of the Deputy County Court Judge.

The plaintiff appealed.

Mr. Croom-Johnson, K.C., and Mr. Horace Douglas appeared for the appellant ; and Mr. W. N. Stable for the respondent.

Mr. Croom-Johnson, in opening the appeal, referred to the Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920, sections 1, 4, 5, 8, 12, and 15 ; and to the Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions Act, 1923, section 2 (being the section which the Court had to construe in this case). He said that the question was what was the meaning of the expression "the landlord" in that section. He submitted that the true view was that "the landlord" in that section meant the person who was the landlord at the relevant time—namely, at the time when the matter came before the Court. The same meaning should be given to the expression "the landlord" as that given to it in section 12 (1) (g) of the Act of 1920. He referred to Cohen v. Gold (supra) ; Ratkinsky v. Jacobs (44 The Times L.R., 548) ; Prout v. Hunter (40 The Times L.R., 868 ; [1924] 2 K.B., 736) ; Finey v. Gougoltz (42 The Times L.R., 501 ; [1926] 2 K.B., 322) ; Oakley v. Wilson (43 The Times L.R., 521 ; [1927] 2 K.B., 279).

The gardener who occupied the premises when the plaintiff purchased them was not a tenant under the Rent Restriction Acts so as to be entitled to the protection of these Acts. He was not there qua tenant. He was there either as licensee or as caretaker or agent for the plaintiff, and his occupation of the premises was the occupation of the plaintiff. See also Remon v. City of London Real Property Company (36 The Times L.R., 869 ; [1921] 1 K.B., 49) and Bracey v. Pales (43 The Times L.R., 69 ; [1927] 1 K.B., 818).

The premises were at one time a dwelling-house to which the Rent Restriction Acts applied. The plaintiff was the landlord of the premises and was in actual possession at some date subsequent to July 31, 1923, and the premises thereby became decontrolled. On the question of the meaning of "actual possession," and whether that was a question of fact or law, counsel referred to Hall v. Rogers (41 The Times L.R., 341) and Jewish Maternity Society's Trustees v. Garfinkle (42 The Times L.R., 589).

Counsel submitted that there was evidence on which the Deputy County Court Judge was entitled to draw the inference that the plaintiff was in actual possession of the premises within the meaning of the section. The present case was not determined by Cohen v. Gold (supra), but, if it were, that case was wrongly decided. The judgment of the Divisional Court was wrong, and the judgment of the Deputy County Court Judge ought to be restored.

Mr. W. N. Stable, for the respondent, contended that the decision of the Divisional Court was right. The defendant was entitled to retain possession under section 5 of the Act of 1920. To succeed, the plaintiff must satisfy the Court that he was in actual possession of the premises within the meaning of section 2 of the Act of 1923.

In the Judge's note there was no evidence that the gardener who occupied the premises when the plaintiff purchased them was employed by the plaintiff in any capacity whatever, or that he was in any sense the plaintiff's agent ; and when the plaintiff let the premises to the defendant the gardener was still there and remained in occupation as well as the defendant for some time afterwards. So little was the gardener the plaintiff's servant that the plaintiff was unable to give the defendant sole possession. There was no evidence on which the Court could find that the plaintiff or his predecessor in title ever had actual possession of the premises on or after July 31, 1923, within the meaning of section 2 of the Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions Act, 1923.

Counsel referred to Hall v. Rogers (supra), where Lord Justice Scrutton contrasted actual possession with the idea of a mere legal right to possession. See also Hughes v. Chatham Overseers (5 Man. and Gr., 54), per Chief Justice Tindal, at page 78, as showing that there was no inconsistency between the relation of master and servant and that of landlord and tenant. The situation of a person who was both servant and tenant was clearly within the contemplation of the draftsman of the Rent Restriction Acts. See section 4 (1) of the Act of 1923.

Cohen v. Gold (supra), whether rightly or wrongly decided, was clearly binding on the Divisional Court. According to Cohen v. Gold (supra) there never was a landlord who could have been in possession of the premises on July 31, 1923, or who could have come into possession of them afterwards. Where there had never been a letting of the premises to which the Rent Acts applied, section 2 of the Act of 1923 could not apply. The "landlord" meant some one who, in relation to the premises, at some time or other had a tenant. Having regard to the definition of "landlord" in section 12 (1) (g) of the Act of 1920, the draftsman never contemplated a case where there had never been a letting at all.

In the present case the appellant had entirely failed to discharge the burden of proof which lay on him of showing that he was at any material time in actual possession of the premises. Further, there never was a landlord of the premises in question who, within the meaning of section 2 of the Act of 1923, was in actual possession of the premises.

SIMSON v. MIATT.

This was an appeal by the landlord from a decision of the Divisional Court—Mr. Justice Salter and Mr. Justice Talbot—which raised the question whether a purchaser from a landlord of a dwelling-house to which the Rent Restriction Acts applied, and who had possession of the dwelling-house, could claim that the provisions of the Acts had ceased to apply to it.

In 1910 Mr. F. R. Miller was the owner and occupier of 106, Queen's-road, Finsbury Park, which he held under a lease from the Ecclesiastical Commissioners at a ground-rent of £10 10s. a year. In 1919 the appellant, Mr. Simson, became Mr. Miller's tenant of the whole of the premises at a rent of £60 a year. The appellant thereupon sublet part of the premises to a Mr. Mitchell, who gave up possession in 1922. In December, 1925, the appellant purchased from Mr. Miller the lease of the premises, which had 49 years to run. The appellant continued to occupy the whole house until April, 1926, when he let three rooms to the respondent, Mr. Miatt, at 25s. a week.

On September 24, 1927, the respondent withheld the rent which was due that day, and the appellant served him with notice to quit on September 27. On October 7 the respondent issued a summons for apportionment of rent, and on October 24 the apellant brought an action against the respondent for possession, rent, and mesne profits.

The County Court judge gave judgment for the respondent, Mr. Miatt, and that judgment was affirmed by the Divisional Court.

Mr. Hanbury Aggs and Mr. T. M. O'Callaghan appeared for the appellant; Mr. John Duncan for the respondent.

Mr. Hanbury Aggs, in opening the appeal, referred to the first proviso to section 2 (1) of the Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions Act, 1923, which stated:—

"Provided that where part of a dwelling-house to which the principal Act [the Act of 1920] applies is lawfully sublet, and the part so sublet is also a dwelling-house to which the principal Act applies, the principal Act shall not cease to apply to the part so sublet by reason of the tenant being in or coming into possession of that part, and if the landlord is in or comes into possession of any part not so sublet, the principal Act shall cease to apply to that part notwithstanding that a subtenant continues in, or retains, possession of any other part by virtue of the principal Act."

Counsel said that the proviso could be considered only at the time of decontrol. There could be no decontrol until some person had been found who could be described as the landlord. The ground landlord was not in possession. He submitted that when once a house had become decontrolled in whole or in part it could not come under control again, and that the whole of the premises had become decontrolled when they came into the possession of the appellant after Mr. Mitchell had given up possession. The decision of the Court of Appeal in Brooks and Others v. Liffen (44 The Times L.R., 350) applied to the present case. In his submission, Cohen v. Gold (43 The Times L.R., 376; [1927] 1 K.B., 865) and Lloyd v. Cook (44 The Times L.R., 455) were wrongly decided.

Mr. J. Duncan submitted that the appellant was on the premises as a tenant only and not as landlord for the purposes of the Acts, with the result that he had no rights of decontrol. Further, even if the whole house were decontrolled, that did not prevent the creation of a new tenancy—in this case the letting of the three rooms to the respondent. That created a dwelling-house which remained within the protection of the Rent Restriction Acts.

BARTRAM v. BROWN AND ANOTHER.

This was an appeal by the defendants from a decision of the Divisional Court—Mr. Justice Acton and Mr. Justice Finlay (44 The Times L.R., 572). The case involved the interpretation of section 2 (2) of the Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions Act, 1923, which provides:—

"Where, at any time after the passing of this Act, the landlord of a dwelling-house to which the principal Act applies grants to the tenant a valid lease of the dwelling-house for a term ending at some date after the 24th day of June, 1926, being a term of not less than two years, or enters into a valid agreement with the tenant for a tenancy for such a term, the principal Act shall, as from the commencement of the term, cease to apply to the dwelling-house. . . ."

In March, 1922, the defendant, Mr. Cecil Brown (now deceased), took over the residue of a long lease of premises known as 32, Stroud Green-road, Finsbury Park, N. In May, 1923, Mr. Brown sublet the whole premises to a Mr. Griss for a period of 22 years from March 25, 1923, on terms by which Mr. Griss was prohibited from subletting without his lessor's consent. Without obtaining that consent, Mr. Griss, in May, 1923, sublet two rooms on the top floor to a Mrs. Simpson. Mr. Griss never paid any rent, and, shortly after subletting, disappeared from the premises, Mrs. Simpson remaining in possession of her two rooms.

In September, 1923, Mr. Brown sublet the whole of the premises to a Mr. Redman for a period of 21¼ years at a rent rising from £150 to £160 per annum. Mr. Redman took over Mrs. Simpson as his sub-tenant.

Early in 1926 Mr. Redman vacated possession, and on June 14, 1926, Mr. Brown sublet the whole premises to the plaintiff, Mr. Frank Bartram, on a yearly tenancy at a rent of £160 a year. Mr. Bartram subsequently got into arrear with his rent, and on August 16, 1927, Mr. Brown caused distress to be levied on the premises. Mr. Bartram entered into an agreement with the sheriff's officers, who withdrew, but he was unable to abide by the terms of that agreement, and the distress was renewed on September 7. No leave had been obtained from the Court for the levying of that distress, and Mr. Bartram subsequently brought an action against Mr. Brown and Messrs. Odell, Hibbard, and Co. (the sheriff's officers) for damages for illegal distress.

In the County Court the plaintiff contended that the distress was illegal in that the premises were protected by the Rent Restriction Acts, and that no leave for the levying had been obtained from the Court, as required by section 6 of the Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920.

The defendants contended, inter alia, that the premises had been decontrolled under section 2 (2) of the Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions Act, 1923, by virtue of the long lease granted by Mr. Brown to Mr. Redman in September, 1923.

The County Court Judge held that the words "grants to the tenant a valid lease," in section 2 (2), must be construed as "grants to the sitting tenant a valid lease," that a lease to a person who was not already tenant of the premises could not effect decontrol, and that therefore the premises continued to be protected under the Acts. He gave judgment for the plaintiff for £35, the agreed amount of the damages.

The Divisional Court held that the words "the tenant," in section 2 (2) of the Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions Act, 1923, referred to the particular person who was the tenant at the time when the lease referred to in the subsection was granted, and to no other person, and they affirmed the judgment of the County Court Judge.

The defendants appealed.

Mr. Croom-Johnson, K.C., and Mr. J. H. Critchley appeared for the appellants; Mr. Phineas Quass for the respondent.

Mr. Croom-Johnson contended that the mere return of the lease by Mr. Griss did not operate as a surrender of the lease. Mr. Brown had come into "actual possession" of the premises within the meaning of section 2 of the Act of 1923 before the subletting to Mr. Redman, and the premises had thereby become decontrolled. Further, Mrs. Simpson was at that time not a lawful sub-tenant at all; she did not become so until her rent had been accepted by Mr. Brown.

Counsel further submitted that "the tenant," in section 2 (2), must refer to the time when the matter was being litigated in the County Court, and was not to be limited to the sitting tenant.

Mr. Quass said that before 1923 the premises were within the Act, and there had been one letting of the dwelling-house. After July, 1923, Mr. Brown never came into possession of the whole of the premises, inasmuch as there were two rooms of which Mrs. Simpson was lawfully in possession. As to section 2 (2), he submitted that it had relation to the case where the landlord was not in possession for the reason that there was a tenant who was in possession. It must refer to the sitting tenant.

BARKER v. HUTSON.

This was the plaintiff's appeal from a decision of a Divisional Court affirming a decision of the County Court Judge at Brentford in favour of the defendant in an action brought by the plaintiff for the possession of two rooms at 3, Oxford-road, Ealing, Middlesex.

The plaintiff was the tenant of the whole house under a two years' lease granted to him by the freeholders as from December 26, 1926. There was also a cross-summons by the defendant for apportionment of rent. The County Court Judge dismissed the claim for possession and granted an order for apportionment.

A Mrs. Eldridge had been in possession of the premises as statutory tenant and had given up possession in 1925 to the freeholders. They were in possession when the two years' lease was granted to the plaintiff in December, 1926. In May, 1927, the plaintiff sublet two rooms to the defendant at the weekly rent of 17s. 6d., to include electric light and gas.

The County Court Judge held that the dwelling-house the subject of the proceedings—namely, the two rooms sublet to the defendant—had never been previously let; that they first became a separate dwelling-house on such letting to the defendant; that no one qua landlord had since had or received possession of such dwelling-house; that the case of Cohen v. Gold (43 The Times L.R., 376; [1927] 1 K.B., 865) applied; and that the dwelling-house constituted by these two rooms had never been decontrolled and was, therefore, the subject of apportionment.

The Divisional Court, following Lloyd v. Cook (44 The Times L.R., 455), affirmed the judgment of the County Court Judge.

The plaintiff appealed.

Mr. EDMUNDS contended that the whole of the dwelling-house was decontrolled before the letting to the defendant by reason of the actual possession of the freeholders. If Lloyd v. Cook (supra) was rightly decided, this appeal must fail, but if Ratkinsky v. Jacobs (44 The Times L.R., 548) was a correct decision, then the appeal should succeed. The premises, having been decontrolled by the actual possession of the freeholders, could never become recontrolled by the subsequent letting of part. The Rent Restriction Acts applied in rem. They applied to the dwelling-house and not to the tenant. He submitted that Lloyd v. Cook (supra) was wrongly decided.

Mr. DUNCAN contended that the judgment appealed from was right. The word "landlord" could not apply to an owner or a freeholder who had never previously let the premises. Even assuming that the whole house was decontrolled, the change of status was sufficient to recontrol the two rooms in question in this case.

Mr. EDMUNDS replied.

The following considered judgments in the five cases were delivered.

LORD JUSTICE SCRUTTON.—This group of appeals was heard together on account of difficulties which had arisen from contradictory decisions of the Divisional Courts with regard to the true meaning of the decontrolling section, section 2 of the Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions Act of 1923. The material words of that section are as follows:—

"(1) Where the landlord of a dwelling-house to which the principal Act applies is in possession of the whole of the dwelling-house at the passing of this Act, or comes into possession of the whole of the dwelling-house at any time after the passing of this Act, then from and after the passing of this Act, or from and after the date when the landlord subsequently comes into possession, as the case may be, the principal Act shall cease to apply to the dwelling-house. . . ."

The chief conflict as to the meaning of these words, giving rise to these appeals, is between the decisions of Cohen v. Gold (43 The Times L.R., 376; [1927] 1 K.B., 865) and Lloyd v. Cook (44 The Times L.R., 455) on the one hand, and Ratkinsky v. Jacobs (44 The Times L.R., 548) on the other.

In Cohen v. Gold (supra) the plaintiff when the 1923 Act was passed was in possession of the whole of a house, which he had never let. In 1925 he let three rooms on the ground floor to Gold. He alleged in the action that his actual possession from the passing of the Act of 1923 to the letting in 1925 had caused the Rent Restriction Acts to cease to apply to the three rooms or the whole house, and therefore that he could eject Gold. The Divisional Court (Mr. Justice Acton and Mr. Justice Talbot) decided against the plaintiff, affirming the County Court Judge. I understand that the decision proceeded on two grounds—(1) that "the landlord" could not be in possession or come into possession of premises which had never been let; when there was no tenancy, there was no "landlord." (2) That being in possession of the whole house did not involve being in possession of a part of the house, subsequently let as a dwelling-house. The point that the occupier, being in fact the assignee of a lease with 26 years to run, was a tenant, and not the owner, and could not be within the meaning of the section "the landlord," does not appear to have been taken in the County Court, or to form the ground of the decision.

In Lloyd v. Cook (supra), which is one of the present group of appeals, the claim was by the sub-tenant Lloyd to apportion the standard rent of the whole house so as to determine the proper rent to be paid by him to his landlord, Cook, for two rooms which he occupied. Cook replied that the two rooms and the whole house had been decontrolled. Cook was the holder of a 99 years' lease and occupier of the whole house. She had let three rooms to one Churchman. On August 12, 1926, Churchman vacated possession. Cook went in, prepared one room for the reception of her son, who at once occupied it, and on August 28, 1926, let the two remaining rooms to Lloyd. Cook contended that she had come into actual possession of the two rooms, which were therefore decontrolled. The Divisional Court (Mr. Justice Salter and Mr. Justice Charles) decided against the contention, reversing the County Court Judge, who had held that the rooms were decontrolled. The points that the rooms were not decontrolled by reason of the proviso to section 2 (1) of the Act of 1923, and as to the effect of section 12, subsection 7, of the Act of 1920 in enabling the Court to disregard long leases at a ground rent, were not taken in the County Court, and could not be taken against the County Court decision in the High Court. The Divisional Court took the view that though the dwelling-house composed of three rooms had been decontrolled, Cook having come into possession of it after it had been let, the dwelling-house of two rooms, which as such had never been previously let, had never been or come into Cook's possession as landlord, following Cohen v. Gold (supra). The points that Cook being tenant was not landlord within the meaning of the section, and as to the effect of section 12, subsection 7, of the Act of 1920, were never taken or decided.

On the other hand, in Ratkinsky v. Jacobs (supra), Barnet Ratkinsky, the father, had bought a house in 1917, and had let four rooms to a Mr. Cohen, who vacated possession in February, 1926. Barnet, being then in possession of the whole house, let four rooms, three of Cohen's letting, and one other to Jacobs. In February, 1927, Barnet sold the whole house to his son Morris, who in November, 1927, gave notice to Jacobs to quit and claimed possession. Jacobs replied he was protected by the Rent Restriction Acts, and his counsel relied on Cohen v. Gold (supra) and Lloyd v. Cook (supra). The Court, composed of Mr. Justice Branson and Mr. Justice MacKinnon, declined to follow the cases cited. They held that "landlord" meant "owner"; that an owner might be in actual possession though he had never previously let; and that, as the owner had been in possession of the four rooms let to Jacobs after the passing of the Act of 1923, they were decontrolled. In this case it will be noted that the Ratkinskys were owners, not themselves tenants.

These two lines of decisions cannot stand together; one side or the other must be wrong. I look at the object and words of section 2 of the Act of 1923 to ascertain its true construction.

I take its object to be at a time when rent restriction was supposed to be drawing to an end, owing to increased provision of houses, gradually to decontrol in cases where existing vested interests had come to an end by the owner's or landlord's having or obtaining vacant possession on or after July 31, 1923, but not to allow a tenant to obtain freedom to profiteer, by subletting, while his landlord was bound to him by the Acts. By reason of the first proviso to section 2, it could not be argued that the tenant by coming into possession of the part which he had sublet obtained freedom from control, while his landlord was controlled; the landlord could get freedom from control of the part of which he came into actual possession, though he was controlled as to the part in possession of the sub-tenant. This was carrying out the policy of section 5, subsection 5, and section 15, subsection 3, of the Act of 1920.

Turning to the actual words, the substantive part of section 2, subsection 1, of the Act of 1923, uses the word "landlord"; it does not speak of tenant, or sub-tenant. It speaks of a "whole dwelling-house" and frees the whole dwelling-house under certain conditions from the application of the principal Act. The first of these conditions is if the "landlord" is at the passing of the Act in actual possession of the whole dwelling-house. He cannot be, if at that date he has a tenant. If he has then no tenant, he is not stricto sensu a "landlord." This seems to me conclusive to show that the term "landlord" cannot be used as requiring a contract of tenancy. To hold otherwise would be to prevent any person from being in actual possession at the passing of the Act, so as to decontrol the house, for if he were then a "landlord" in the strict sense, his tenant would be in possession. The word "landlord" must be used either in the looser meaning of "owner," or in the still looser meaning of a person who at a later stage is going to appear as a landlord contesting with a tenant the terms of his tenancy. Indeed, that "landlord" means "owner" is the view of Mr. Justice Salter in Brooks and Others v. Liffen (44 The Times L.R., 94; [1928] 1 K.B., 441), adopted by Lord Justice Sankey in the same case in this Court (44 The Times L.R., 350). But if "landlord" means "owner," it seems to me impossible to support the view that the section cannot apply unless the house is or has been previously let, which is the fundamental ground for the decisions in Cohen v. Gold (supra) and Lloyd v. Cook (supra). If the owner on or after July 31, 1923, has or comes into actual possession of the whole house, there are no vested interests to prevent decontrol; similarly, if he comes into actual possession of a dwelling-house which is part of another dwelling-house, the first and smaller dwelling-house may be decontrolled.

It is further to be noted that the effect of the "landlord's" coming into possession of the whole dwelling-house is that "the principal Act shall cease to apply to the dwelling-house." Now, apart from the effect of subsection 7 of section 12 of the Act of 1920, which must be considered separately, this renders it very difficult to contend that a tenant can be a landlord or owner. Suppose the tenant sublets his whole tenement and then comes into actual possession of it again, if as between himself and any sub-tenant the house is decontrolled, is the house decontrolled as between the tenant and his landlord, so that the landlord can distrain without leave of the Court, or get possession at the end of the tenant's contractual tenancy? It is difficult to see why it should follow from the tenant's getting actual possession against his sub-tenant that he should lose the protection of the Acts against his landlord. But if he does not, then the Acts have not "ceased to apply to the dwelling-house." In the case of the tenant's subletting part, the first proviso to section 2 (1) of the 1923 Act makes it clear that Parliament did not intend that the tenant recovering actual possession should free himself and the part of the house from the Acts. It may be said that the insertion of the proviso involves that but for the proviso the tenant would be a landlord within the first part of the section. But it is not uncommon to insert a proviso to prevent the main enactment from being construed as having a meaning which it does not bear. It will be noted that in the proviso "landlord" certainly means "owner" or "freeholder" as distinguished from "tenant"; it would be curious if in the first part of the section it has a different meaning and includes "tenant." I have come to the conclusion, after careful consideration of the object and language of the section, that "landlord" means owner or freeholder, and subject to consideration of the Act of 1920, section 12, subsection 7, does not include a tenant from a freeholder. I test the question in this way. Suppose that, the day after the passing of the Act of 1923, two persons came before a Judge to ascertain their respective positions in regard to houses which were by rateable value within the Rent Restriction Acts. The first was a freeholder, who said: "I have always been in actual possession of this house, which has never been let. Is it now decontrolled?" The answer would, I think, be, "Yes; it is true you are not strictly a landlord, as there is no tenant, but if this is the meaning of 'landlord' no 'landlord' would ever be in actual possession at the passing of the Act; possession would always be in the tenant. Landlord must mean owner who can let." The second applicant said: "I have a three years' lease from the freeholder, and am in actual possession. I can sublet the whole of the premises. Am I a 'landlord' in actual possession so that the premises are decontrolled?" The answer should, in my opinion, be "No; you are in actual possession, but as a tenant, not as a landlord; so long as you are a tenant you cannot get decontrol." I do not find that the definition of "landlord" in the 1920 Act, section 12, presents any difficulty. Subsection (1) (g) expressly excludes the tenant from those persons who may be "landlords" because they are entitled to possession, and would include an owner who has not let, but is in possession. When subsection (1) (f) makes "landlord" include a person deriving title under the original landlord, I do not think it can contemplate there being at the same time two landlords—one the landlord, the other the tenant. The person who derives title under the original landlord takes his place; the "original landlord" ceases to be the landlord. I am the more persuaded that the term "landlord" must be restricted to "owner" because I do not see how else the Acts can "cease to apply to the dwelling-house." If they still apply as between owner and tenant they do not "cease to apply." When Parliament wanted the Acts not to apply to a particular rent or tenancy, they knew how to say so (section 12, subsection 7, of the 1920 Act). Under that subsection the Acts continue to apply to the whole dwelling-house. It is also to be noted that to construe "landlord" as "a tenant who has or may let" would in some cases have no effect, in other cases an effect contrary to the policy of the Act. If the tenant, whether statutory or contractual, sublets part of his tenement, by the operation of the proviso the part is not decontrolled by the landlord-tenant coming into actual possession of the part so let. If the statutory tenant assigns or sublets the whole of his tenement, the landlord, under section 5, subsection 1 (h), of the Act of 1920, as amended by s. 4 of the Act of 1923, can turn him out, and there will be no question of actual possession reverting to the tenant. If a contractual tenant or a statutory tenant, with consent, lawfully sublets the whole, and if he is a "landlord" within section 2 of the 1923 Act, this consequence follows. Before he sublets he is in actual possession, and if he is a "landlord" the premises are decontrolled, and he loses his protection against his landlord, which I cannot believe to be the intention of Parliament.

There remains the question of the meaning of the subsection just cited. As I have stated in Brooks and Others v. Liffen (supra), I have no doubt of the original object of this subsection. It was (1) to prevent a long lease at a small ground rent from hampering the landlord in charging a proper rent, or perhaps from evicting the tenant at the end of the lease. (2) To prevent compassionate tenancies granted at a low rent during the War from having a lasting effect against the charitable landlord. But the suggestion was made that the effect of the Courts' having to treat such tenancies as non-existing was to prevent them from saying that there was an owner other than the tenant, and to compel them always to treat the tenant as owner. In Brooks and Others v. Liffen (supra) this argument was carried to an ingenious extreme. Brooks was the freeholder; Liffen, his tenant, had, in 1904, 20 years to run of a long lease at a low ground rent. This lease terminated in June, 1924, and Liffen was immediately granted a quarterly tenancy at a rack rent. In November, 1926, Brooks gave the tenant notice to quit, alleging that, as the Courts could not treat the long lease as existing, Liffen had been in actual possession after 1923, and therefore the Acts ceased to apply to his dwelling-house. The County Court Judge, the Divisional Court, and the Court of Appeal declined to accept this argument. The Court was not bound to shut its eyes to the fact that at the time when there was a quarterly tenancy by a freeholder to a tenant there was then an owner of the house, and Liffen, though a "person entitled to possession" under section 12, subsection 1 (g), was not "a person other than the tenant." Further, the subsection expressly said that the Acts were to continue to apply to the house; the owner could not, therefore, say that they did not apply. Another way of stating the point decided was that, if the Court was unable to look at the facts while the long lease was in existence, when at the end of that lease they could look at the facts they found Liffen a quarterly tenant and Brooks a landlord who had never been in actual possession. The Act of 1923, therefore, gave Brooks nothing, while the Act of 1920 said that the Acts were to continue to apply to the house.

Some trouble is caused by the cases of Finey v. Gougoltz (42 The Times L.R., 501; [1926] 2 K.B., 322) and Jenkinson v. Wright (40 The Times L.R., 858; [1924] 2 K.B., 645). In the latter case Jenkinson, in 1920, acquired an unexpired term of 31 years of a 99 years' lease. In 1921 she mortgaged her leasehold interest by subdemise to the mortgagee at a nominal rent of a peppercorn. She lived in the house, and let part of it after 1923. She gave her sub-tenant notice to quit, alleging that she had had actual possession after 1923, and he replied that the tenancy under the mortgage could not be looked at under subsection 7 of s. 12 of the Act of 1920, and that the proviso to section 2 (1) of the Act of 1923 protected him. The County Court Judge held that the plaintiff was tenant, and therefore that the proviso applied, and the house was still subject to the Acts. The Judges in the Divisional Court allowed the appeal, but on different grounds. Mr. Justice Darling held that a tenant with a substantial part of a lease unexpired was a "landlord" for the purposes of section 2 (1) of the Act of 1923, apparently quite independently of the question of the relation of rent to rateable value under subsection 7 of section 12 of the Act of 1920. This seems to me, with respect, to be legislation, not construction. Long leases at a rack rent do not take a house out of the Act. He further held that though the mortgage made the "landlord" a tenant, it might be disregarded under subsection 7, and the "landlord-tenant" was therefore in actual possession, and the Acts did not apply. This, although subsection 7 said that the Acts should apply, and only the tenancy be disregarded. Mr. Justice Rowlatt did not express any opinion on the first point; he agreed that subsection 7 struck out the mortgage tenancy, but pointed out that the point with regard to the proviso to section 2 (1) of the Act of 1923 was not taken in the County Court, and therefore could not be considered.

So far as it rested on the view of Mr. Justice Darling, that any tenant under a long lease, whether within s. 12, subsection 7, of the Act of 1920 or not, was a landlord, in my view this case was wrongly decided. If the other points had been taken in the County Court, it appears to me, for the reasons stated hereafter, that Jenkinson was, by the operation of subsection 7, a landlord in actual possession of a tenement decontrolled by section 2 (1) of the Act of 1923, and therefore the subsequent letting did not make the proviso applicable.

In Finey v. Gougoltz (supra) Gougoltz was the lessee of a 99 years' lease at a rent of £10; and in January, 1925, was in possession of the whole of the house. In February, 1925, she let a room to Finey. As he did not pay his rent she distrained on him, without leave, and he brought an action for wrongful distress, and claimed apportionment. The County Court Judge held that Gougoltz was not landlord, but tenant, and that the premises were not decontrolled.

The Divisional Court reversed this decision, holding that subsection 7 required them to treat the tenant as landlord, and section 2 decontrolled the house, there not being three persons, landlord, tenant, and sub-tenant, under the proviso. They thus not only ignored the rent and tenancy, but ignored the real owner, and ignored the concluding words of subsection 7, that the Act should apply to the dwelling-house. For the reasons given below I think this case was rightly decided.

I do not pretend that it is easy to construe subsection 7 of section 12 of the Act of 1920, and section 2 of the Act of 1923; and I doubt whether the draftsmen or legislature bestowed any thought on their meaning. I have come to the conclusion that the true construction of subsection 7 of section 12 of the Act of 1920 and section 2 of the Act of 1923 is as follows:—

1. Where a long lease coming within the terms of subsection 7 expires after July, 1923, and the landlord goes into actual possession, before he grants a new tenancy, there seems to be no difficulty: the house becomes decontrolled under section 2.

2. Where, when such a long lease expires, the landlord has arranged for a tenancy to follow immediately, Brooks and Others v. Liffen (supra), by which we are bound, decides that the landlord, not being in actual possession, section 2 does not apply, and the house is not decontrolled.

3. Where such a long lease has not expired, subsection 7 of section 12 of the Act of 1920, with section 2 of the Act of 1923, requires the Court to ignore the fact that there is an owner, not the tenant, and an owner who is not in actual possession. The subsection says that the Act is to apply in respect of the house, but section 2 of the Act of 1923 enables the Court to overlook the owner and turn the tenant into a landlord-owner, thus depriving the tenant of any protection or restriction he would get from the Acts. I doubt whether Parliament ever gave the relation between the two sections a thought, but in my opinion the above is the result of their labours.

I have had great doubt what is the position when the long lease under subsection 7 of section 12 of the Act of 1920 has not expired at the time, either at the passing of the Act of 1923 or after it, when the tenant is in actual possession of the demised tenement. But I appreciate that to hold that the freeholder at such a time is to be considered by the Court as owner and landlord will be to prevent a very large number of dwelling-houses in London, where there are many long leases at ground rents, from being decontrolled. And, though with considerable hesitation, I have come to the conclusion that the Court, which is to disregard the rent and tenancy may, under section 2 of the Act of 1923, treat the tenant under such a lease as the landlord; and if he is, or has been, at or since the passing of the Act of 1923, in actual possession, may treat the premises as decontrolled. In other words, in such a case the part of subsection 7 of section 12 of the Act of 1920 which provides that the Act is to continue to apply to the dwelling-house is to be treated as repealed by section 2 of the Act of 1923.

If the tenant under a lease within subsection 7 of section 12 of the Act of 1920 is in actual possession of the whole house at the passing of the Act of 1923, or comes into possession of the whole house, he can be treated as landlord, and the premises can be decontrolled under section 2, subsection 1, of the Act of 1923. It is immaterial if, after that, he lets part, and resumes actual possession of this part. The proviso does not apply, for the premises are already decontrolled. If at the time of the passing of the Act he has sublet part of the premises and comes into actual possession of that part, the part is decontrolled, for as landlord he has resumed possession of part, and decontrol follows from the last words of the proviso.

I have come to the conclusions:—

1. In so far as they rest on the view that there cannot be a landlord under section 2 of the Act of 1923, unless the exact dwelling-house, the subject of the dispute, has been previously let, and that it is immaterial that a large dwelling-house containing the dwelling-house in question has been previously let or has returned to the actual possession of the owner, Cohen v. Gold (43 The Times L.R., 376; [1927] 1 K.B., 865) and Lloyd v. Cook (44 The Times L.R., 455) are wrongly decided, and Ratkinsky v. Jacobs (44 The Times L.R., 548) is rightly decided.

2. "Landlord" in section 2 of the Act of 1923 means owner or freeholder, and, apart from subsection 7 of section 12 of the Act of 1920, actual possession by a tenant either of the whole or part of a dwelling-house cannot decontrol the house, either under the principal clause or the proviso. It is possession by a tenant, not by a landlord.

3. The general operation of subsection 7 of section 12 of the Act of 1920 and section 2 of the Act of 1923 may during the currency of a lease within subsection 7 of section 12 of the Act of 1920 under section 2 of the Act of 1923 turn a tenant into an owner, so as to decontrol a house under section 2 of the Act of 1923 to which subsection 7 of section 12 of the Act of 1920 had said the Act was to apply. I have above stated the detailed application of subsection and section.

4. As to other cases, this Court is of course bound by Prout v. Hunter (40 The Times L.R., 868; [1924] 2 K.B., 736) and Brooks and Others v. Liffen (44 The Times L.R., 350). The following cases were correctly decided: Dunbar v. Smith (42 The Times L.R., 196; [1926] 1 K.B., 360), Catto v. Curry (42 The Times L.R., 243; [1926] 1 K.B., 461), Joy v. Eppner (41 The Times L.R., 136; [1925] 1 K.B., 362), and Doulin v. Purcell (43 The Times L.R., 140).

The following cases were wrongly decided: Jenkinson v. Wright (40 The Times L.R., 858; [1924] 2 K.B., 645), so far as it rests on the view of Mr. Justice Darling that the tenant under any long lease is an owner, and in so far as it ignores the effect of the proviso to section 2; Oakley v. Wilson (43 The Times L.R., 521; [1927] 2 K.B., 279).

LLOYD v. COOK.

This is one of the two cases the conflict of which with Ratkinsky v. Jacobs (44 The Times L.R., 548) resulted in the hearing of this group of cases.

Mrs. Cook in 1913 purchased as tenant the remaining period of a long lease of 99 years. She let three rooms, part of the demised premises, to Churchman, who gave up possession on August 14, 1926. She then came into actual possession of these three rooms, and at once prepared one for her son, who came in and occupied, paying rent. On August 28 she let the other two rooms to Lloyd, who presently applied for apportionment, and to this Mrs. Cook replied that the rooms were decontrolled.

The County Court Judge held in Mrs. Cook's favour that the two rooms were decontrolled, Mrs. Cook having been in actual possession between August 14 and August 28. That is his contemporary note. In signing a note on March 8, 1928, he added that Mrs. Cook was the landlord of the three rooms let to Churchman. The Divisional Court reversed this decision on the ground that the two rooms had never been let before as a separate dwelling, and therefore when first let were controlled by the Acts, supporting this decision by that in Cohen v. Gold (supra). Oddly enough, Mr. Justice Salter agrees that the three rooms were decontrolled as a separate dwelling, but holds that the two rooms, part of the three, were not. It must be noted that there is no trace in the notes or judgment that any point was taken as to the effect of the long lease under section 12, subsection 7, of the 1920 Act, or as to the effect of the proviso to the 1923 Act, section 2, or I think as to the contention that though Cook might be the landlord of Churchman or Lloyd, she was not the landlord of the whole dwelling-house within the meaning of section 2 of the Act of 1923. The decision in Smith v. Baker (7 The Times L.R., 679; [1891] A.C., 325) prevents our giving effect to our view on these points. Apart from these points, I think the decision of the County Court Judge was right and the decision of the Divisional Court erroneous. I do not think it was necessary that there should be a previous letting of these two rooms as a dwelling-house before a "landlord" could obtain actual control of them, and that it is immaterial whether they had never been let at all, or only as part of a larger dwelling-house. If they had never been let at all, the actual possession was the more complete. On the points which alone we can consider the appeal must be allowed and the judgment of the County Court Judge restored, with costs here and below.

But I think it right to add that in our view of the construction of the statutes, if the points had been taken:—

1. Apart from the question of the long lease, the freeholder would be owner; the proviso to section 2 of the Act of 1923 would therefore apply, and neither the three nor the two rooms would be decontrolled.

2. If the long lease is considered, as I have already stated, in my opinion it prevents the Court from taking notice that there is an owner who was not in actual possession, and allows the Court to treat the tenant as landlord and ignore the owner.

If subsequent cases raise similar facts to Lloyd v. Cook (supra) and the first point above is taken, and there is no long lease, the rooms would not be decontrolled, though not for the reasons given by the Divisional Court, which were in my opinion erroneous.

GOUDGE v. BROUGHTON.

In this case Goudge, the plaintiff, bought a cottage called "Under Beeches Stables" in October, 1925. It had never previously been let. When he bought it he found in it the gardener of the previous owner. This gardener is stated to have paid no rent. The gardener stayed in the cottage, paying no rent, till December, 1926, when the plaintiff let the cottage to the defendant Broughton and "got rid of the gardener." Goudge gave Broughton notice to quit and brought an action for possession, and Broughton pleaded the Rent Acts. The County Court Judge made an order for possession. To do so he must have found that Goudge before he let to Broughton was in actual possession, through or in spite of the gardener, who was a licensee, tenant at will, or trespasser, and who anyhow was not there on the terms of paying rent; and that the cottage was therefore decontrolled. The Divisional Court reversed this, on the ground taken in Cohen v. Gold (supra) that the plaintiff could not be a "landlord" who had obtained actual possession, for if he did so obtain possession it was when the cottage had never been let, and therefore he could not be a "landlord." Holding this, the Court did not decide the point about the gardener, though I think Mr. Justice Salter's judgment shows that he would either have held Goudge to have possession through the gardener or the finding of the County Court Judge to be one of fact with which he could not interfere.

I take the same view of this point. I think there was evidence on which the Judge could find that the owner was in actual possession through the tenant at will or licensee. In Remon v. City of London Real Property Company (36 The Times L.R., 869; [1921] 1 K.B., 49) I said, and I think it has been accepted, that the decision with regard to statutory tenants only applies to cases where there was a previous legal letting and legal tenancy, and does not extend to caretakers, occupiers by service, and mere trespassers.

I should have made the same finding as the Judge. That being so, Goudge was in actual possession after the passing of the Act of 1923, and the premises became decontrolled, for in my view it was not necessary that they should have been previously let to make the plaintiff a "landlord" within the meaning of the Act, which is the decision in Cohen v. Gold (supra) on which the Divisional Court proceeded. I think that decision and the decision in the present case cannot stand. The appeal must be allowed and the judgment of the County Court restored, with costs here and below.

SIMSON v. MIATT.

In this case one Miller was a tenant of a dwelling-house under a long lease at £10 a year, and he let the house to Simson at £60 a year. During this time Simson let four rooms on the top floor and a room on the ground floor to Mitchell. In 1922 Mitchell went out and Simson, as tenant to Miller, was in possession of the whole house. In December, 1925, Simson purchased from Miller the unexpired portion of the lease, being then in possession of the whole house as tenant under the long lease. In April, 1926, Simson let to Miatt three out of the four rooms on the top floor. Miatt did not pay his rent. Simson therefore took out a summons for possession. Miatt replied with a summons for apportionment. The County Court Judge, in a careful judgment, held that Simson was always a tenant and never a "landlord," and that the premises were not, therefore, decontrolled. It is, I think, clear that the point under the Act of 1920, section 12, subsection 7, was taken before him, for he speaks of Miller as a lessee at a ground rent having no landlord, and Simson having no landlord after the assignment in 1925. But it follows in my view that Simson was then a landlord in actual possession by virtue of subsection 7, and that the house was, therefore, decontrolled. The Divisional Court, without expressing any opinion on this point, held, following Lloyd v. Cook (supra), that as the three rooms let to Miatt had never been let before, Simson did not come into possession of them as landlord. I have already held that Lloyd v. Cook (supra) was wrongly decided. It follows that the reason of the Divisional Court for supporting the judgment was erroneous. But in my opinion the County Court Judge did not give the proper effect to the fact that Simson was tenant under a long lease at a ground rent. He should have treated Simson after 1925 as a landlord in actual possession. Section 2 of the Act of 1923 then decontrolled the premises, and Miatt had no right to a summons for apportionment. The premises were decontrolled before he omitted to pay his rent, for the actual possession obtained by Simson was not for non-payment of rent. The judgment of the County Court was therefore erroneous, and the judgment of the Divisional Court supporting it was also based on erroneous reasons. The appeal must, therefore, be allowed, and judgment given for possession, and the summons for apportionment dismissed.

BARTRAM v. BROWN AND OTHERS.

The facts in this case were very complicated. Brown, the landlord, was sued for levying a distress without the leave of the Court, and replied that the premises had become decontrolled (1) by his being in actual possession after 1923, (2) by his having granted two long leases, (1) to one Griss, and (2) to one Redman, thus decontrolling the premises under subsection 2 of section 2 of the Act of 1923.

The County Court Judge held: (1) That the landlord had never obtained actual possession, (2) that under subsection 2 the lease must be granted to the "sitting tenant," a tenant then in actual possession, and not to a fresh tenant.

The Divisional Court affirmed him on both points. I have come to the same conclusion. With regard to the point of actual possession, without going into the complicated facts, I cannot find a time after July, 1923, when the Browns were in actual possession. A certain Mrs. Simpson remained in possession of some rooms during the whole period, paying rent to various people, including the Browns. The Browns themselves had carried on a butcher's business there and withdrawn from it, and never seem to have come near the place, except for a casual inspection. They granted long leases to Griss and Redman, both of whom disappeared. Mrs. Simpson remained a tenant through all the changes in the history of the house. On the second point, I think the object of the subsection was to allow the change, from a tenant under the Acts to a tenant under contract who had as much contractual protection as he would get under the Acts, to decontrol the house. If a long lease was being granted to a new tenant, decontrol could be effected under section 2, subsection 1, of the Act of 1923, by the landlord's entering into actual possession before he granted the new lease, without any need for subsection 2. If there were a sitting tenant, "the tenant," he could not be dealt with in this way, and subsection 2 was necessary. The whole aim of section 2 of the Act of 1923 in my opinion was to accelerate decontrol, if vested interests were extinguished as provided for. The appeal must be dismissed with costs.

BARKER v. HUTSON.

The facts of this case are simple. In 1926 the owners were in actual possession of a dwelling-house, 3, Oxford-road, Ealing, and on December 25, 1926, they let it to Barker, the present plaintiff and appellant. In May, 1927, Barker sublet two rooms to Hutson, the present defendant and respondent. Barker gave Hutson notice to quit. Hutson replied that the rooms were under the Rent Restriction Acts, and asked for apportionment. The County Court Judge, following Cohen v. Gold (supra), and finding that the two rooms had never been let as a separate dwelling-house before, decided in favour of the tenant. The Divisional Court, hearing the case after Lloyd v. Cook (supra) had been decided, followed the two previous cases and dismissed the appeal. In my view, when the freeholders were in actual possession after July, 1923, the whole house became decontrolled. Control did not revive on the letting of the whole house to Barker, or the two rooms to Hutson. The appeal must be allowed, the judgment of the County Court Judge set aside, and an order made for possession and mesne profits at 17s. 6d. a week from November 21, 1927. The plaintiff must have the costs here and below. The order of the Judge for apportionment cannot stand.

LORD JUSTICE GREER.—It will be seen when I read my judgment that, although I agree in the result in all these five cases, I do not agree with my Lord with regard to the grounds on which the decision is put, and, unfortunately, the grounds for the decision seem to me to be more important than the decision in each of these cases. Therefore I think it necessary to read a separate judgment.

In order to deal with the questions arising in these cases, it is necessary to consider two questions arising on the construction of section 2 of the Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions Act, 1923.

The first question is whether, when the Act has ceased to apply to the whole of a dwelling-house, it becomes reapplied to parts of the dwelling-house subsequently let, which have never been the subject-matter of a separate letting before.

The second question is whether a house can become decontrolled if the landlord of the tenant who is the occupying tenant at the time when the question arises is able to prove that he was in possession of the whole of the dwelling-house at the time of the passing of the Act of 1923 (31st July, 1923).

The first question involves a decision as to whether Cohen v. Gold (43 The Times L.R., 376; [1927] 1 K.B., 865), followed by Lloyd v. Cook (44 The Times L.R., 455), on the one hand, or Ratkinsky v. Jacobs (44 The Times L.R., 548), on the other hand, was rightly decided. On this question I have come to the conclusion that when the whole of a dwelling-house, to which the Act applies, has become decontrolled, the decontrol affects every part of the dwelling-house, whether such part has or has not been previously let. It has been decided by this Court that where the whole of a dwelling-house is let on August 3, 1914, that is a letting of every part of the dwelling-house, and a subsequent letting of part of the dwelling-house is not, within the Act, the first letting of such part (Sutton v. Begley ([1923] 2 K.B., 694)). For the purpose of deciding when the separate part was first let, the rule that the whole includes the part has thus been applied by the Court. I think that the same rule should equally apply when the question is whether the decontrol of the whole is a decontrol of all the parts. Since the decision in Barrett v. Hardy Bros. (Alnwick), Limited (41 The Times L.R., 426; [1925] 2 K.B., 220), it has always been considered that the Rent Restriction Acts operate in rem, by attaching to a dwelling-house a standard rent which applies to the whole house, and, where necessary, also applies by apportionment to every part. In my judgment, when, by reason of section 2 of the Act of 1923, the standard rent no longer applies to the whole house, an apportioned part of it also ceases to apply to each and every part whether such part has ever been separately let or not. I think the decisions in Cohen v. Gold (supra) and Lloyd v. Cook (supra) were not right, and that Ratkinsky v. Jacobs (supra) was correctly decided.

The other question with regard to the meaning of "landlord," in section 2 of the Act of 1923, is one of great difficulty. It seems quite clear that neither in the Act of 1920 nor in that of 1923 is the word used in the technical sense of a person between whom and the tenant a contractual relationship of landlord and tenant exists. An occupying tenant only requires the protection of section 5 of the Act of 1920 when his position as tenant under his contract is determined, and it is impossible to read that section without seeing that the landlord referred to in many of the subsections is the immediate landlord of the occupying tenant. For example, the landlord referred to in subsection (1) (c) is the landlord who has received a notice to quit from his tenant. This clearly means the immediate landlord of the occupying tenant, he being the only person to whom such notice could be given. It also seems clear that, if such an immediate landlord required the dwelling-house for occupation as a residence for himself within subsection (1) (d), he would be the landlord for the purposes of that subsection. It has been held, and I think rightly held, in Scotland, that "landlord" in subsection (1) (f) includes a tenant who has sublet. It seems clear also that under subsection (1) (i), as inserted by section 4 of the Act of 1923, "landlord" must include a landlord who is himself a tenant, if he is the employer in whose employment the tenant therein referred to was. In my judgment, the effect of section 2 of the Act of 1923 is to add to the various circumstances which, under section 5 of the Act of 1920, permit an order for possession to be made, and that "landlord" in that section includes any person who, but for the provisions of the Act of 1920, would be entitled to say to the occupying tenant: "Your tenancy has come to an end. Hand over the premises to me." In my opinion, section 2 of the Act of 1923 provides that where a person claiming that the contract of tenancy between him and the occupying tenant has come to an end can prove to the Court that he was in possession of the whole of the dwelling-house on the 31st July, 1923, or, subsequently to that date, came into possession thereof, he establishes the decontrol of the house, and he is entitled to succeed in his claim for possession against the occupying tenant; when this state of things is proved, the Act is repealed so far as that house is concerned. I read the proviso as creating an exception in a case where the dwelling-house which is the subject-matter of the dispute is part of a larger dwelling-house, enacting that in such a case the smaller dwelling-house shall not be decontrolled. I take the same view of the second subsection of section 2, and indeed, with reference to this subsection, the case seems even clearer than with reference to subsection (1), because, as has been decided, and I think rightly, the tenant therein referred to is the sitting tenant, and the only person who could, in ordinary circumstances, grant to the sitting tenant a further lease for two years is his immediate landlord. In most cases the freeholder with a tenant whose lease is still in operation would have no say on the question whether or not a two years' lease should be granted to the sitting tenant; the latter's tenancy is a tenancy between him and his immediate landlord. I think the construction of the Act of 1923 that has commended itself to me is one which carries out the probable intention of the Acts of Parliament gradually to bring about the decontrol of property which was controlled for reasons which no longer apply.

It seems quite clear that the word "landlord" in section 5 of the Act of 1920 cannot mean landlord in the ordinarily accepted meaning of the word. The section is dealing with cases in which the tenancy at common law has come to an end. There are no longer a contractual landlord and a contractual tenant. The person claiming possession from the occupying tenant is his ex-landlord. The word "landlord" is used in the sense of the person, be he himself a freeholder or a leaseholder, who is the ex-landlord of the occupying tenant.

Section 5 gives to the tenant the absolute right to remain in possession notwithstanding the expiry of his tenancy, unless his ex-landlord can bring the case within one or other of the sub-clauses of the section. If he cannot do so, the ex-landlord is turned into a statutory landlord; if he does so, the Court may make an order for possession. The matter will be made clearer by considering a concrete case. "A" is the freeholder. He has let the whole of a dwelling house at a rack rent for 21 years to "B." "B," after occupying for seven years, has lawfully sublet on an annual tenancy to "C," and has duly given him notice to quit, and after the notice has expired brings an action for possession in the County Court. He proves that he let the house to "C" as part of the terms of his employment of "C," and claims the benefit of subsection (1) (i). The Court has a discretion to make an order for possession under that subsection. The leaseholder has himself duly performed all the terms of his subsisting lease from the freeholder. The freeholder is therefore out of the picture so far as the facts are concerned which the County Court Judge has to consider. It seems impossible to hold that the long leaseholder is not the landlord of the occupying tenant within the purview of section 5, subsection (1) (i). So, if "B," instead of being the original lessee of "A," had bought the lease, and in other respects complied with subsection (1) (f), it would be difficult to hold that he was not the landlord within the meaning of subsection (1) (f). Similar considerations lead to a similar conclusion in any case where the immediate landlord of the occupying tenant can bring his case for possession within subsection (1) (g).

In considering the construction of section 2 of the Act of 1923, it seems necessary to consider the effect of subsection (7) of section 12 of the Act of 1920. It has been suggested that, but for this subsection, the term "landlord" would in all cases mean the freeholder. In my judgment, the subsection has no such effect. I think it was inserted to prevent an occupying tenant, under a lease from the ground landlord, or any other landlord who had let the premises to him for any reason at a rent less than two-thirds of the rateable value, from saying after the expiration of the lease that he was entitled to retain possession so long as he paid that rent, and not for the purpose of preventing him from being considered the landlord in a case where his lessee had let the house at a rack rent to the occupying tenant. I think the landlord, under section 5, is in every case the ex-landlord of the occupying tenant who is seeking an order for possession.

The considerations I have been dealing with affecting the meaning of the word "landlord" in section 5 of the Act of 1920 seem to me equally to apply to the question arising in one of these cases with regard to the meaning of "landlord" in section 2 of the Act of 1923, which by section 20 has to be construed as one with the Act of 1920—that is, as if it were contained in a section of that Act.

In my judgment the word "landlord" in section 2 of the Act of 1923 means the same person as it means in section 5 of the Act of 1920—that is to say, the person who, being an ex-landlord of the occupying tenant, is asking for possession of the tenement on the determination of the contractual tenancy. Where such an ex-landlord can prove either that he was in possession of the whole of the dwelling-house at the date of the passing of the Act of 1923 (31st July, 1923), or since that date, the 1920 Act ceases to apply to that dwelling-house and to every part of it, and the Court is bound to consider such a person's claim for possession or increased rent, independently of the Act of 1920. When these facts are proved, the whole of the dwelling-house passes for ever out of the purview of the Act. It is "decontrolled" (to use a convenient word), not merely as between that landlord and that tenant, but for all purposes. If there be an outstanding tenancy between the freeholder and the occupying tenant's landlord, the rights of the parties to that tenancy agreement are put outside the Act, and they are for the future to be regulated by the subsisting agreement. The mesne landlord who has himself been freed from the restrictions of the Act is himself disentitled to claim its protection when his own landlord becomes by contract or at common law entitled to possession. I cannot myself see that this result is unreasonable or unfair. A mesne landlord who has himself obtained release from the shackles of the Act has no grievance if the facts which entitle him to such release operate in favour of his superior landlord or landlords. I read the proviso not as an explanation of the meaning of the substantive parts of section 2, but as an exception to it. I think if it had not been there a mesne landlord who had let part of a house as a separate dwelling-house, and could prove that he was in possession of that part on the 31st July, 1923, would have been entitled to say that the part of the dwelling-house was decontrolled. The proviso was put in to prevent the tenant of a whole dwelling-house which had not been decontrolled from profiteering with regard to part of the dwelling-house, while his immediate landlord remained subject to control; and the latter part of the proviso was inserted to enable his immediate landlord, if he got into possession of the rest of the house, to say that at any rate that part was decontrolled. I am confirmed in my view of the meaning of "landlord" in the first subsection of section 2 by considering the provisions of the second subsection. It seems to me impossible to apply this section if "landlord" means the freeholder, where such freeholder is not the immediate landlord of the occupying or "sitting" tenant as he has been conveniently called. So long as the mesne landlord has committed no breach of the head lease entitling the freeholder to possession as against him, the only person who could grant a two years' lease to the sitting tenant is his immediate landlord, and if the term "landlord" in this subsection means the ex-landlord of the sitting tenant, I think that in the first subsection it must also mean the ex-landlord of the sitting tenant, even where he is himself a lessee of a superior landlord. In my opinion, there are no decisions of this Court that bind me to come to a different conclusion from that which I have expressed above.

In Glossop v. Ashley (37 The Times L.R., 827; [1922] 1 K.B., 1) it was held by Lord Justice Scrutton that there can be only one standard rent of a house to which the Act applies, and by the whole Court that the rent to be considered as the standard rent of the material dwelling-house is the rent at which it was let by a lessee to an occupying tenant on the 3rd August, 1914, and not the rent at which it was let by the freeholder to the leaseholder. This decision, though not directly in point, seems to me to support my view with regard to the meaning of the Acts of 1920 and 1923.

As I have already pointed out, it has always been considered, and I think rightly considered, that the Rent Restriction Acts operate in rem, and not in personam, and it follows that the res in question, the whole house, is let, not the tenancy agreement but the whole material thing—the house and every part of it.

The only case that has occasioned me some difficulty is Brooks and Others v. Liffen (44 The Times L.R., 94; [1928] 1 K.B., 441; affirmed in C.A., 44 The Times L.R., 350), but I do not think it really touches the point under consideration in these cases. The person in possession in that case at the material date was not a landlord and had never become a landlord when the question arose. He was never a person who had obtained freedom from the restrictions of the Act, and therefore his landlord could not say that he, the landlord, had also obtained such freedom. The position would have been different, in my judgment, if after obtaining possession the tenant sublet and was claiming possession from the sublessee. Then the house would have been decontrolled for all purposes. If this is regarded as an odd or anomalous result of the Rent Restriction Acts, it would certainly not be the only one, and I cannot see in it any good reason why I should reject a construction of the Act which, for the reasons I have stated, appeals to me as the right construction.

The only other part of the Act of 1923 to be considered is section 2 (3), which defines "possession" as meaning actual possession. The distinction between actual possession and the right to possess will be found to determine one of these appeals. My view of the meaning of subsection (1) of section 2 of the Act of 1923 is in accord with the opinion of Mr. Justice Talbot in Brooks and Others v. Liffen (supra) when before the Divisional Court, and the opinion of Mr. Justice MacKinnon in Ratkinsky's case (supra) in one part of his judgment. In the former case Mr. Justice Talbot said at page 444: "The object of the section is to confer certain rights on a man who is a landlord at the time when the question of his position as against a tenant arises, if he can show that he was in possession of, or took possession of, the dwelling-house at either of the times specified in the subsection."

In Ratkinsky v. Jacobs (supra, at page 550) Mr. Justice MacKinnon says: "It seems to me quite clear that where section 2, subsection (1), of the Act of 1923 speaks of 'landlord' and 'tenant,' it is referring to the two parties who will be protagonists before the Court in proceedings under section 5 of the Act of 1920." It follows that the judgment in Jenkinson v. Wright (40 The Times L.R., 858; [1924] 2 K.B., 645) was right, and that the judgment in Finey v. Gougoltz (42 The Times L.R., 501; [1926] 2 K.B., 322) was right.

I now proceed to apply the above construction of section 2 of the Act of 1923 to the five cases which we have to decide.

In Lloyd v. Cook (supra) a lessee for 99 years came into possession of the whole of a house, No. 14, Eversholt-street, Camden Town, on August 12, 1926. She subsequently let two of the rooms, which were part of three rooms that had, before she took possession, been separately let. There was no evidence that Mrs. Cook's rent under her lease was less than two-thirds of the rateable value. It was held by the Divisional Court that, though the whole house had been decontrolled, the dwelling-house comprised by the three rooms had not. In my judgment, this decision is wrong. The decontrol applies, in my view, to the whole house, and to every part of it. When there has been decontrol of the whole house, the Act is repealed with regard to it. This appeal should be allowed with costs.

In Goudge v. Broughton a freeholder by assignment obtained possession of a cottage and then let it to a tenant. It had never been previously let. The County Court Judge held that the cottage had come into the actual possession of the freeholder after the Act of 1923 was passed. The cottage had never been previously let, but had been occupied by the licensee of the previous owner. The freeholder gave notice to quit in accordance with the terms of the defendant's oral tenancy agreement. The County Court Judge held that the cottage had been decontrolled, and made an order for possession. The Divisional Court reversed this finding. In my judgment, the County Court Judge was right, and ought not to have been reversed. The plaintiff was the landlord for the purposes of the Act. If the Act of 1923 had never been passed, he would have been a landlord seeking possession of his property, and liable to be defeated by section 5 of the Act of 1920. As I have indicated, I think he is the person referred to as "landlord" in section 2, subsection (1), of the Act of 1923, and, having been in actual possession of the cottage since the passing of the Act, he was entitled to say that the cottage had been decontrolled. This appeal should be allowed with costs here and below.

In Simson v. Miatt the facts have been conveniently summarized by Lord Justice Scrutton. Until the 6th December, 1925, the plaintiff occupied, as tenant to Miller, at £60 a year. On that date he bought Miller's long lease, and was then in possession under the long lease, a lease which came within subsection (7) of section 12 of the Act of 1920, and could therefore be ignored. On the 17th April, 1926, he became the landlord of three rooms, which he let to Miatt. If I am right with regard to the meaning of "landlord" in section 2 of the Act of 1923, he was a landlord who, having been in possession of the whole house since July, 1923, would be entitled to say that the house was outside the Act, and he was therefore entitled to recover possession. I think this appeal should also be allowed.

In Barker v. Hutson the freeholder was in possession of No. 3, Oxford-road, Ealing, a previous statutory tenant having given up possession. The freeholder let the whole house to the plaintiff, who then sublet two rooms to the defendant. He gave the defendant due notice to quit. The defendant refused to quit, and claimed apportionment. The Judge, following Cohen v. Gold (supra) held that the dwelling-house consisting of the two rooms never having been previously let, they were not decontrolled, and the Act still applied to them. His judgment was affirmed. As already indicated, my view is that the whole house was decontrolled by the possession obtained by the defendant's landlord, the plaintiff, and the judgment of the Divisional Court should be reversed, with costs here and below.

Bartram v. Brown and Others (44 The Times L.R., 572) was an action for damages for illegal distress. The distress was made without the leave of the Court required by section 6 of the Act of 1920. The question was whether, on the proved facts, the Act of 1920 had ceased to apply. The County Court Judge found that the defendant had never been in actual possession of the house, or any part of it that was let to the plaintiff, therefore it could not be said that the house was decontrolled, and gave judgment for damages, agreed at £35, against the defendant. This judgment was affirmed, and I agree that this appeal should be dismissed with costs.

Lord Justice Sankey.—As in every case I have reached the same result as my Lord and Lord Justice Greer, I propose, without recapitulating the facts at length, to state as briefly as possible the reasons which have led me to my conclusions. My reasons are the same as those which have commended themselves to Lord Justice Greer. I should like to express a hope that these matters will be taken to the House of Lords in order that the supreme tribunal may give a final authoritative opinion to assist the learned Judges of County Courts, who have my sympathy in their difficult daily task of administering these difficult and embarrassing Acts.

These cases in a variety of ways involve the proper construction of the decontrolling section—viz., section 2 of the Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions Act, 1923. To refer to them for the moment very briefly, in Goudge v. Broughton the plaintiff brought his action for possession of the premises. The County Court Judge decided in his favour, but the Divisional Court reversed that decision upon the ground that the house was still controlled and the plaintiff was not entitled to possession. In Lloyd v. Cook (44 The Times L.R., 455) the plaintiff applied for apportionment of the standard rent of the dwelling-house. The County Court Judge decided in favour of the defendant upon the ground that the house had become decontrolled, but the Divisional Court reversed that decision.

In Simson v. Miatt a tenant issued a summons for apportionment of the standard rent, whereupon the plaintiff brought an action for possession. The summons for apportionment was adjourned and the County Court Judge gave judgment for the defendant upon the ground that the house was still controlled, and the Divisional Court upheld the judgment.

In Bartram v. Brown and Others (44 The Times L.R., 572) the plaintiff brought an action for an illegal distress, on the ground that the defendant was his landlord, that the premises were still controlled and that therefore the distress was illegal, as the leave of the Court had not been obtained for it. The County Court Judge decided in favour of the plaintiff tenant—viz., that the house had not become decontrolled—and the Divisional Court affirmed his judgment.

In Barker v. Hutson the plaintiff brought an action for possession of a dwelling-house. There was a cross claim for apportionment of the standard rent. The County Court Judge decided in favour of the defendant upon the ground that the premises were still controlled, and the Divisional Court upheld him.

There have been numerous decisions upon the meaning of this puzzling section, some of which are in direct conflict with others. In all these cases, however, it is important to ascertain the facts carefully before endeavouring to apply the law to them. In some of the cases the question was one of fact for the County Court Judge; in others again it may be possible to support the decision upon different grounds; in yet others the appellant may not have taken the proper point in the Court below, but as the construction of the section is one of general application, an endeavour must be made to state its real meaning, and then to consider each of the cases upon its particular facts.

The effect of the decontrolling section is to exclude certain dwelling-houses from the application of the principal Act of 1920 in certain events—in other words, to set them free from control.

The legislature might have done nothing upon the question of decontrol. It might have repealed the Act and removed the control altogether, but it appears to have taken a middle course, possibly with the object of effecting decontrol gradually, possibly with the object of protecting the sitting tenant, and possibly too with the object of decontrolling where the landlord, who for the moment may be called the occupying landlord, has got into actual possession, subject to the proviso contained in section 2 (1) that, where a tenant has sublet a part of his dwelling-house but has got into possession of that part, that part does not thereby become decontrolled, the desire being to prevent a tenant from profiteering by a sub-tenancy at a time when his own landlord is prevented by the Act from doing so.

It is to be observed that section 12, subsection 2, of the principal Act—viz., the Act of 1920—applies to a house or part of a house let as a separate dwelling. Section 12, subsection 1 (f) and (g), define the expressions "landlord" and "tenant," although it must be noticed that, as the language there used is that the expression "landlord" includes the person there referred to, it is not an exclusive but an inclusive definition. Section 12, subsection 7, which creates the greatest difficulty, makes the Act apply to certain dwelling-houses as if a certain tenancy had never existed, and section 20 of the 1923 Act says that that Act is to be construed as one with the principal Act.

It must be taken now that the Act operates in rem and not in personam. See remarks of Mr. Justice Sargant, when sitting in the Court of Appeal, in Prout v. Hunter (40 The Times L.R., 868; [1924] 2 K.B., 736, at p. 744). The decontrolling section, section 2, effects its object, broadly speaking, by saying that where after the passing of the Act—that is to say, after the 31st July, 1923—the landlord gets into possession of the whole of the dwelling-house (subsection 1, subject to the proviso), or grants to the tenant a valid lease for a certain term (subsection 2), the house becomes decontrolled. Subsection 3 defines possession as meaning actual possession.

The way, however, in which the section is drafted, coupled with the very puzzling section 12, subsection 7, of the 1920 Act, makes a logical interpretation of the Act almost impossible, and it becomes necessary to see what is the real meaning of the word "landlord" as used in the section. I am forced to the conclusion that the meaning of the word must to some extent be governed by the context in which it is used and the circumstances under consideration. In my view, the draftsman was considering the position at the time at which, in the particular case, a question arose for determination, and what the parties to an action would have to prove to establish their rights.

The word "landlord" in section 2, subsection 1, must be loosely used because, strictly speaking, there cannot be a landlord without a tenant and a tenure, and the subsection deals with a case where there is neither tenant nor landlord. See Brooks and Others v. Liffen (44 The Times L.R., 94; [1928] 1 K.B., 441; 44 The Times L.R., 350). I cannot think that the word "landlord," when used in the section, always means the freeholder, or a person who has a tenant. I agree with the view expressed by Mr. Justice MacKinnon in Ratkinsky v. Jacobs (44 The Times L.R., 548), in the last paragraph but one of his judgment, at page 550: "I have no doubt, speaking for myself, that the view expressed in Cohen v. Gold (43 The Times L.R., 376; [1927] 1 K.B., 865) that 'landlord' in section 2, subsection (1), of the Act of 1923 has the highly technical meaning of a person who has a tenant, so that a relation of tenure exists between them, is not correct. I think that 'landlord' there means 'owner,' or one of the two parties to the litigation contemplated by section 5 of the Act of 1920, and that therefore in this case the landlord was in possession or had come into possession of the whole house." The word may include, in certain circumstances, the freeholder. It may include a person who is tenant to the freeholder, for such a person may be the landlord of some sub-tenant. You must look at the relationship which exists between the two parties to the action and see whether one stands in the relation of tenant to the other. For example, supposing A lets to B, and B sublets part to C. In an action between A and B, A is the landlord. In an action between B and C, B is the landlord. I am of opinion that "landlord" may be any person who, since August 31st, 1914, has let or has been entitled to let conditionally or unconditionally a dwelling-house to which the Act applies, or any part thereof. Discussing the cases under appeal, it is convenient to deal with several of those which have already been decided, and chiefly with the case of Cohen v. Gold (supra). In my view, that case was wrongly decided and should be overruled. Mr. Justice Acton, at page 866, is reported to have said, "How can you say that the plaintiff was 'landlord' of his dwelling-house at the passing of the Act of 1923, when there was no tenancy existing?" The decision proceeds upon that ground. In my opinion, the plaintiff in that case was the landlord of the dwelling-house—he did come into actual possession of it and the premises did become decontrolled and he was entitled to succeed.

I agree with the decision of Mr. Justice Branson and Mr. Justice MacKinnon in Ratkinsky v. Jacobs (supra), and I think that case was rightly decided and on proper reasoning. I think, too, that the judgment of Mr. Justice Darling in Jenkinson v. Wright (40 The Times L.R., 858; [1924] 2 K.B., 645) is correct.

I now propose to deal in detail with each of the cases under appeal. In Goudge v. Broughton the plaintiff brought his action for possession. The learned County Court Judge found as a fact that the plaintiff did get actual possession of the premises. There was evidence upon which he could so find. The Divisional Court reversed that decision, Mr. Justice Salter saying, "We must hold, on the authority of Cohen v. Gold (supra), that the plaintiff failed in showing that he was landlord of the premises."

Being of opinion that Cohen v. Gold (supra) is wrong, I come to the conclusion that the plaintiff did get actual possession, that he was the landlord, that the premises did become decontrolled, and that therefore the decision of the Divisional Court should be reversed.

With regard to Lloyd v. Cook, the learned Judge in the County Court held that the dwelling-house, consisting of two rooms let to Lloyd, had become decontrolled by reason of having been in the actual possession of Mrs. Cook between the time when Churchman vacated the rooms and Lloyd came in. The Divisional Court reversed this decision, relying on the authority of Cohen v. Gold (supra). I think in this case also the decision of the Divisional Court must be set aside. It must be remembered with regard to this case that the appellant cannot succeed upon a point not taken before the County Court Judge.

In Simson v. Miatt the facts were of a complicated character, and it is not easy to follow exactly what took place in the County Court, but in my view the County Court Judge omitted to consider the effect of subsection 7 of section 12 of the 1920 Act. The long lease to Miller must be disregarded; the plaintiff was a landlord within the meaning of section 2 of the 1923 Act and had been in actual possession of the dwelling-house since the 31st of July, 1923. The house therefore was decontrolled, and the plaintiff was entitled to judgment. The appeal should be allowed.

In Bartram v. Brown and Others (supra) the facts again were complicated. I am of opinion that that case was rightly decided. The word "tenant" in section 2, subsection 2, of the Act of 1923 must in my view refer to the particular person who is the tenant at the time when the lease referred to in the subsection is granted, and to no other person. In this case again the question was one of fact for the County Court Judge, upon which I do not think he in any way misdirected himself. He was entitled to find and did find that Brown never came into actual possession of the whole of the dwelling-house, and therefore the premises did not become decontrolled. Mrs. Simpson was not there merely by leave and licence. There is evidence that she paid rent.

In Barker v. Hutson the plaintiff as landlord brought an action for possession. There was a cross summons for apportionment. The learned Judge, acting on the authority of Cohen v. Gold (supra), said: "The dwelling-house the subject of these proceedings, viz., the two rooms let to the defendant had never previously been separately let—that first became a separate dwelling on such letting to the defendant and no one qua landlord has since had or recovered possession of the premises. The case of Cohen v. Gold (supra) applies."

The following facts, however, were proved. The plaintiff took a tenancy of two years from December, 1926, from the freeholders of the premises who were at that time in possession of the house. Previously to that a Mrs. Eldridge had been in possession as statutory tenant and had given up possession to the landlord. The Judge's judgment is very brief, probably quite rightly, as he says that as far as he was concerned he was bound to say that the case was concluded by Cohen v. Gold (supra). The Divisional Court upheld the judgment upon the same ground, and for reasons already given the appeal must be allowed and judgment entered for the appellant.

REX (ON THE PROSECUTION OF PEGLER) v. COMMISSIONERS OF CUSTOMS AND EXCISE.*

Intoxicating Liquors—Tied house—Increase of duty—Apportionment by Commissioners of Customs and Excise—Tenancy entered into after the Act—Finance (1909-10) Act, 1910 (10 Edw. VII., c. 8), s. 46.

Held (Lord Blanesburgh dissenting), that section 46 of the Finance (1909-10) Act, 1910, which provides for the apportionment between landlords and tenants of "tied" houses of the increased licence duties imposed by that Act, does not apply to tenancies entered into after the Act came into force.

Decision of the Court of Appeal (43 The Times L.R., 772; [1928] 1 K.B., 523) affirmed.

This was an appeal from a decision of the Court of Appeal (43 The Times L.R., 772; [1928] 1 K.B., 523) affirming a decision of a Divisional Court (43 The Times L.R., 441), which discharged a rule nisi for a writ of mandamus directed to the Commissioners of Customs and Excise, commanding them to hear and determine an application by Mr. Pegler, a licensed victualler, in regard to the proportion of the increased duty which he was liable to pay under section 46 of the Finance (1909-10) Act, 1910, in respect of his licence.

By section 46 of the Finance (1909-10) Act, 1910:—

"Where the licence holder is bound by any covenant, agreement, or undertaking, or is otherwise under any direct or indirect obligation of any kind, to obtain a supply of intoxicating liquor from any person or persons, the licence holder shall be entitled, notwithstanding any agreement to the contrary, to recover as a debt due from or deduct from any sum due to any such person so much of any increase of the duty payable in respect of his licence occasioned by this Act as may be agreed upon, or in default of agreement determined by the Commissioners to be proportionate to any increased rent of the licensed premises, or increased prices of intoxicating liquor supplied, or other benefit obtained by such person by reason of any such covenant, agreement, undertaking, or obligation as aforesaid."

The question to be determined on this appeal was whether this section applied to tenancies entered into after the coming into operation of the Act.

Mr. Pegler originally became tenant of the City Arms, Bell-lane, Gloucester, from Messrs. Arnold, Perrett and Co., Limited, under a lease dated August 31, 1911, containing a covenant by the tenant to pay

"All rates, tithes, taxes, charges, assessments, duties, and outgoings whatsoever, whether Parliamentary, parochial, local, or of any other description, which are now or may at any time hereafter be assessed, charged, or imposed upon the said demised premises or the owner or occupier in respect thereof, the landlords' property tax alone excepted."

The lease also contained a covenant to purchase all liquor from the landlords.

The lease was renewed to Mr. Pegler on April 15, 1912; to Mr. Pegler and his wife (owing to his War service) on November 4, 1916; and to Mr. Pegler on March 5, 1920, that being the subsisting lease and containing the same material covenants as the original lease.

The landlords' business was acquired in 1924 by the Cheltenham Original Brewery Company, Limited, who were now the landlords.

On April 28, 1926, Mr. Pegler, by his solicitors, applied to the Commissioners to determine the proportion of the increased duty payable by him under the Finance (1909-10) Act, 1910. The Commissioners declined to do so on the ground that the section only applied to agreements in existence at the date of the passing of the Act. Mr. Pegler having obtained a rule nisi for a writ of mandamus, a Divisional Court, by a majority (Mr. Justice Avory and Mr. Justice Talbot, Mr. Justice Swift dissenting), discharged the rule. The Court of Appeal, by a majority (the Master of the Rolls and Lord Justice Sargant, Lord Justice Scrutton dissenting), affirmed the decision of the Divisional Court.

* Reported by H. B. Hemming, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Sir Henry Maddocks, K.C., and Mr. Roland Burrows appeared for Mr. Pegler; the Attorney-General (Sir Thomas Inskip, K.C.), the Solicitor-General (Sir Boyd Merriman, K.C.), and Mr. W. Bowstead for the Commissioners; and Sir Reginald Mitchell Banks, K.C., and Mr. Croom-Johnson, K.C., for the landlords.

VISCOUNT DUNEDIN.—My Lords: This is an application for a mandamus against the Commissioners of Customs and Excise at the instance of one Pegler who is the appellant before your Lordships' House, and arises in the following circumstances:—

Pegler is the tenant of a public-house, his landlords being the Cheltenham Original Brewery Company, who are associated with the Commissioners of Customs and Excise as respondents. His lease is a yearly lease and the date of the lease in question is March 5, 1920, and he is still holding under yearly prolongations thereof. His first connexion with the premises was under a lease entered into on August 31 and running from September 29, 1911, for a year. Since then he has had various leases, in some of which his wife was associated with him. The covenants in the earlier leases were the same as those which I will now mention in the present lease. The covenants on which the present question arises are two in number. The first is:—

"And also that the tenant will at his own expense apply for and use his best endeavours to obtain and maintain the necessary licences or renewal of licences for opening and keeping open the said premises during the said tenancy as a tavern or public-house or beer-house duly licensed for the sale and consumption therein of ale, beer, wine, and spirits by retail or such of them as his licences entitle him to sell and will pay the excise duties for the said licences."

The second is:—

"And also that the tenant will deal exclusively and directly with the landlords or their successors in business or nominees for any wines, spirits, cordials, liqueurs, ales, beers, porter, stout, and cider (whether in cask or bottle), cigars, cigarettes, and mineral or aerated waters, which he may require for sale under the licence or licences attached to or held in respect of the said demised premises or under any occasional licence granted to him for sale elsewhere than upon the demised premises, the purpose and intent being that draught ales, stout, and aerated waters sold by the tenant shall be such as are brewed or manufactured by the landlords and that the wines and spirits, cordials, liqueurs, and other goods shall be of such description and quality as is usually supplied by the landlords to their tied tenants and that in all cases the landlords shall be at liberty if they think fit to select the same."

Pegler held a justices' licence and duly applied for and got an excise licence for the premises which he occupied under the lease of 1920. Up to 1926, he had paid the entire licence duty without claiming any repayment from the landlords although he seems to have mooted the question. But in 1926 he started the present proceeding. What that proceeding exactly is will now be explained.

Under the law as it stood up to 1910 certain duties were leviable. They were calculated on a sliding scale depending on the value of the licensed premises. Under the law as it then stood the duty on the premises in question if occupied as a public-house would have been £25, but the Finance (1909-10) Act, 1910, imposed a new scale of duties and became the ruling Act for calculating the duty. Under this Act the duty for 1925-1926 was £35. The 46th section of the Act of 1910 is as follows:—

"Where the licence holder is bound by any covenant, agreement, or undertaking, or is otherwise under any direct or indirect obligation of any kind, to obtain a supply of intoxicating liquor from any person or persons, the licence holder shall be entitled, notwithstanding any agreement to the contrary, to recover as a debt due from or deduct from any sum due to any such person so much of any increase of the duty payable in respect of his licence occasioned by this Act as may be agreed upon, or in default of agreement determined by the Commissioners to be proportionate to any increased rent of the licensed premises, or increased prices of intoxicating liquor supplied, or other benefit obtained by such person by reason of any such covenant, agreement, undertaking, or obligation as aforesaid."

Pegler, conceiving that he had a right under this section, applied to the Commissioners to apportion the £10 which he averred was the increase of duty on his licence occasioned by the Act of 1910. The Commissioners replied that the section only applied to agreements extant at the passing of the Act of 1910 and did not apply to an agreement contained in a lease of date 1925-26. Pegler then asked for a mandamus against the Commissioners. The case depended before a Divisional Court consisting of Mr. Justice Swift, Mr. Justice Talbot, and Mr. Justice Avory. These two latter held that the Commissioners were right and dismissed the application. Mr. Justice Swift dissented. Appeal was taken to the Court of Appeal when the Master of the Rolls and Lord Justice Sargant agreed with the majority of the Divisional Court, Lord Justice Scrutton dissenting. Appeal has now been taken to your Lordships' House.

There is thus disclosed a decided divergence of judicial opinion. Nor is the matter made easier for those who have to say which ought to prevail to find as one does that, if carefully analysed, neither do the opinions of the majority nor of the minority go on precisely the same grounds as between themselves. And before your Lordships the learned Attorney-General produced at least one argument which I do not think had seen the light of day in the Courts below. This being so I have come to the conclusion in the view I take of the case that instead of proceeding to analyse all that has been said in the Courts below, I had better go straight to the words which go to the root of the matter and decide the case as I think in favour of the respondents. Before, however, I do so, I should just like to say that this case is not ruled by authority. To do them justice none of the learned Judges who were of the opposing view held that it was so, but Lord Justice Scrutton has derived a little comfort from the fact that in the case of Watney, Coombe, Reid, and Co., Limited v. Berners (31 The Times L.R., 449; [1915] A.C., 885, at pp. 889, 890). Lord Haldane said that "Under section 46 of the Act of 1910, Saile, being bound by the tie to the appellants as to supply of liquor, could recover from them so much of the increase of his licence duty as was proportionate to the increased rent of the licensed premises, or the increased prices of intoxicating liquor supplied, or any other benefit obtained by them from the tie." The lease of Saile was of date January 1911; the dictum would, therefore, cover the point now involved, but the case had to do not with the Act of 1910 at all but with the effect of section 2 of the Act of 1912. Not only, therefore, is the dictum obiter, but there is no indication that the point to be taken as to section 46, as to whether it applied to the agreements after its date, was in the learned Lord's view at all. The whole sentence is only an introduction to what follows as to section 2 of the Act of 1912. While, therefore, I do not wish to rob Lord Justice Scrutton of such comfort as he finds, I cannot say that I have been for a moment hampered by anything said in that case.

My view on the words of the section is of the shortest. What is it that the tied tenant is entitled to recover or deduct as the case may be? It is "so much of any increase of the duty payable in respect of his licence occasioned by this Act." (The italics are mine.) There is here a comparison between something paid before and something payable now. In the case of a person holding under an agreement current at the time of the Act the contrast is obvious. So much was payable in respect of his licence before the Act, so much more is payable now because of the Act. But in the case of a man who only comes in after the Act—it may be years after as in the case we are now dealing with, 1925-26—there is no increase payable in respect of the Act. There is no increase at all because he never had a licence that paid a less duty than the duty settled by the ruling Act of 1910.

There is much controversy of opposing views in the Courts below as to the word "is" in the opening words of the section "is bound by any covenant, agreement or undertaking, &c." And the minority argue that the view of the majority is only tenable if the words "at the time of the passing of the Act" are read into the section. My view escapes any such necessity. It is true that the agreement must be an agreement extant at the passing of the Act, but that is not because words are read in, but because the words as to the "increase of the duty payable in respect of his licence" do not fit any agreement except an agreement extant at the passing of the Act.

Section 2 of the Finance Act of 1912 was prayed in aid by both sides. It runs as follows:—

"Where the licensed premises are held under a lease or agreement for lease made before the passing of the Finance (1909-10) Act, 1910, which does not contain or import any covenant, agreement, or undertaking on the part of the lessee under such lease or agreement for lease to obtain a supply of intoxicating liquor from the grantor of the lease or agreement for lease, the lessee under such lease or agreement for lease shall be entitled, notwithstanding any agreement to the contrary, to recover as a debt due from, or deduct from any sum due to, the grantor of such lease or agreement for lease so much of any increase of the duty payable in respect of the licence under the provisions of the Finance (1909-10) Act, 1910, as may be agreed upon as proportionate to any increased rent or premium payable in respect of the premises being let as licensed premises, and, in default of agreement, the amount proportionate to such increased rent or premium shall be determined in manner directed by rules of court by a county court in England or Ireland, and by a sheriff court in Scotland. . . ."

Those arguing for the appellant say that this shows that, when the Legislature, dealing with such a subject, wishes the enactment not to apply to agreements after the date of the Act, it says so in plain terms. Those arguing for the respondents say that, on their construction of section 46, it makes a consistent and equal provision applying to both tied and untied houses; while on the other construction in the future tied and untied houses will be in a different position. Now it is often argued when dealing with different sections of the same Act that, if so and so had been meant, the draftsman would have expressed himself in one section as he had in another. But a Parliamentary draftsman is not a being of immaterial conception, he is a mere mortal that varies from year to year, and to argue that because the draftsman of 1912 said so and so, the draftsman of 1910 would have said so and so, is, I think, to put too great a strain on the argument. The argument on the other side has a certain attraction, but on the whole I think the borrowed light of section 2 of the Act of 1912 is not bright enough to illuminate section 46 of the Act of 1910. I would only point out one little matter which I think escaped attention. The words in the Act of 1912 are the licence and not his licence. To prevent argument it was well indeed to put in the opening words.

My Lords, in the judgments in this case, and still more in those of Watney's case (supra), there were stern warnings to those who in order to read in words into a statute which are not there or to divert words used from their ordinary and natural meaning permitted themselves to speculate as to what the aim and attainment of the Act were likely to be. Your Lordships will have noticed that I have based my opinion on the words of the statute and on them alone, but with all deference to those opinions, with which indeed I cordially agree, I think it is quite legitimate when it comes to a question of construction without addition or diversion of words to see what the aim of the statute would turn out according to the one interpretation or the other.

Now in the view I have taken of the words the aim of the statute is simplicity itself. It finds a state of affairs where in tied houses the whole burden of the licence has been taken by the tenant or mortgagor as the case may be. It then suddenly increases the duty and it thinks it not unfair that the new and unforeseen additions should be borne partly by both parties. "In spite of any agreement to the contrary" is necessary to get over an explicit clause such as we have here putting the whole burden on the licensee. That situation never occurs when agreements extant at the date of the statute are spent. Now take the other view. The other view is based on the idea that the brewer, who is landlord or mortgagee, has the whip hand of the licence holder, and that this clause is a charter for him. How futile this is. In the present case, and in a few more like it, he would indeed get a temporary relief; but what is the situation when a new lease has to be arranged (and most of the leases are yearly leases), or when a new arrangement of the mortgage has to be fixed up, as a mortgage would ordinarily include a personal covenant to pay?

It was argued that all that the brewer had to do was to arrange for an illusory apportionment, and to that the learned Attorney-General added the new argument that that was actually done by the licensee having signed a lease in which he said he would pay all the licence duties. My Lords, I will assume, and the assumption costs me no pain, that the new argument of the learned Attorney-General is unsound, and I will assume that an arrangement for an illusory proportion would not stand if challenged. What remains? All that the brewer, who ex hypothesi has the whip hand of the situation, needs to do is to say: "Arrange what proportion of the duty you like that I have to pay. You will always have that deduction, but then I will secure my own position either by enhancing the rent or stiffening the terms of the mortgage."

The words of the very learned Judge, Baron Parke, in In re Knight (1 Ex., 802) were quoted by the Judges in the majority not so much as an authority that ruled this case, but rather as an illustration of Parliament doing the same sort of thing, and as a comment on the obvious justice of their view being adopted. It may interest counsel to know that there is another analogous case on the construction of a contract. It is a case which they could not possibly be expected to know or to find. I refer to the case of Scott v. Edmond decided in 1850 (12 D., 1077). In that case a superior in a charter of date 1789 bound himself to relieve his vassal from all public burdens and parochial burdens whatever imposed or to be imposed on the said lands except poors' money. Public burdens greatly increased in 1850. It was held unanimously by a Bench of 13 Judges that the obligation imported relief only from burdens imposed or to be imposed on the lands in question by virtue of the laws then existing, and not by virtue of subsequent laws. That case was upheld and applied by this House in 1878 in the case of Dunbar's Trustees v. British Fisheries Society (3 App. Cas., 1298).

On the whole matter my opinion coincides with that of Lord Justice Sargant and I move that the appeal be dismissed with costs.

LORD SHAW OF DUNFERMLINE.—My Lords : This is a case upon which I have had serious doubt. But ultimately I have found myself in agreement with the majority of your Lordships in the construction of section 46 of the Finance (1909-10) Act, 1910. The section was in my view for the purpose of relieving tenants who found themselves by existing contracts under a burden which was not contemplated when they negotiated the terms of their tenancy. The language of the section shows very plainly the endeavour and the intention to prevent contracting out by the landlord-brewer from this liability in relief. This, however, is at once rendered really nugatory by the proviso that although contracting out of the whole provision of the section be forbidden, yet the parties may by agreement substantially destroy the prohibition by an arrangement which, while not formally getting rid of it entirely, would yet enable them to be rid of such a proportion of it as would only leave a fragmentary liability upon the brewer. Contracting out is thus shut out by the front door of prohibition, but immediately readmitted by the back door of the proviso.

What then is a Law Court to do ? It can no more delete the proviso than it can the prohibition. Some reconciliation must be found.

I therefore feel more inclined to view the provision of the section as a transitory provision covering a comparison between the taxation on the house prior to and that operative in the year of enactment. If there were, or be, any more extended policy meant to be effected, other language must be employed to express this meaning. But such matters are not for us but for the Legislature.

I agree fully with the judgment just pronounced by my noble and learned friend Lord Dunedin. But I refrain from expressing concurrence in regard to the Scottish case of Scott v. Edmond (12 D., 1077) cited by the learned Viscount. If the soundness of that case came directly in question it would have to be investigated on its merits ; in this case I think it unnecessary to express an opinion one way or another upon it.

LORD PHILLIMORE.—My Lords: In the month of April, 1910, there was an occupant of the City Arms in the City of Gloucester who held the usual full licence for the sale of spirituous and other liquors and had paid for it when he took up its licence some time in the year previous (1909) the duty then payable by the holder of a licence for a public-house of the quality of the City Arms, viz. £25. We may assume that he was a tenant from year to year and that he was what is called "tied," that is to say, bound by the covenants of his lease to take his liquors from his landlord on certain terms as to qualities and prices.

In April, 1910, the Finance (1909-10) Act, 1910, was passed, and by section 43 of that Act certain duties being heavier than the previous rate of duties were charged retrospectively as well as prospectively "on any licences which shall have been granted after the 1st day of July, 1909, or may hereafter be granted," with a rebate in the case of licences granted before September 30.

In the case of "tied" houses the brewer is a co-adventurer with the licensee, both standing to profit by the sale of drinks, and as there was to be an additional tax in respect of this profit, a tax which could not be escaped because the licence had already been taken out and which had not been foreseen when the landlord and tenant had entered into mutual relations by the lease, the Legislature proceeded to provide that the licensee, who had in the first instance to bear the burden, should have certain rights to claim a proportion of it from the landlord, and accordingly special provision was made for this by section 46.

We do not know what happened, but it may be presumed that the then licensee availed himself of this provision. The increase of duty in the case of the City Arms was at the moment from £25 to £32 10s. In the course of the year 1910 the tenancy and the licence were renewed for another year, and the licensee, whether he was the same person as in the previous year we do not know, but, whoever he was, he knew when he took up his licence that he would have to pay £32 10s. and must have paid that sum. What were the relations with regard to this increase between him and his landlord we do not know, nor is it material. But in the course of the following year, 1911, the appellant Pegler became tenant and licensee. Under the terms of his lease he became tied to his landlords and he covenanted in the usual way to keep the premises as a licensed house, to pay and discharge all taxes and duties and to endeavour to obtain and maintain the necessary licences or renewal of licences, and he paid, as he knew he would have to pay, the sum of £32 10s. for his annual licence. He remained licensee from that date till 1926, his lease and licence being annually renewed, and may, for all your Lordships know, still be the tenant and licensee. This statement is subject to a qualification which is not material but should be stated for the purpose of accuracy, that during the time when he was serving in the War his wife was named as joint tenant with him and was holder of the licence. During the time when he was so tenant the duty was varied, partly because of the change in the assessed value of the premises, and partly by the operation of amending Finance Acts, the highest being the sum of £35, and the lowest £7 10s.

In 1926 he took up the position that he was entitled to the benefit of section 46 and that the difference between £25 and the excess figure, when there was an excess, ought to be borne as to some proportion of it by his landlords, and as the landlords refused to allow any deduction from his rent in respect of increased licence duty he made application to the Commissioners of Customs and Excise to determine a proportionate sum under the provisions of section 46 of the Act of 1910 which has been already cited. The Commissioners replied that in their view section 46 did not apply to cases in which an agreement had been entered into after the passing of the Act. Thereupon the appellant applied for a writ of mandamus directing the Commissioners to determine the proportion of increased duty payable in respect of his licence. He obtained a rule nisi which after argument was discharged, the opinion of the majority of the Judges in the King's Bench Division being adverse to him. He appealed to the Court of Appeal, where again there was a majority of two to one against him, and he is now before your Lordships' House.

My Lords, in my opinion the judgment appealed from is right and should stand. The Act of 1910 was, as its very title shows, an unusual Act. It imposed retrospective duties upon land values and it retrospectively increased duties upon property passing by death. It made retrospective increases of income-tax and supertax, and as already stated licences for public-houses ; and where as in the case of licences there would be one person to pay, and more than one who ought to share in bearing the increased tax, it was proper to provide a procedure by which the actual taxpayer could be relieved of a portion of his burden, and therefore it was enacted that notwithstanding any agreement to the contrary, that is, notwithstanding the usual agreement by which the licensee covenants to pay the licence duty, this unexpected increase should be shared. This in my judgment is the sole effect of this section, whether it be a case of landlord and tenant or of mortgagee and mortgagor. The latter relation having been referred to in the course of the argument, I would say that the same principle and the same provision apply.

A tenant comes and makes his bargain with a landlord. Part of that bargain is, that he who takes out the licence shall bear the duty. In ordinary cases it is known what the duty is. He has to pay it down when he takes up his licence, and the rent, or in the case of a mortgage the provision as to interest, is calculated accordingly. If the view of the appellant were to prevail, he might perchance snatch a year's proportion of duty from an unsuspecting landlord ; but the next year his rent would be increased in proportion. Possibly even if the law were as the appellant contends, provision might be made quia timet, as it were, in every lease by which the tenant would agree that he would not claim a proportion, or that his proportion should be some minute part, say one per cent. of the increase of duty.

No man is bound to take a lease of a public-house unless he likes, and no landlord of a public-house is bound to take a tenant unless he likes.

As far as I can gather, the reason which deterred Mr. Justice Swift and Lord Justice Scrutton from coming to what I must, with all respect, characterize as the commonsense and business conclusion of this matter, was that they felt it a duty to give a literal construction to the words of section 46, to shut their eyes to the general tenor of the statute, and to apply themselves to the words of the section only ; and in so doing they came to the conclusion that the contention of the Commissioners and of the landlords required the insertion of words which were not to be found in the Act, and which therefore ought not to be inserted.

My Lords, I think that one ought to look at the whole Act, and I am rather inclined to quote against the dissentient Judges the maxim qui hæret in litera hæret in cortice. But in truth I can take them upon their own ground, and I find in the section itself quite sufficient indication that it was only intended to provide for the case of holders of annual licences who had already paid for their licence, and whose term was still running.

The licence-holder, so the section says, may recover or deduct from any sum that he has to pay "so much of any increase of the duty payable in respect of his licence occasioned by this Act as . . . ." What is "his licence" ? It is not the licence of the City Arms. Such places, it is true, are called "licensed premises." But the landlord cannot have the premises licensed, nor can he claim as a right to put in whom he pleases, and thereby confer a licence on that man. The licence-holder is some person approved by the justices, though no doubt he is not licensed in the air but licensed to sell in the particular place which for that reason is called "licensed premises."

For a man in the possession of a licence in April, 1910, which had been already current perhaps for more than half a year there was an increase of duty payable in respect of his licence. But for a licensee after the date of the passing of the Act of 1910 there was no increase of duty in respect of his licence. It was no concern of the appellant Pegler what somebody had paid for a licence two years before. Indeed it might be said that it was only by accident or by inference that he knew or could tell what that predecessor had paid. There was no statutory method of discovery.

It was suggested in the course of the argument for the appellant that if a licensee, who held his licence in April, 1910, and was therefore entitled to the benefit of section 46 for that year, continued to be the licensee in following years he would continue to receive the benefit of a proportion of the duty ; and upon this suggestion an argument was based to the effect that the words "his licence" in the section must mean more than the current licence for the one year.

My Lords, if that case were to come before us, I should require to examine closely into the position of a licensee under the general licensing law. It might possibly be that the right of a man of good character residing in the approved house to a renewal of his annual licence is so strong that he ought to be treated as a continuous licensee, so that, if the landlord did not intend to contribute towards the duty in future, he would have to make some special bargain to protect himself. But prima facie I should be disposed to hold that "his licence" meant the actual existing authoritative document which enabled that man to carry on that public-house for that year, and that the words would have no application to a future document.

My Lords, other arguments of weight deduced from the language of the section were offered on behalf of the respondents ; but I think that I have said enough. In my opinion the appeal should be dismissed.

LORD CARSON (read by VISCOUNT DUNEDIN).—My Lords: In the present case we are not dealing with the case of a licensee who before or at the time of the passing of the Finance (1909-10) Act, 1910, had held a licence for the supply of alcoholic liquor at the City Arms Inn or of an assignee of such premises as licensed premises. In my opinion in such cases different questions might have to be considered having regard to the nature of a licence as property under the existing laws. It is admitted that before the year 1911 the appellant had not held any licence and that his title originally commenced under a demise of premises for one year from the 29th September, 1911, and so on from year to year subject to determination by notice as therein provided. It is evident, therefore, that the appellant was in an entirely different position from licensees of tied houses who were in possession at the time of the passing of the said Act and who but for the relief granted by section 46 of the Act would have been liable to pay the whole of the extra duty imposed by the Act of 1910 in accordance with the covenants contained in the demise. There was in such cases an ample subject-matter to which the section could be applied to arrange the proportion of liability for new duties in circumstances which could not have been contemplated when the contract was entered into between the parties. The difficulty however is created by the opening words of section 46 which enacts that "where the licence holder is bound by any covenant, agreement, or undertaking, or is otherwise under any direct or indirect obligation of any kind, to obtain a supply of intoxicating liquor from any person or persons the licence holder shall be entitled, &c." Now it cannot be denied that the appellant comes within the words quoted, and I agree with a great deal that has been said by Lord Justice Scrutton as to the necessity of construing the words as passed by Parliament without guessing or trying to infer that something different was intended. But when I come to examine the position of a licence holder created after the passing of the Act and bound by covenants in a demise created after the Act the real difficulty arises from the words in the section defining the relief granted, for what I have to arrive at is "so much of any increase of the duty payable in respect of his licence occasioned by this Act as may be agreed upon, or in default of agreement determined by the Commissioners to be proportionate to any increased rent of the licensed premises, or increased prices of intoxicating liquor supplied, or other benefit obtained by such person by reason of any such covenant, agreement, undertaking, or obligation as aforesaid." Now in the first place I have to make a comparison of the increase of duty payable in respect of his licence with that previously paid before the passing of the Act and so far as I can see one of the elements of comparison is non-existent. I do not myself think the use of the words "his licence" instead of "the licence" would make any difference in such a case as we have to determine. But then, in the absence of agreement the Commissioners have to proceed to examine into increased rents and prices and other benefits coming out of the covenants or agreements. In my view such an inquiry is entirely inappropriate if not impracticable in regard to a demise of licensed premises made after the Act. The contracting parties are well aware not only of the increased duties imposed by the Act of 1909-10, but the other elements for consideration to which I refer must be materially affected and duly weighed having regard to the agreement of the tenant to pay such duties. I do not know, if such an inquiry as is asked for by the appellant was to take place, how far the Commissioners would be entitled to hear evidence from the landlords or the tenant respectively as to the various elements which were considered or entertained in fixing the rent or the prices of intoxicating liquor supplied or other benefits as mentioned in the section and how far such considerations would modify or annul the right of relief claimed by the appellant.

I am of opinion, therefore, that although the opening words of the section may be wide enough to cover the present case there is sufficient in the subsequent part of the section and in the working out of the relief under the terms of the section to indicate that the section has no application to tenancies created after the Act came into force. I agree with the noble and learned Viscount on the Woolsack that this appeal should be dismissed with costs.

LORD BLANESBURGH.—My Lords : The true place and purpose of section 46 in the scheme of Part II of the Finance (1909-10) Act, 1910, is the fundamental issue on this appeal. Is the section one of unappreciable or transitory significance confined to ties or to licence holders in being at the passing or commencement of the Act, and as has now been suggested possibly affecting them only till the end of the licensing year then current ? Or is the section one of fundamental significance, operative for the whole duration of the Act, to adjust compulsorily as between a licence holder and his brewer—if I may for brevity adopt this term to describe the person entitled to the benefit of the tie—the burden of an abnormal additional tax on licences imposed by the Act for the first time ? Mr. Justice Swift in the Divisional Court, and Lord Justice Scrutton in the Court of Appeal, take this latter view of the section and decide the case in the appellant's favour, and although I am very conscious of the weight of your Lordships' contrary opinion I remain constrained to say that I agree with them

The appellant certainly starts with certain initial advantages. This House in Watney, Combe, Reid, and Co., Limited v. Berners (31 The Times L.R., 449 ; [1915] A.C., 885, at p. 898) clearly, I think, acquiesced in Lord Haldane's statement there definitely made that a person in his position was under the section entitled to call upon his brewer for contribution to the increased duty. The case cannot, I know, be claimed as a binding authority to the full extent necessary now, because that question the House was not then called upon to decide ; but the interpretation of the section by their Lordships and in particular by Lord Wrenbury at page 898 in a sense entirely favourable to the appellant's present contention cannot I feel be lightly set aside.

Further, the Licensing Act, 1904—a statute for present purposes entirely in pari materia—supplies a statutory precedent for the appellant's view of the section. With that Act the well known compensation levy originated. The levy was called a charge, and in relation to it section 3 (3) provided that the deductions from rent there specified "may, notwithstanding any agreement to the contrary, be made by any licence holder who pays a charge under this section." On these words it was held in 1909 in Wooler v. North Eastern Breweries (26 The Times L.R., 129 ; [1910] 1 K.B., 247) that, as is now contended by the appellant on the present section, the words "notwithstanding any agreement to the contrary" included agreements made after as well as before the passing of the Act. Every contention against that construction which has been urged now was, and with certainly no less reason, put forward then ; but without success. In giving judgment Mr. Justice Phillimore, as he then was, used words which are very apposite on the present occasion.

"I agree," he said, "that the words of the section can be satisfied by making them apply only to contracts existing at the date of the Act, and if there were any reason aliunde for doing so I should be prepared so to apply them. That is practically what Baron Parke said in In re Knight (1 Ex., 802). But that means that I should be putting a restricted construction on the words because it was necessary to make them fit with other portions of the Act.

Prima facie the words refer to any agreement which is in existence at the time when the deduction is sought to be made, and, as I can find no other portion of the Act requiring a restricted construction, I must treat them as applying to agreements made after the passing of the Act as well as to agreements made before it."

And this judgment is the more unquestionable from the fact that it may be taken subsequently to have received legislative approval. For section 3 (3) of the Act of 1904 was repealed and without alteration re-enacted by section 21 (3) of the Licensing (Consolidation) Act, 1910.

To these two matters I must later return, and further considerations in support of the appellant's view of the section will emerge in the sequel.

The charging statute which in respect of licence duty the Act of 1910 displaced was the Inland Revenue Act, 1880. The maximum duty thereby charged in respect of any excise licence for the sale of liquor was no more than £60. Up to that limit the duty was charged with general reference to the annual value of the premises in respect of which the licence was granted, but, so far as concerned houses of value over £50, always in very much smaller proportions than that which became the fixed proportion under the Act of 1910. At an annual value of £700 the duty of £60 was reached. There it remained, a maximum, unaffected by higher values. By this 1910 Act the duty became half the annual value of the premises, whatever that value might be. The result, especially in the case of licences granted in respect of important premises, was, like other new imposts made by the same statute, to say the least, arresting. In the case of premises above £50, the new licence duties must always be in excess, in the case of premises reaching £600 they must always be as much as ten times in excess, and in the case of premises of still higher annual value they must be to an extent with no limit of amount in excess of the duties theretofore chargeable. The duty on a licence which under the Act of 1880 could never exceed £60 might, under the new Act, overtop that sum by many hundreds, even by thousands of pounds—by sums, indeed, out of all proportion and in quite another order to the displaced maximum. And so entire an entity is this increase of duty that by the Act it is treated as a thing apart from the original duty, a separate item to which separate incidents may be, as they are, attached. Under the Act the aggregate licence duty imposed is analysed as being made up (a) of the duty which would have been charged if the Act had not passed and (b) of the increase in that duty by the Act effected. That increase, it must never be forgotten, is not an increase upon some duty actually charged before the Act on a particular licence in respect of particular premises. It is an increase, not actual but hypothetical, upon the duty which upon the licence now granted in respect of any premises would under the old Act in the year of charge have been payable if the new Act had not been passed. Accordingly it is, as an "increase," as appropriate to the duty on a licence granted for the first time after the Act as to one which is merely a renewal of a licence that had long existed. The "increase" spoken of, being always hypothetical, is as definite a thing, as easily ascertainable, as completely appropriate to an entirely new licence as to any other. And in precise correspondence the duty under the old Act is the sum which "would have been payable if this Act had not passed," a hypothetical not an actual thing.

Now it is with the "increased" duty as so defined that section 46 is solely concerned. With the sum which "would have been payable if the Act had not passed" the section has nothing to do. The licence-holder had under the Act of 1880 alone been liable for this sum. The section leaves him as before finally liable for it. The contribution required from the brewer under the section is only to be one towards the increase in the duty on the licence under this Act. Here will, as I think, be found the guide to the true interpretation of section 46, if it be not indeed the key to its necessary construction.

And of no less importance is it, in construing the section, to ascertain and to bear in mind the date when this increase first became operative. As to this, the position is that, although the Act was not passed until April 29, 1910, the increased licence duties were imposed as from October 1, 1909. They were in the words of section 43 as from that date charged "on any licences which shall have been granted after July 1, 1909, or may hereafter be granted." This fact will, in the construction of section 46, be found to have what may prove to be decisive significance, for from it flows the consequence that the date of the passing of the Act is, in relation to the apportionment made by that section, no starting point for anything, so that interpretations of the section which treat the whole arrangement thereby enacted as being pivoted on a date which section 43 makes of no significance are at once discounted if they are not entirely destroyed.

Further, as it has now been mooted that section 46 finds its place in the statute mainly that by it the position as between the licence-holder and the brewer might be adjusted in respect of that long antecedent period, with the result that its operation was really spent with the expiration of the licensing year current at its passing, I have thought it right for my own satisfaction to examine the Finance Bill of 1909, as presented to this House in 1909 and then rejected, in order to see whether section 46 had any counterpart in that Bill. And it may now be conveniently stated that its sections 43-47 are in terms identical with those same sections of the present Act. In other words, if the Finance Bill of 1909 had in ordinary course been duly passed in 1909 in the form in which it left the House of Commons, it would have presented in relation to section 46 precisely the same problem that that section presents to your Lordships now.

I proceed to a closer examination of the section itself with these preliminary observations in mind. I need not set it out again at length. As to its wording, it must, I think, be agreed that at first sight, at all events, the meaning seems to be clear enough. The section is apportioning the increased duty, which I have described, between licence-holder and brewer on the footing that the licence-holder, who as between himself and the Revenue is alone liable for the duty, has on an occasion paid the whole of it. On that basis the section provides that irrespectively of any agreement to the contrary in the arrangement relating to the tie the brewer shall repay to the licence-holder that proportion of the increase in the duty mentioned in the section, which in turn is to be determined by the Commissioners in default of an agreement as to its proper rate being reached between the licence-holder and the brewer. The proportion repayable by the brewer being fixed by reference to the benefit accruing or estimated to accrue to him from the tie, it is a proportion which, properly ascertained, may vary from year to year and to a degree in no correspondence whatever with any variation in the increased duty, which depends solely on some change in the annual value of the licensed premises. Accordingly the section seems to contemplate the ascertainment of the proportion with each payment of increased duty, and points to the licence-holder entitled to the benefit of the section being the person who when his liability to pay any increased duty arises is under a tie to the brewer. "Where the licence-holder is bound by any covenant . . . he shall be entitled . . . to recover." These words in the present tense followed by a consequence expressed in the future are, I think, in this connexion very striking. The grammatical turn is apparently a favourite with the draftsman of this Act. See as other examples sections 6, 8 (3), 11, 21 (1), and 31 (1). In my judgment, it conveys that the licence-holder is to be one answering the description at the moment when on any occasion he pays the increased duty, just as the later words "notwithstanding any agreement to the contrary" refer to any agreement in existence at the same moment and the expression "his licence" merely means—and for this I claim the authority of Lord Sumner in Watney's case (30 The Times L.R., 577 ; [1914] 3 K.B., 288, at p. 295)—"the licence held by the party entitled to recover." In other words these introductory words supported by the rest of the section bring the whole within the principle of cases like In re Stevens (20 Ch.D., 697) and In re School Board Election for the Parish of Pulborough (10 The Times L.R., 349 ; [1894] 1 Q.B., 725) to which Lord Justice Scrutton refers in his judgment.

My Lords, that statement of the section, commenced as a description of its natural effect is, I submit, for the reasons which I have added to it, a statement also of its true result. But, as such, it has, on quite divergent grounds, failed to find acceptance in many quarters. The whole effect of the section in Mr. Justice Talbot's view is determined by its preliminary words "where the licence-holder is bound." These words, he says, are ambiguous. They may mean "'hereafter bound' or is 'bound' now, that is at the passing of this Act [the italics are mine] . . . or 'is bound now or at any future time.'" And he holds that the words in their context have their first meaning. They cannot therefore apply to a licence-holder like the appellant who was not tied at the passing of the Act. Here the learned Judge does not seem to have observed that, as above appears, the date of the passing of the Act is a date, in relation to this section, of no relevance or significance whatever. If the section had been intended to be limited, as he has held it to be, these introductory words, instead of being what they are must surely have been "where the licence-holder was at the commencement of this part of this Act bound"—a meaning that can by no process of legitimate construction be attributed to the words actually employed. The truth is that, if section 43 has due effect given it, there is in these introductory words no ambiguity at all. They cannot, as a matter of good sense, be held to mean "is bound now" ; and their prima facie meaning, "is bound when any liability for increased duty arises," remains their only sensible meaning just as the following words "notwithstanding any agreement to the contrary" naturally refer, as was pointed out in Wooler's case (supra), to any agreement which is in existence at the same moment. Mr. Justice Talbot, who was apparently in complete agreement with Wooler's case (supra) as to the meaning of these latter words, stated in terms that he could not and did not rely on them for his conclusion. On the other hand, it was apparently largely on these very words that the Master of the Rolls based the same conclusion, being himself unimpressed with any significance in the introductory words.

Differing, for reasons given, with both views and merely noting that Mr. Justice Avory was, I think, in general accord with Mr. Justice Talbot, I pass to the view of the section taken by Lord Justice Sargant, and adopted, as it seemed, on behalf of the Commissioners at your Lordships' Bar.

According to the learned Lord Justice the section is dealing only with a tie existing at the passing of the Act. With reference to such an existing tie the licence-holder may, the section assumes, have bound himself by agreement to pay all duties on his licence. That is the state of things to which the section is addressed. The agreement to the contrary is to go for nothing, but, whether there has previously been agreement or none, until the parties agree otherwise —and the section leaves them at perfect liberty so to do, if they like—the increased duty is to be apportioned between them by the Commissioners in the manner prescribed by the section. And that is all.

The first observation to be made with reference to all this is that the Lord Justice reduces the impressive words "notwithstanding any agreement to the contrary" to complete sterility. According to him the section goes on to enable the parties notwithstanding to agree to anything they like and thus to make the section, so far as they are concerned, completely inoperative.

On this view certainly the enactment is a very little thing. But can it be justified ? I think not. In reaching his conclusion the learned Lord Justice seems to me to fly in the face of the rules of grammar. Only by doing so is he able to hold that by the words "as may be agreed upon" the section reserves to the licence-holder and the brewer power to agree that its provisions shall have no application to them. But these words have grammatically no such effect. It is only as to the actual proportion of the duty payable by the brewer that the licence-holder and he are by them permitted to agree. Grammatically the question is, whether the words "to be proportionate to any increased rent" are dependent not only upon the words "determined by the Commissioners" but also upon the words "agreed upon." And the answer must be in the affirmative when it is observed that the immediate antecedent "determined" &c. is not complete in itself, but has to be referred back to and brought along with the preceding subjunctive "may be." The words are "as may be agreed upon or in default of agreement determined" : they are not "as may be agreed upon or in default of agreement may be determined," a variant which might well have on this point produced the opposite result. As the words stand, the two branches must be brought forward together : the second is not sufficiently complete to come forward of itself : with the result that the agreement of the parties like the determination of the Commissioners is confined to the fixing of the proportions.

But this conclusion need not be rested on considerations which to some minds may savour of pedantry. Carry on to this point the most instructive comparison of the two sections made by Lord Sumner in Watney's case (30 The Times L.R., 577 ; [1914] 3 K.B., at p. 295) and compare in this connexion with those of section 46 the provisions of section 2 of the Act of 1912 so much referred to at the Bar. That section, it will be recalled, provides that "the lessee . . . shall be entitled notwithstanding any agreement to the contrary to recover as a debt . . . so much of any increase of the duty payable in respect of the licence under the provisions of the Finance (1909-10) Act, 1910, as may be agreed upon as proportionate to any increased rent . . . and in default of agreement the amount proportionate . . . shall be determined . . . by a County Court." Now there, more conveniently perhaps because another authority is substituted in place of the Commissioners, the order is transposed. But can it be doubted when the two sections are placed alongside of each other that the effect of both in this matter is and is intended to be the same? The only difference, if it be a difference, is that in the later section the result by reason of the arrangement chosen is reached without calling in aid the rules of grammar.

And this construction does leave the parties free to agree a great deal. In a case submitted to them the Commissioners might quite well find that no benefit had accrued to the brewer from the tie. In such a case there would under the section be no contribution from the brewer. And that which the Commissioners might find the licence-holder may, without going to the Commissioners, agree with the brewer. The agreement would be that there was no such benefit, and it would be valid. But such an agreement must be reached in every year, and an agreement in advance, that whatever in any year the benefit of the tie to him the brewer was to make either no contribution to the increased duty or an illusory contribution, would in my judgment be a void agreement, and the section seems to me to intend that it should be.

With the greatest respect therefore to the learned Judges whose opinions I have now examined, I cannot think that the natural interpretation of the section is displaced by anything they have said.

As to the Commissioners' views, their original contention was that the section could never apply to any tie non-existing when the Act became law and created only after it passed. And this in result was the view which was apparently accepted by the four learned Judges to whom I have just referred. But when he was asked what was the effect of the section in a case where the licence-holder-owner in fee of his licensed house at the commencement of the Act mortgages to the brewer his house and licence after its passing and ties it to the brewer by one of his mortgagor covenants, the Attorney-General, on behalf of the Commissioners, while seeking, I believe all your Lordships thought unsuccessfully, to neutralize the concession in another way, was constrained ultimately to admit that such a licence-holder was within the Act.

My Lords, he could not, I think, help himself. The case supposed can only be excluded from the Act by reading into the section after the words "is bound" the words "at the passing of this Act," and I have, as I hope, already shown how impossible it is in this section to do anything of the kind.

The importance, however, of the admission in relation to the final question now to be considered will not be overlooked. It shows that in the very numerous cases which the concession covers the section is not, any more than was section 2 (2) of the Act of 1904, to be treated as inapplicable to future ties on any supposed ground that it would be futile of effect if it was.

And this brings me to the immediate question on this appeal. Even if the section covers a tie subsequent to the commencement of the Act does it extend to a licence-holder who, like the appellant, became one for the first time after the Act became operative? Is the section confined to a licence-holder who was such before the Act and so continued to the year of charge? The only grounds for saying that, extending to future ties, the section is confined to existing licence-holders is that there cannot in the case of a new licence-holder be properly any "increased" duty upon "his" licence. My Lords, the answer to this difficulty will be found, I hope, in the earlier part of this judgment. Whatever might have to be the construction in the general case I hope I have there established that an "increased" duty is in this Act as applicable to a new licence as to the renewal of an old one. And with reference to the expression "his licence" I am fortified not only by the view just expressed by my noble and learned friend Lord Carson but by the authority of Lord Sumner in the passage already taken from his judgment in Watney's case in the Court of Appeal ([1914] 3 K.B., at p. 295) where dealing with the words "in respect of his licence" he said, "that is, of the licence held by the party entitled to recover." My Lords, with that statement before me I have the greater confidence in expressing the view, already in this judgment adumbrated, that the ambit of the clause is to be gathered from its earlier provisions, and when so ascertained it is in no way subsequently restricted either by the word "increased" or by the expression "his licence."

There remains for consideration the view suggested by my noble and learned friend Lord Phillimore that the section has direct reference to the period between the 1st October, 1909, and the passing of the Act with no operation since the expiration of the licence year then current.

Now even the Commissioners have always acted on the assumption that the section still applies to ties existing at its date, and in view of the fact that the Act covers as it certainly does "new licences" under the Act of 1904—see section 47—which may continue without renewal for seven years—and that the relevant sections 43-46 appear in their present form in the Finance Bill of 1909, perhaps my noble friend may hesitate to advise your Lordships to adopt a view of the section at once so novel and so far-reaching in its consequences. In any case I cannot myself, for reasons already given, adopt it, and thus am I led to the conclusion that the appellant here is within the benefits of the section. In my view a critical examination of its terms merely serves to confirm the correctness of the conclusion reached on a general view of its provisions and is effective to reinforce the accuracy of the statement of Lord Wrenbury of its purpose and effect already referred to.

There are two criticisms of a general character to which I would now briefly refer. The first is that the view of the section I have felt constrained to take involves a legislative interference with freedom of contract not to be presumed. I doubt whether this criticism is ever really formidable at this time of day. It certainly loses force with the progress of the years. Moreover, this very interference was in analogous circumstances and by identical words introduced in the Finance Act, 1904, to which reference has so often been made. Nor is the principle noscitur a sociis far away. In a section which, on any view of it, involves a statutory interference with existing contractual rights, an interference with freedom of contract in respect of the same matter in the future is relatively a very little thing.

The second criticism is that this construction of the section is really fruitless of result because its effect, even if applicable to then existing ties for their entire duration, can always on the adjustment of a new tie be evaded by requiring as an equivalent to the brewer's statutory burden either a reduction of discounts or an increase in prices or in the rent of the house or in the interest on the loan, as the case may be.

My Lords, the brewer would, I suspect, in the great majority of cases, find this a very insecure prop to lean upon, and the action of the respondent company here, insisting, as they have done all through, upon a separate right of audience, is eloquent upon the point. It has not been to meet the financially trivial demand of a mere yearly tenant like the appellant that they have come so far as your Lordships' House. They are here for a much more vital reason, not difficult, I think, to conjecture. Tied prices and discounts are, I suspect, in very many instances well-nigh as competitive, if at a higher rate, as free prices and discounts. Neither excessive rents nor excessive interest can be obtained from good tenants or mortgagors. An increase of rent too would quickly be reflected in an increase of duty; a proportion of which, on the present hypothesis, will as such be borne by the brewer. Most important, however, of all is the consideration that an agreement purporting to fix in advance the brewer's annual contribution, a thing, prophetically, quite unascertainable, would be in constant peril of being ignored as a mere attempt at evasion of the statutory prohibition. See on this subject Lord Ludlow v. Pike (20 The Times L.R., 276; [1904] 1 K.B., 531). As I have already indicated, the reasoning on this very point of my noble friend opposite in Wooler's case (supra) applies, as I think, to this statute with even greater cogency than it did to the section there in question.

At the outset I ventured to observe that further considerations in support of the view I have taken of the section would emerge as we proceeded. I hope that these are now sufficiently apparent. They are both negative and positive. They are negative in this, that all the alternative views (if we exclude that of Lord Justice Sargant which would reduce the section to sterility and is, I submit, demonstrably a mistaken view), diverse as they are, as to both their basis and effect, have this common difficulty to overcome, that no adequate or even plausible explanation has, so far as I can recall, been given of the action thereby imputed to the Legislature in permitting the licence-holder and the brewer by agreement to adjust the incidence of the new duty in the future while prohibiting them from doing so in the present. And the considerations are positive in this, that the view of the section which I have ventured to indorse is based upon a meaning of its words natural according to the terminology of the Act and one which embodies a principle not for the first time applied by the Legislature to burdens upon licences and withal so comprehensive that by reference to it every case that can arise under the section is at once determined with consistency and completeness.

Nor is the justification for the section according to this construction far to seek. It embodies a policy which although politically it may be a subject of keen controversy is simple of statement. This is one of the new imposts made by the Act—one, in the case of valuable licensed premises, quite indefinite in amount. By the Act the impost is thrown—presumably it had to be thrown as the licence duty has always been thrown—exclusively upon the licence-holder. But the concern of section 46 is to provide that it shall not always to its full extent remain finally his burden, in, at all events, one case where the advantages of the licence are shared with another. Accordingly the section provides that where the licence-holder is tied to a brewer who takes, as a consequence of the tie, an extra benefit, which, if not so taken, would have remained with the licence-holder as an increase on the profit made or a reduction of the loss incurred in carrying on his business, the brewer who is thus through the tie benefiting from the business carried on in the house shall, agreement or no agreement to the contrary, contribute in relief of the licence-holder a proportion of the new impost measured by that benefit. It is because the increase is really a new burden that it alone is so shared. The section may be crude in conception and troublesome to work out, but if it is permissible judicially to recall assertions current in 1910 as to the share of the good things of life pertaining to the tied-house brewer, one need feel no surprise that in a Revenue Act of that day he was made the subject of Treasury attention for a period of indefinite duration.

The support lent by the Commissioners to the brewer's views in this case must be attributable to the burden of the references being greater than was contemplated and by their desire, in consequence, to reduce them in number as much as is possible. To my mind that is not a consideration to which any Court of construction may have regard. It is for the Legislature to retrace its steps if it has gone too far: it is not for the Courts to limit statutory privileges merely in order that responsibilities which Parliament has imposed may thereby be reduced.

In my judgment this appeal should be allowed and the cause remitted to the King's Bench Division with a direction to make the rule absolute.

Court of Appeal. (Scrutton, Lawrence, and Greer, L.JJ.) 1928. July 19.

CLAN LINE STEAMERS, LIMITED v. BOARD OF TRADE.*

Ship—Collision—War or marine risk—Meaning of "warlike operation."

A steamer belonging to the claimants was requisitioned by the British Government during the War on the terms of a charterparty by which the Government undertook responsibility for loss of the vessel owing to a warlike operation, while the claimants remained responsible for loss by ordinary marine risks. In May, 1918, the claimants' vessel was in a convoy and was carrying from the United States to France steel billets for making shells, but the bulk of her cargo consisted of cereals for the French civilian population. Owing to a defect in her steering gear she collided with an American vessel, which was also in the convoy and was carrying war stores exclusively and was admittedly engaged in a warlike operation. The result of the collision was that the claimants' vessel sank. There was no negligence on the part of either vessel. The Government refused to pay for the loss on the ground that it had not been caused by a warlike operation. In an arbitration it was found by the arbitrator that the claimants' vessel was not engaged in a warlike operation.

Held (Greer, L.J., dissenting), that as the question whether the claimants' vessel was engaged in a warlike operation was concluded by the finding of the arbitrator, and as the collision was caused by her sudden departure from her proper course, the American vessel being merely the instrument and not the cause of the loss, the loss was not caused by a warlike operation, and the British Government was not liable.

Decision of Wright, J. (44 The Times L.R., 567), affirmed.

This was an appeal by the shipowners from the judgment of Mr. Justice Wright in favour of the Crown (44 The Times L.R., 567), given on an appeal from an award in the form of a special case which raised again the question whether the loss of a vessel during the War was due to a warlike operation. The Clan Line Steamers, Limited, were the owners of a steamship, the Clan Matheson, which was requisitioned by the British Government during the war on the terms of the well-known charter, T.99. Under clause 19 thereof the Government, in effect, undertook responsibility for loss of the vessel owing to a warlike operation, while the shipowners remained responsible for loss by ordinary marine risks.

In May, 1918, the Clan Matheson was one of about 40 vessels sent in a convoy from the United States to France. On the night of May 22-23, 1918, the weather was fine and there was a bright moon. The Clan Matheson, owing to some defect in her steering gear which had never been explained, suddenly swung out of line and came into collision with a steamer, the Western Front, which was also in the convoy, with the result that the Clan Matheson sank.

The Clan Line claimed the value of the steamer, which was agreed at £265,000 at the time of the loss, but the Government refused to pay on the ground that the loss had not been caused by a warlike operation. The dispute was referred to arbitration, as required by the terms of charter T.99, and the arbitrator awarded that the claim succeeded, subject to a decision of the Court on a special case, because the loss was the result of a warlike operation.

Mr. Justice Wright held that the claimants' vessel, the Clan Matheson, was not engaged in a warlike operation, and, as the collision was caused by her sudden departure from her proper course, the Western Front being merely the instrument and not the cause of the loss, the loss was not caused by a warlike operation and the British Government was not liable.

The shipowners appealed.

Mr. Langton, K.C., Mr. A. T. James, K.C., and Mr. J. MacMillan appeared for the appellants; the Attorney-General (Sir T. Inskip, K.C.), Mr. Raeburn, K.C., and Mr. Russell Davies for the Crown.

Lord Justice Scrutton.—If the point at issue in this case were now coming before us for the first time, I should undoubtedly have taken time to consider, and express in a carefully written judgment, my views on the very difficult question which, in the absence of authority, is involved in it. But this is one of a series of cases raising questions with regard to the meaning of the words "a consequence of warlike operations," on which we have the guidance of six cases in the House of Lords, and, in view of the amount in dispute here, it is quite obvious that this case will also go to the House of Lords. I do not propose, therefore, to take time to put my views into more careful language. I am the more ready to take that course because, but for the guidance of the cases in the House of Lords, I should have gone very wrong, and, unfortunately, have remained under the impression that I ought to go wrong, but for the controlling influence of the decisions of the House of Lords.

The facts of this particular case are these. There was a convoy—a convoy which the arbitrator finds consisted of between 40 and 45 ships—apparently they did not take the trouble to count the precise number of them—and from what one knows of convoys in previous cases there were in the convoy probably six or seven columns of six or seven ships, and one hears that they were not all English ships. I abstain from speculating with regard to the particular nationalities of the ships which went to form the convoy, but they were not all English ships. They were running in a manner in which in peace time no sensible ship master would ever dream of running his ship—they were running without lights in columns and there were three ship's lengths between the bow of one ship and the stern of the next, and six ship's lengths between the columns. They were running to orders, zigzagging at given times, a manœuvre which required to be executed with accuracy by 40 ships in six columns, in order to avoid a most extraordinary mix-up by collision. There were no lights, it was a moonlight night, and the vessels were running in columns in that way, and a ship called the Clan Matheson was the third ship in her column, and a ship called the Western Front was the third in her column on the port hand of the Clan Matheson. In these circumstances, the steam steering gear of the Clan Matheson broke down. It was not a thing that one would detect at once. The presence of lights would probably have helped one to detect it sooner, but it was detected when the vessel ahead was observed to be getting on the starboard side of the Clan Matheson more and more. Repeated orders given by the master of the Clan Matheson to port the helm so as to get into line again did not seem to have any effect, and the mate—the officer—went over to the helm to see what the Lascar quartermaster was doing, and he found that the helm was hard-a-port, but that the ship was not paying any attention to it. The engineer was hastily summoned and he tried to do something which he thought might make the steering gear work again. It did not and the Clan Matheson altered her course 7 points to port, to the extent nearly of a right angle, and found herself in front of the Western Front which cut her down, and she sank in a couple of hours. It is quite obvious that what might have happened might have been that the sheer, instead of taking her in front of the Western Front, might have taken her into the side of the Western Front, in which case, the Western Front herself would have been cut down and lost, or it might have caused the Clan Matheson to have gone so far as to take her astern of the Western Front. It was found by the arbitrator that there was no negligence on the part of either ship—that is to say—that there was nothing that the people on the Clan Matheson could have done to avoid the sheer—and having regard to the fact that the vessels were running without lights in this form, there was nothing which the Western Front could have reasonably done to get out of the way. One must bear in mind that the Western Front had, first of all, to appreciate that the vessel abreast of her was coming out of her column, and coming towards her, and, secondly, the Western Front, when she appreciated that, had to bear in mind that, if she stopped, the boat behind her might run into her. One therefore has the agreed facts, that the steering gear of the Clan Matheson broke down, that in consequence she sheered 7 points right across into the other column, that there was no negligence on the part of the Western Front, and no negligence on the part of those on board the Clan Matheson in not being able to arrest the sheer of the vessel. Those being the facts, what are the legal relations of the parties concerned—the owners of the Clan Matheson on the one hand and the charterers, the Admiralty, on the other? According to the terms of the charter the charterers, the Admiralty, "shall not be held liable if the steamer shall be lost" by collision. So far the Admiralty are not affected. The risks of war which were taken by the Admiralty were risks excluded by the following clause: "Warranted free of capture, seizure, or detention and the consequences thereof, or of any attempt thereat, piracy excepted, and also from all consequences of hostilities or warlike operations."

It seems to me, therefore, that the question to be decided is, was the collision a consequence of warlike operations—not did it happen in the course of warlike operations, not are warlike operations one of the events which, in their totality, contributed to the collision, but was the collision a consequence of warlike operations in the sense in which these terms are understood in insurance matters?

One is apt to think of T.99 as introducing a new problem, but T.99 began in 1863 with the case of Ionides v. Universal Marine Insurance Company (14 C.B., N.S., 259), where the exception was "warranted free from all consequences of hostilities," and one has the advantage of the very careful judgments—which cannot be too often studied by people who have to argue insurance cases—of Chief Justice Erle and Mr. Justice James Shaw Willes. Chief Justice Erle, referring to the language of the policy (14 C.B., N.S., at p. 285), said: "To make the policy attach, the Court must in that case have held that the consequence of hostilities was so connected with the loss of the ship as to make the underwriters liable. The maxim Causa proxima non remota spectatur is peculiarly applicable to insurance law. The loss must be immediately connected with the supposed cause of it." Mr. Justice Shaw Willes says, at page 290: "If you cannot presume the exception of loss from a consequence of hostilities to involve all consequences, however remote, you are necessarily driven to say that the word 'consequences' is to be dealt with according to the ordinary rule, as meaning proximate consequences only." The question then seems to me to be: was this collision—which obviously resulted from the breakdown of the steering gear on the Clan Matheson—a proximate consequence of hostilities?

The difficulties that seem to me to follow from the decisions of the House of Lords are these: First of all, but for the decision in The Matiana (Green v. British India Steam Navigation Company, 36 The Times L.R., 791; [1921] 1 A.C., 99), I should have been confident—possibly wrongly confident—that sailing in convoy, under the conditions described, was a warlike operation. A number of merchant ships desire, and their Governments desire, that they shall avoid attack by the enemy, and to avoid attack by the enemy they adopt a series of precautions which they would never dream of adopting in time of peace, because they are much too dangerous. They sail in a dense convoy, some 40 ships altogether; they sail without lights at night; and they sail having orders at given times to alter their course in a particular way. I should have thought, but for the decision of the House of Lords, that these were defensive operations against enemy attack, and being defensive operations against enemy attack they were warlike operations. I do not understand that warlike operations are confined to attacking operations. Defensive operations seem to me as much warlike, appertaining to war, connected with war, as attacking operations.

I know it has been said by a learned Judge, for whose judgment I have the greatest respect, that the convoying warship is the shepherd, and the convoy are the sheep, and the shepherd may be doing something warlike but the sheep doing nothing warlike. I think that if you asked the unfortunate ships in a convoy what they were doing, and whether it was a peaceful operation, they would say that it was the very reverse—it was a very dangerous operation which they were intentionally adopting in order to avoid attack by an enemy. If it had been left to myself to decide, I should have said unhesitatingly that sailing in convoy, at night, without lights, was a warlike operation. But I have to start, in my view of the events that happened, by assuring myself that I am quite wrong, because the House of Lords, in The Matiana (supra), by three voices to two, has said that sailing in convoy is a peaceful operation. Therefore, I have to take it that such of the vessels as were merchant vessels were engaged in a peaceful operation when they sailed in convoy.

Then there comes another matter which seems to me to be peculiarly a matter for the House of Lords to solve, and not for me, and I only call attention to the differences—or what seem to me to be the differences—of opinion among certain members of their body.

The Western Front was manned by United States Naval units and was carrying war stores to a war base, and was said, therefore, to be engaged in a warlike operation. The collision happened because the Clan Matheson got in front of the Western Front, and the Western Front had not time to pull up, and the Clan Matheson could not help getting there because of the breakdown of her steering gear. If everything that happens during a warlike operation is a consequence of a warlike operation, then I can understand that Mr. Justice Wright was wrong when he—as I am disposed to do—applied the ordinary rule of causa proxima to the term "consequence of hostilities," and I think there is some justification in the House of Lords cases for saying that some of their Lordships think that everything that happens during a warlike operation is a consequence of that warlike operation. Of course, there is a very old fallacy, which is this, that post hoc is propter hoc, which was very well illustrated by a poem of Canning's in the Anti-Jacobean, where he recited all the evil things which were happening in England, including a plague of blue flies in butchers' shops, and attributed all such evils to the existence of Napoleon. Post hoc propter hoc is generally wrong. Ante hoc propter hoc, I suppose, is worse, and the question in this case seems to be whether simul hoc propter hoc is a right conclusion, and whether it is right to say, if two things happen at the same time, one must be the consequence of the other.

Lord Dunedin has used language in Attorney-General v. Ard Coasters (The Ardgantock) 37 The Times L.R., 692; [1921] 2 A.C., at p. 152), which does suggest that he is prepared to say that anything that happens during hostilities is the consequence of hostilities. He said: "I think the judgment may be put in a form which much resembles a syllogism. Patrolling for submarines is a warlike operation. The Tartar was engaged in such patrolling." Then his Lordship omits to say—because it is pretty obvious—that the third member of the syllogism established that the Tartar was engaged in a warlike operation. Then he goes on, "In the course of that operation, and while engaged in it, she ran into the Ardgantock. The collision is therefore the consequence of a warlike operation." That does seem to me to say that if anything happens during a warlike operation it is a consequence of the warlike operation. On the other hand, Lord Sumner, in a passage which has been read to us by each counsel, in the case of Attorney-General v. Adelaide Steamship Company (The Warilda) (39 The Times L.R., 333 ; [1923] A.C., 292, at p. 305), undoubtedly seems to me to take the view that it is not enough that it is "during," but you must show that it is "the consequence of." "When damage is done by two ships coming into collision, one being engaged in a warlike operation and the other on an ordinary commercial voyage, the collision is a risk falling on the marine policy, unless it is taken out of it by being proved to be caused by warlike operations, and this proof fails, when it is shown to be caused by the action of the officer in charge of the commercial operation, all the more so if his action is negligent and blameworthy ; but I think the result would be the same if his action was only an error of judgment or wrong, but excusable, in what is called the agony of the moment, so long as it is his action that causes the collision effectively and proximately, for the ship engaged in the warlike operation may play a minor part, since it takes two to make a collision. I believe the whole key to these problems is to be found by remembering that negligence is directly material in collision actions, when the question is how to attribute blame to persons, but is only evidentiary in insurance actions, where the question is whether the event has happened which entitles the assured to be indemnified." I read that passage as being a statement that it is not enough that it happens during the warlike operation, you must prove that it was caused by a warlike operation. That is the view which is stated by Mr. Justice Wright in his very careful working out of the results of this case, and it is a view which I myself would take to be the correct one. Whether I have taken the correct view about the apparent differences in the views of the House of Lords, the House of Lords must settle for themselves when this case reaches them.

I notice, however, that when the first case after the War came into this Court I said this (part of it is now, I agree, wrong after the decisions of the House of Lords) in British and Foreign Steamship Company v. The King (34 The Times L.R., 546 ; [1918] 2 K.B., 879, at p. 886) : "I understand the plaintiffs do not dispute that it is not enough for them to prove that the loss happened in the course of a military operation, or that a military operation was one of the contributory causes which together produced the loss." It is the last part of that statement, "or that a military operation was one of the contributory causes" which is wrong since The Matiana (supra) and the recent decision of this Court in Hain Steamship Company, Limited v. Board of Trade (44 The Times L.R., 624). I went on : "The military operation must be the direct or dominant cause of the loss, and no new and independent cause must operate after the military operation alleged. The question then is, Have the plaintiffs proved that the direct or dominant cause of the loss was military operations without the intervention of any new and independent effective cause ?" That appears to me subject to the qualification to be derived from the Hain Steamship Company case (supra) or The Matiana (supra) to be correct. It is the line which Mr. Justice Wright has followed in his judgment in this case, and it is the line which I am disposed to follow until the House of Lords tell me that I am again wrong in the views that I have formed.

I take a case : A vessel—a war vessel—is at anchor, and a merchant vessel which should pass quite clear of her suddenly sheers owing to her steering engine breaking down, without negligence, and runs into the vessel at anchor. In my view it is impossible to say that that loss is the consequence of a military operation, because a vessel engaged on a military operation was at anchor, without anything contributing on her part, except that she was there and the merchant ship sheered into her. I take another case—an insurance case : Suppose that in consequence of railway operations a misguided person commits suicide by jumping in front of an engine. Would that be a consequence of railway operations, or would the cause of that disaster or loss be the suicidal act of the man himself, and the presence of the train not the dominant cause of the accident ? It appears to me that it would be the action of the man himself which would be the proximate cause of that loss.

For these reasons I have come to the conclusion that Mr. Justice Wright was right and, in applying the ordinary principles of marine insurance to this case, took the correct view.

Perhaps I might add this. It is said that if you look at this as a convoy case the Western Front was engaged in a warlike operation because, as I say, she was manned by units of the United States Navy, and she was going to a war base with a cargo intended for purposes of war. The learned arbitrator has found that the Clan Matheson was not engaged on a warlike operation because her position was this : she was going to a port which was both a war base and a commercial port and was carrying a mixed cargo, of which 84 per cent. in weight was for civil purposes and 16 per cent. in weight was for war purposes. The 16 per cent. in weight included 363 tons of steel for shells, and a certain proportion of oats for the military authorities—which, it is said, may have been intended for mules and may have been intended for Highland regiments, but at any rate was intended to be used for purposes of war.

The arbitrator has found that the Clan Matheson was not carrying out a warlike operation, and it appears to me that whether there is enough warlike cargo on the ship to make her to be carrying out a warlike operation is a question of degree and fact for the arbitrator to determine. I notice that, in cases in the House of Lords, requisitioned vessels which were carrying cargoes entirely of iron ore to England were not considered as carrying out a warlike operation, although the inference would be pretty strong that that ore was being carried to England in time of war for warlike purposes.

I also notice that the late Lord Cave in Commonwealth Shipping Representative v. Peninsular and Oriental Branch Service (39 The Times L.R., 133 ; [1923] A.C., 191) (The Geelong), speaking of the cargo of the Petersham, Britain Steamship Company v. The King (36 The Times L.R., 791 ; [1921] 1 A.C., 99), says that it was intended for warlike purposes, and yet that the vessel was not engaged in a warlike operation.

I do not feel inclined to interfere with the findings of fact of the learned arbitrator, and therefore on the two points taken by the appellants I think that Mr. Justice Wright came to the correct decision when he applied the ordinary principles of marine insurance to this case and held that the proximate, dominant, and direct cause of this loss was the breakdown of the steering gear of the Clan Matheson, and her subsequent sheering into the column opposite to her. In other words, he held that the collision was not a consequence of hostilities in the sense in which that phrase is interpreted in Ionides v. Universal Marine Insurance Company (supra). The second point, that the Clan Matheson, because she carried 16 per cent. in weight of warlike stores, must have been engaged in a warlike operation is concluded by the finding of fact of the learned arbitrator.

For these reasons I think that the appeal must be dismissed with costs.

LORD JUSTICE LAWRENCE.—This appeal raises the question whether the loss of the Clan Matheson was a consequence of warlike operations on the part of the Western Front within the meaning of clause 19 of T. 99, and therefore excluded from the risks undertaken by the owners under clause 18, or whether, on the other hand, the collision was a sea risk within clause 18, and outside the exception under clause 19.

It is admitted that at the time of the collision the Western Front was engaged in a warlike operation, and that the Western Front was not guilty of any negligence which caused the collision.

As regards the Clan Matheson, the learned arbitrator has found that, at the time of the collision, she was not engaged in a warlike operation. It has been held by the House of Lords in The Matiana case, Green v. British India Steam Navigation Company (36 The Times L.R., 791 ; [1921] 1 A.C., 99), that sailing under convoy, and, in The Petersham case, Britain Steamship Company v. The King (36 The Times L.R., 791 ; [1921] 1 A.C., 99), sailing without lights, do not constitute a warlike operation. Mr. Langton indeed faintly argued that if you combined the two—that is to say, sailing in convoy and sailing without lights, they would amount to a warlike operation. In my opinion, there is nothing in that contention. The main ground, however, upon which the appellants challenged the finding of the arbitrator was that the Clan Matheson was proceeding to a war base and was carrying, as part of her cargo, some steel which was intended for war use, and that the arbitrator was, in those circumstances, bound, as a matter of law, or principle, to hold that the Clan Matheson was engaged in a warlike operation.

The facts were that the steel so carried weighed 360 odd tons and constituted 16 per cent. of the total tonnage of the cargo. The remaining 7,300 odd tons of the cargo consisted of barley and wheat which were intended for the Civil Commissariat, and not for war use. In the case of a vessel such as the Clan Matheson, carrying cargo consisting partly of ordinary merchandise and partly of war material, and proceeding to a port which was being used—though not exclusively—as a war base I think it is essentially a question of fact whether the carriage of such war material and the destination of the vessel cause that vessel to be engaged on a warlike operation or not. It seems to me that a case like this must be a case of degree, and one for the arbitrator. The finding of the learned arbitrator in this case was, I think, justified by the facts, and having come to the conclusion that the Clan Matheson was not engaged in a warlike operation I do not think that his finding is open to review because it does not, in my opinion, involve either a question of law or a question of principle. Therefore I think that that contention, on the part of the appellants, fails.

There remains, however, the more difficult question, whether the collision was a consequence of the warlike operation of the Western Front. On this question I am in agreement with the decision of Mr. Justice Wright, and with the judgment delivered by Lord Justice Scrutton, and I have very little to add.

In my opinion, what the Court has to discover in the present case is what was the real cause of the collision, and not who was the cause of the collision, nor whether it was due to the negligence of those handling the Clan Matheson or due to any defect in the machinery.

Both vessels were sailing under convoy with a number of other vessels, and they were sailing at prescribed distances at a prescribed speed. The Western Front, although a warship, within the decisions, was taking her place in the convoy just the same as the merchant vessels that were being convoyed. The station which she held was known to the Clan Matheson, just as much as were the stations of the other vessels in the convoy. At the time of the collision the Western Front was in her proper station, proceeding at her proper speed, and keeping at her proper distances. Suddenly, and without warning, the Clan Matheson sheered to port and impaled herself on the stem of the Western Front. Nothing that the Western Front could have done would have avoided the collision. The case seems to me to be analogous to that, put by Mr. Raeburn in the argument, of two ships in the same anchorage, one being a warship engaged in a warlike operation, the other being a merchantman, and the merchantman breaking loose from her anchorage owing to a defect in her cable, and drifting on to the ram of the warship, and sinking herself. It seems to me that, in such a case, it would be strange to hold that the loss of the merchantman was a consequence of the warlike operations of the warship.

The relevant fact to be decided in this case seems to me to be whether it was the action of the Clan Matheson or the action of the Western Front which brought about the collision, and not what caused the Clan Matheson to get into the position which made the collision inevitable, nor who, if anybody, was to blame for her getting into that position. In the case of the Trevanion (Hain Steamship Company, Limited v. Board of Trade, 44 The Times L.R., 624) this Court held that both ships were negligent and equally to blame, and that it was no answer to a claim made under clause 19 against the Government to say that there was also a claim that could be made against the underwriters under clause 18. Nothing of that kind has occurred. The only vessel at fault—not using that expression as applying to any negligence on the part of the owners or crew—was the Clan Matheson, her fault being that, as already stated, she suddenly left her proper position in the convoy and sheered across the bow of the Western Front.

In these circumstances, it appears to me that the collision was not in any true sense of the expression "a consequence of the warlike operation" of the Western Front, but was the direct consequence of the action of the Clan Matheson herself.

The present case to my mind differs altogether from such cases as The Ardgantock (Att.-Gen. v. Ard Coasters, 37 The Times L.R., 692 ; [1921] 2 A.C., 141) and The Richard de Larrinaga (Liverpool and London War Risks Insurance Association v. Marine Underwriters of the S.S. Richard de Larrinaga, 37 The Times L.R., 692 ; [1921] 2 A.C., 141). In each of these cases the collision was directly due to the warlike operations of the warships concerned, and I think that the result would have been the same if either, or both, of the merchantmen concerned had been disabled through a breakdown of their machinery or their steering gear. In both cases the merchant vessels had a right to be in the place in which they were when they were run down. They were sailing in the open sea and had no duty to anyone to keep on a strict course and not to sheer about as they chose, and they, by their action, did not cause the collision, which was caused purely by the warships.

To hold, in this case, that the collision was due to the warlike operation of the Western Front would, in my judgment, be affirming the proposition that every collision with a ship engaged in a warlike operation was the consequence of the warlike operation, which, in my opinion, is not a sound proposition.

The authorities for that proposition cited to us consisted mainly of a passage from the judgment of Lord Dunedin in The Ardgantock case (supra) and a passage in the speech of Lord Finlay in The Geelong case (Commonwealth Shipping Representative v. Peninsular and Oriental Branch Service, 39 The Times L.R., 133; [1923] A.C., 191), both of which my Lord has already commented upon, and I do not propose again to comment upon them.

In my opinion, neither of these learned Law Lords intended to lay down as a hard and fast general proposition that every loss occasioned while a ship was engaged in a warlike operation is a consequence of the warlike operation.

In the result I agree with Lord Justice Scrutton that this appeal should be dismissed.

Lord Justice Greer.—I regret to find myself in disagreement with Lord Justice Scrutton and Lord Justice Lawrence and Mr. Justice Wright, but I do not propose to be guilty of the polite insincerity of saying that, as I differ from them, I must be wrong. If that were my state of mind I should not be delivering a dissenting judgment.

The logic of Mr. Justice Wright's judgment is attractive, but I prefer the simpler proposition that underlies the decision of the learned arbitrator. We have in this case to consider the true interpretation, and the correct application to the facts, as found by the learned arbitrator, of two clauses in the charter-party known as T.99, and I feel it is desirable that I should read those two clauses. The first is clause 18: "The Admiralty shall not be held liable if the steamer shall be lost, wrecked, driven on shore, injured or rendered incapable of service by or in consequence of dangers of the sea or tempest, collision, fire, accident, stress of weather or any other cause arising as a sea risk." Clause 19: "The risks of war which are taken by the Admiralty are those risks which would be excluded from an ordinary English policy of marine insurance by the following, or similar, but not more extensive clause: Warranted free of . . . all consequences of hostilities or warlike operations, whether before or after declaration of war."

The main fact that we have to consider in this case is whether or not the collision with the Western Front while she was in fact performing a warlike operation and navigating in the course of performing her warlike operation right up to the moment when she made a hole in the merchant ship, was a collision that was the consequence of the warlike operation which was at the moment of the collision being performed by the warship. It seems to me that the warlike operation was going on, as I have said, right up to the time of the collision. The navigation of the war vessel at the moment when the merchant vessel was holed was part of the warlike operation which she was then carrying on, and in this connexion I would call attention to the words used by Lord Sumner in the case of Attorney-General v. Adelaide Shipping Company (The Warilda) (39 The Times L.R., 333; [1923] A.C., 292, at p. 301). "By admission the Warilda's operation was a warlike operation throughout, and as was the whole so were the parts. Steaming into the Petingaudet was one of those parts, and none the less so, whether it was due to mere misfortune, to error of judgment, or to negligent navigation." If one substitutes for the Petingaudet the Clan Matheson, the steaming into the Clan Matheson was one of the parts of the warlike operation which was being carried on by the other vessel, the Western Front. It seems to me to be difficult, under the circumstances, to say that the collision which, if there had been no warlike operation going on, would have been a sea risk under clause 18, is not taken out of that clause by the operation of the f.c. and s. clause referred to in clause 19: "Warranted free of all consequences of warlike operations."

In my judgment, the fact that the Clan Matheson by accident was unable to steer and was in a part of the ocean where she would not have been if she had been able to steer, is not relevant to the question whether the collision was a consequence of the warlike operation being carried out by the war vessel. Pursuing that operation up to the moment of the collision with the merchant vessel, and then sinking her when she was lawfully upon the seas in the situation into which she came, without any blame attaching to those responsible for her, amount, in my judgment, to a collision caused by the warlike operation of the vessel which collided with her.

I think that is a much simpler proposition to apply to cases of this sort than the proposition to be extracted from the judgment of Mr. Justice Wright. It does not follow from that that it is the true interpretation of the agreement between the parties. But in my judgment it is, and I think it has the support—the very great support—of the authority of the House of Lords in the two cases which are known as The Ardgantock and The Richard de Larrinaga (37 The Times L.R., 692; [1921] 2 A.C., 141). I cannot myself distinguish the cases in principle.

It seems to me that, if sailing without lights in these cases was not the cause of the collision which took place, then the sailing without ability to steer, in this case, was not the cause of the collision that took place, but the cause of the collision was the action of the war vessel in the water, coming in contact with the merchant vessel in the position in which she was, without any fault on her part.

I also think that the case is covered, as argued in the reply in this case, by our decision in the recent case of Hain Steamship Company, Limited v. Board of Trade (44 The Times L.R., 624), where we held that the combined negligence of the two vessels did not prevent it from being said that the collision was a consequence of the action of the war vessel, which was one of the two colliding vessels.

I also desire to call attention to the principle that is referred to in all the judgments in that case: that, where you have two causes cooperating at the same time, it follows that the result of those two causes may be properly said to be the result of either of them; and if the collision was the result of the warlike operation which was being carried on by the Western Front, it was none the less the result of that warlike operation because another cause also operated at the same time.

In my judgment, this appeal ought to be allowed, but it is satisfactory to think that, whichever way of looking at this question is right, it will probably be settled by a higher tribunal.

House of Lords.
(Viscount Dunedin, Lord Shaw of Dunfermline, Lord Phillimore, and Lord Blanesburgh.) 1928. July 25.

LORD TREDEGAR v. HARWOOD AND OTHERS.*

Landlord and Tenant—Covenant by lessee—Insurance against fire—Named office—Alternative—Other responsible office to be approved by lessor.

Held (Lord Blanesburgh dissenting), that a covenant by a lessee to insure the demised premises in the joint names of the lessee and the lessor, "in the Law Fire Office or in some other responsible insurance office to be approved by the lessor," does not confer upon the lessee an alternative to be exercised at his volition; and under this covenant the lessee cannot properly tender an office which is not approved by the lessor.

Decision of the Court of Appeal (44 The Times L.R., 17; [1928] Ch., 59) reversed.

This was an appeal from a decision of the Court of Appeal (44 The Times L.R., 17; [1928] Ch., 59), reversing a decision of Mr. Justice Tomlin.

The question raised by the appeal was as to the construction of a covenant by a lessee to insure the demised premises in the joint names of the lessee and lessor.

The appellant was the ground landlord of property in the neighbourhood of Newport and Cardiff on which some thousands of houses had been erected. The respondent Mrs. Harwood was the assignee of a building lease under which a house had been built. The lease was for 99 years, and contained a covenant by the lessee to "insure and ever afterwards during the said term keep insured the said messuage . . . in the joint names of the lessee and the lessor in the Law Fire Office or in some other responsible insurance office to be approved by the lessor. . . ."

Mrs. Harwood, when the lease was assigned to her, mortgaged the demised premises by way of sub-lease to the second respondents, the Principality Building Society, and the mortgage contained a proviso that during the subsistence of the security the premises should be insured in the Atlas Insurance Company. Accordingly, Mrs. Harwood, instead of continuing the then existing policy in the Law Fire Office, insured in the Atlas Company in the names of the appellant and of herself and the building society. That was done without the knowledge of the appellant, who refused to accept that insurance or to approve the Atlas Company, and he brought this action against the respondents for forfeiture of the lease by reason of breach of covenant. The appellant, however, stated by his counsel that he did not desire a forfeiture, but brought the action for the purpose of obtaining a decision on the true construction of the covenant. His reason for requiring insurance in the Law Fire Office was to facilitate estate management.

Mr. Justice Tomlin decided in favour of the appellant, but his decision was reversed by the Court of Appeal (the Master of the Rolls, Lord Justice Sargant, and Lord Justice Lawrence), who held that the covenant conferred on the lessee an alternative to be exercised at his volition, and that the lessor could not refuse his approval on grounds unconnected with the relationship of landlord and tenant.

Mr. W. A. Greene, K.C., Mr. Gavin Simonds, K.C., and Mr. C. R. R. Romer appeared for the appellant; and Mr. Archer, K.C., and Mr. Foa for the respondents.

VISCOUNT DUNEDIN.—My Lords, The appellant in this case, Lord Tredegar, is the ground landlord of certain premises known as "Kerswell," 27, Axminster-road, Cardiff. By lease dated July 7, 1924, the appellant demised the said premises to one Henry Beavis and his assigns for 99 years from March 25, 1924, under certain covenants and conditions. One of the covenants is as follows:—

"That the lessee shall and will immediately after the roof of the intended messuage shall have been laid on insure and ever afterwards during the said term keep insured the said messuage together with all erections and buildings for the time being erected on the piece or parcel of land hereby demised against loss or damage by fire to the full value of the said erections and buildings in the joint names of the lessee and the lessor in the Law Fire Office or in some other responsible insurance office to be approved by the lessor and shall upon his request produce to the lessor or his agents for the time being the policy for such insurance and the receipts for the annual payments and that in default of the lessee so doing it shall be lawful for the lessor to insure the said premises and erections and buildings as the lessor may think fit and that the costs and charges of effecting such insurance or keeping the same on foot shall be repaid to the lessor on demand or be recovered in like manner as the rent hereby reserved is recoverable."

The lease contains the usual proviso for re-entry for breach of covenant. By an assignment dated July 29, 1924, the respondent Mrs. Harwood became lessee of the premises for the remainder of the term from that date. Henry Beavis duly performed the above quoted covenant and insured the premises with the Law Fire Office for £800. The policy was for one year from March 25, 1924, and the renewal premium became due on March 25, 1925. On March 25, 1925, the respondent Mrs. Harwood failed to renew.

By an indenture dated July 30, 1924, the respondent Mrs. Harwood had mortgaged the said premises for the remainder of the term in her, excepting the last day thereof, to the respondents the Principality Building Society. The said mortgage contained a condition that the mortgagor should insure the premises with such offices as the society should appoint. The appellant through his agents applied to the respondent Mrs. Harwood either to renew the policy issued to Beavis or take out a fresh policy with the Law Fire Office for £800, at the same time intimating that he insisted on the policy being with the Law Fire Office, and would not approve of any other office. The reason for this intimation was this: Lord Tredegar being the ground landlord of some thousands of houses in Cardiff found it almost impossible, if they were insured in many various offices, to check the due renewals of the premiums, whereas, if they were all insured in the Law Fire Office, then by arrangement with that office they kept his agents informed of any default, so that he might apply for the due renewal of the premium.

The reply of the respondent Mrs. Harwood was that by order of the respondents, the building society, she had insured with the Atlas Company. The appellant pointed out that he had not approved of the Atlas. As the first respondent at the instigation of the other respondents persisted in her attitude, the appellant raised the present action to forfeit the lease in respect of a breach of covenant. It depended before Mr. Justice Tomlin and it was explained that there was no intention of really forfeiting the lease if the respondent would insure with the Law Fire Office for £800. Mr. Justice Tomlin made a declaration in the appellant's favour but suspended the decree if within twenty-one days the insurance was effected for £800 with the Law Fire Office. His view was that, if not the Law Fire Office, then any other office could only be accepted under the double condition, first, that it was responsible, and, second, that it was approved by the appellant. He found that the Atlas had not been approved by the appellant and that that ended the matter.

On appeal being taken the Court of Appeal reversed that judgment. They held that the clause gave an option to the respondent; that on proposing an office which was responsible—no question having been raised as to the responsibility of the Atlas—the appellant had no right to refuse his approval on any ground which did not directly affect the contract between him and the respondent.

My Lords, I am quite unable to concur with the learned Judges of the Court of Appeal. It seems to me that they introduce complication and inference into an expression where there is no room for one or the other. It was admitted by the learned counsel for the respondent that if the word "responsible" had been omitted it would have been impossible to say that any office could be properly tendered which had not been approved by the appellant. I think it is a quite impossible burden to put on the word "responsible" to change all this. The reason for the existence of the word is simplicity itself. It was necessary to put in some alternative to the Law Fire Office because this was a 99 years' lease, and, before the end of it, it might be that the Law Fire Office did business no longer. It might be liquidated or bought up. Then some other office had to be selected. No office that is not responsible is to be entertained, but, however responsible, it is to be approved by the appellant. The learned Judges relied on the case of Houlder Bros. and Co. v. Gibbs (41 The Times L.R., 487; [1925] Ch., 575). But in that case, as is pointed out by Mr. Justice Tomlin, there was the special proviso that consent to the assignment was not to be withheld in the case of a responsible person. Further, I would like to say that, although it is unnecessary to consider whether that case was well decided, I am not inclined to adhere to the pronouncement that reasonableness was only to be referred to something which touched both parties to the lease. I should read reasonableness in the general sense and if it was necessary—it is not so in the view already expressed—I would hold here that the appellant's reasons are eminently reasonable.

I move that the appeal be allowed, that the judgment of Mr. Justice Tomlin be restored with the variation that the twenty-one days therein mentioned do run from the date of this judgment instead of the date of the judgment of Mr. Justice Tomlin, and that the appellant should have his costs in this House and in the Court of Appeal.

LORD SHAW of DUNFERMLINE.—My Lords, The facts of this case are not in dispute. The respondent Mrs. Harwood by assignment became lessee of these premises—a plot of land with some buildings on it—for the remainder of the term of a 99 years' lease by the appellant in favour of one Henry Beavis.

The indenture of lease to Beavis and his executors, administrators and assigns contains a covenant for insurance and rebuilding in case of fire. The insurance was to be "in the joint names of the lessee and the lessor in the Law Fire Office or in some other responsible insurance office to be approved by the lessor." There follow the ordinary clauses about production of the policy and the annual receipts for premiums, and there was later in the indenture a proviso for re-entry in case of breach of covenant.

The main obligation upon the lessee or his assignee was to insure in the Law Fire Office or, in the alternative, in some other responsible insurance office to be approved of by the lessor.

No conditions or provisions are attached to the granting or withholding of this approval. In particular the case is in that respect completely distinguished from various cases as to assignment or sub-letting which have been cited. These contain, for example, the not unusual clause, as in Houlder Bros. and Co. v. Gibbs (41 The Times L.R., 487; [1925] Ch., 575), that the consent of the landlord was "not to be withheld unreasonably in the case of a respectable and responsible person or Corporation" being put forward as assignee, or the other not unfamiliar clause applicable also to assignment or sub-letting, as in Barrow v. Isaacs and Son (7 The Times L.R., 175; [1891] 1 Q.B., 417), to the effect that the consent of the landlord "should not be arbitrarily withheld."

In the present case no such restriction or condition upon the right of approval or disapproval by the landlord is imposed. The case is the simple one of one sound office being named, with the alternative given of another responsible office approved by the lessor. If the lessee will not insure in the Law Fire Office nor in any other responsible office which the lessor has approved, the covenant is broken. It is a condition precedent to the alternative being resorted to that the lessor's consent has been given to the other office suggested. I am of opinion in these circumstances that this condition precedent cannot be removed or held as satisfied because in the opinion of a Court of law the lessor's refusal was unreasonable. The Court's opinion upon that subject cannot be allowed to supply the want of the lessor's consent in fact.

The forms of contract, under which the reasonableness of withholding consent is made a term, are perfectly familiar, and they were not adopted in the present case; and the condition of the lessor's consent is a condition precedent in absolute terms.

The judgment of the Court of Appeal is, in my humble opinion, wrong in two particulars. It imports the implication of a new clause into the contract, that the consent of the lessor to any responsible insurance office selected by the lessee is not to be unreasonably withheld, and, secondly, having imported by implication a clause in those terms, the Court proceeds to attach to these terms and to this contract all that certain authorities hold is the further implication of such a clause—namely, that the lessor must furnish a justification for his refusal in something incidental to the individual contract itself and also to the financial standing or responsibility of the alternative insurance company. I am humbly of opinion that this process of piling implication upon implication is not a legitimate mode of construing a very simple and plain condition. It is clogged neither by the one implication nor the other.

Were it necessary to inquire, then the facts of this case would show that there were sound business reasons behind this unfettered simplicity. The lessor was the owner of many hundreds of houses erected under building leases, and the development of a considerable estate required strict attention to, among other things, the insurance of the buildings erected. The difficulty in such cases is to check the failure in renewals. With properties so numerous, and insured, it may be, in a dozen different offices, this point of management becomes very complex and, in this case, it is pointed out that the cost involved becomes considerable. By a simple working arrangement with one office, such as the Law Fire, simplicity and accuracy are promptly secured.

I put the point, my Lords, of the situation of a person in Lord Tredegar's position with contracts of insurance by numerous offices offered, the names of which are the alternatives suggested by various tenants out of the many hundreds. It does not appear to me that any duty is cast upon a lessor to enter into or obtain information upon the financial situation or standing of the offices suggested, although, if the judgment appealed from were to stand, each lessee of each house could demand of Lord Tredegar an answer justifying refusal to consent, an answer which was of the nature of reasons against the financial responsibilities of a particular office. This kind of issue is totally different from the issue which arises in sub-letting cases with a specific term against unreasonable refusal of a sub-tenant. I cannot hold that, under the present contract, the refusal to consent is clogged in the manner suggested.

On the merits I should, further, hold, if the matter were gone into, that the refusal here was perfectly reasonable and that it would be wrong to confine the reason in such case to the particular house exclusive of all considerations as to the management of the estate to which it belonged. Nor would it, in my view, be in the second place reasonable to cast upon the landlord the proponing of a suggestion of the instability of an insurance company suggested by the lessee. The lessor might know that company quite well, feel that it was a strong office but an office which, from his past dealings, he had every reason to know was litigious, dilatory, or difficult to deal with: it would yet, however, remain under the category of a responsible office.

I take, however, the absolute view of this case to the effect that the lessor's consent is a condition precedent in fact to the acceptance of an alternative insurance office, and that that consent can be refused simpliciter without entering upon reasons. I agree.

Lord Phillimore.—My Lords, I agree with the opinions given by the noble and learned Lords who have spoken. Two persons each sui juris and under no constraint enter into an agreement. Why should we not give effect to the plain words of their agreement? Why should we seek for some far-fetched meaning? Moreover, if it were a question, which it is not, whether Lord Tredegar was, in seeking to enforce the agreement, acting reasonably, I should say that he was so acting. I share the doubt expressed by Lord Dunedin as to the soundness of the judgment in Houlder Bros. and Co. v. Gibbs (41 The Times L.R., 487 ; [1925] Ch., 575). If it be a question whether a man is acting reasonably as distinguished from justly, fairly or kindly, you are to take into consideration the motives of convenience and interest which affect him, not those which affect somebody else.

In the first draft of my opinion I had stopped at this point. But as I find that there is an argument (not based upon supposed grounds of policy or fairness or the previous practice of the landlord but strictly founded upon the literal construction of the words), which still finds some favour in your Lordships' House, it would be more respectful if I give my reasons for not accepting it.

I construe the covenant thus:—

No. 1.—The tenant covenants to insure against fire.

No. 2.—He covenants to insure in the Law Fire Office unless as an alternative both parties agree to some other office. No office can be substituted for the Law Fire Office except by mutual agreement. The tenant would fulfil his covenant if he insures in the Law Fire Office even though the landlord did not wish it. The landlord on the other hand can say that he will approve of no office except the Law Fire. I regard the word "responsible" as monitory. It would be of no use for the tenant, or for the landlord, through a dislike to the Law Fire to suggest any office of doubtful repute.

The idea that the introduction of the word "responsible" affects or increases the duty of the landlord to the tenant seems to me, with all respect, fanciful. During the course of the argument I made the suggestion, to substitute for the word "responsible" the word "English." Would that enable a tenant to say that he was complying with the covenant because he was tendering an office which was not Scotch nor Irish but English and which the landlord, therefore, must approve unless he could show good reason to the contrary?

Lord Blanesburgh (read by Lord Shaw).—My Lords, The question in this case is a simple one. It is not, for that reason, easy. Mr. Justice Tomlin thought the language of the clause in debate was plain, or, at any rate, reasonably plain. His decision was for the appellant. The unanimous conclusion of the Court of Appeal on the other hand was in favour of the respondents. Lord Justice Lawrence, expressing a view clearly enough shared by his two learned colleagues, observed in the course of his judgment:

"I confess that but for the opinion expressed by the learned Judge and the arguments of counsel for [Lord Tredegar] I should have thought that the construction of the covenant did not present any real difficulty."

My Lords, I regret that that divergence of judicial opinion has not yet entirely disappeared. But while I hope that I appreciate fully the considerations which have led your Lordships who have preceded me to revert to the view of Mr. Justice Tomlin, I feel bound to say, with the utmost respect, that my own opinion remains in accord with that of the Court of Appeal.

I need hardly, I feel sure, affirm that in reaching that conclusion I in no way underrate either the reasonableness or wisdom from his own point of view of the appellant's recent resolve to have effected in one office all the insurances upon his Cardiff leases. Nor, when I regard the services, clerical and other, to be rendered to him in consideration by the Law Fire Office, do I doubt that the appellant has chosen prudently in selecting that office as the favoured medium of insurance. I should equally commend his wisdom if, as a result of the tender of even more valuable services, the appellant were, later on, to transfer his insurance favours to some other responsible office, say, for example, the Atlas. But it is not his prudence in either direction which is relevant now. The question is whether, under the insurance covenant in Mrs. Harwood's lease, Lord Tredegar can require her to insure in the Law Fire Office, to the exclusion, under all circumstances, of any other.

It must, I think, be agreed that that requirement of the appellant's is beset by at least some initial difficulty. There is a well-known common form covenant which would indubitably have established the privilege he claims. It has not been utilized. The covenant chosen as the estate covenant is an equally well-known alternative style, to some extent it must be agreed—how much is here the question—more favourable to the lessee than the other. And when it is remembered that in a building estate to be developed largely by advances made by building societies and other lenders to the lessees a covenant convenient to the lenders may be of final advantage to the ground landlord, the choice of this less stringent form of covenant may well have been deliberate. Certain it is that no such policy as that recently adopted by the estate was in view when the covenant was selected.

The arrangement with the Law Fire Office which, having been come to, has quite prudently led to the requirement now made by the appellant is a new thing. But the covenant unaltered has been in use on the estate for many years, and throughout that period the view of it still taken by the respondents has in practice been accepted and acted upon by the appellant. As appears from the correspondence very many of the houses on the estate have been built with moneys advanced by the respondent building society to lessees on the security of their leases, and the society, for reasons analogous to those now moving the appellant, has always required its mortgagor lessees—as in this case it required Mrs. Harwood—to effect their insurances with the Atlas, which, as a responsible office, has been accepted by the estate without question.

It may, of course, be suggested that this action on the part of the appellant's representatives was no more than an indulgence which the appellant was not concerned, as things stood, to withhold from his tenants. It is pertinent therefore to observe that, in circumstances not unlike the present, the covenant would certainly be unequal to the burden which the appellant now seeks to place upon it.

Suppose, as has already been suggested, that the appellant should find it to his interest to have all these insurances effected with some office other than the Law Fire. It cannot, in that case, I think, be doubted that he would nevertheless be bound to accept, as a complete performance in that behalf of the lessee's covenant, an insurance with the Law Fire, if tendered. Suppose, again, that for some reason the Law Fire disappeared or were absorbed in some other office. The appellant could not in that case require a lessee to insure in an office of his own nomination, for the privilege of nomination is not reserved to him. And if the appellant, desirous of confining insurances to one office, were to disapprove of every other office as submitted to him, however responsible or unobjectionable in every way some at all events of those submitted might be, that action on his part I cannot doubt would be held unwarranted on the well-known principle explained and applied by Chief Justice Tindal in Dallman v. King (4 Bing. N.C., 105, at p. 109) that, the gist of the covenant being that the office selected by the lessee and tendered for approval should be responsible, to withhold approval from every responsible office but one, and that for some reason entirely irrelevant to insurance protection, would go to the destruction of the thing granted which, "according to the well-known rule, would pass, discharged from the condition."

My Lords, the alternative form of covenant which would have resolved all these questions in the appellant's favour is a very simple one, and it will be found, with variations in detail, in every standard book of precedents. By its terms the lessee covenants to insure

"in such insurance office as shall be named by the lessor," or "in such office as the lessor shall appoint."

Indeed you have, in this very covenant, by apt words, power reserved to the appellant, in case of default by the lessee, to realize his will in this matter. He is thereby empowered "to insure the said premises . . . as [he] may think fit."

The aptness, for the same purpose, of the covenant exacted by the respondent building society in Mrs. Harwood's mortgage of July 30, 1924, will not be missed. Thereby Mrs. Harwood covenants to "insure and keep insured the said premises . . . in such office and for such amount as the society shall appoint."

The contrast between the present covenant and any one of these alternatives is very striking. Under it, the lessee is, as I think, in plain language given the option of fulfilling his obligation in one of two ways, either (a) by insuring in the Law Fire, or (b) in some other responsible insurance office to be approved by the lessor. The only preference enjoyed by the Law Fire Office is that it is a responsible office of which no further approval by the lessor is required. There is nothing in the covenant which either necessarily or naturally imports that the alternative is only exercisable if insurance in the Law Fire is impracticable. To introduce that qualification some such words as "failing that office" would have to be added, and they are not there. The choice of the other office rests with the lessee: the approval only is with the lessor, not the selection, and the right of the lessor is limited to considering and approving or declining to approve the responsible office so chosen. It is here that the addition of the word "responsible" to the description of the office chosen for approval is so illuminating. Unless the name of a responsible office is tendered, the lessor need not consider the proposal at all. No step towards compliance with the covenant has so far been taken. Insurance in a responsible office is the gist of the covenant, and when in exercise of his privilege of selection the name of a responsible office is tendered by the lessee then the correlative duty of approval or disapproval by the appellant immediately arises.

The action of the appellant in relation to the respondents' insurance with the Atlas was here very striking. Really, I think, he definitely refused to consider the case of any insurance office except the Law Fire. It may, however, be said that his refusal to approve the Atlas was attributable not to any objection to that office on the ground of responsibility or the reverse, but to a preference for the Law Fire or to the fact that the Atlas was not the Law Fire. Be it so. The appellant's position is not, as I see it, thereby improved. In my opinion, however unrestricted may be his legitimate grounds of objection in other directions, the action of the appellant in withholding approval on any such ground cannot, on the true meaning of the covenant, be justified. As Lord Justice Lawrence puts it in his judgment, the avowed action of the appellant

"amounts to a complete negation of the right of the lessee to fulfil his obligation under the covenant by insuring in some responsible office other than the Law Fire Office. The lessor is in effect treating the covenant as if it were a covenant to insure in the Law Fire Office only and as if the alternative method of complying with it had not been inserted."

In other words the appellant by declaring that in no circumstances will any office other than the Law Fire be entertained by him has brought it about that the respondents' insurance in the Atlas, an admittedly responsible office, is in the result a compliance with the covenant inasmuch as the covenant must owing to the appellant's attitude in relation to that insurance be regarded as "discharged of the condition."

In my judgment it is only under some other form of covenant and not under this form that the appellant is entitled to the right which here for the reason assigned he has claimed to exercise. On these grounds, if the decision rested with me, I would be for affirming the order of the Court of Appeal.

House of Lords.
(Lord Buckmaster, Viscount Dunedin, and Lord Phillimore.)
1928, July 25.

LOCKHART v. HARRISON.*

Defamation—Libel—Defence that statement was not defamatory—Finding of jury to that effect—Refusal of new trial.

Observations on the circumstances in which the finding of a jury that an alleged libel was not defamatory is unassailable.

This was an appeal by the plaintiff from a decision of the Court of Appeal refusing to grant a new trial of an action for libel tried before Mr. Justice Talbot and a special jury, in which the jury found in favour of the defendant (the respondent) and judgment was entered accordingly.

The appellant's case was that the verdict was against the weight of the evidence.

The appellant, who was a retired solicitor, had resided in Hexham all his life, and he and his brother, Colonel Lockhart, who was now dead, were keenly interested in promoting the welfare of the Hexham Grammar School, which was founded in the time of Queen Elizabeth.

On October 4, 1924, there was published in the Hexham Courant an article by "Cardigan" headed "Gossip and Comment—The Grammar School." After referring to the history and development of the school, which had recently been rebuilt on a new site, and to the help given by the County Council in defraying the cost of the new buildings, the article continued as follows: "The County Education Committee has several times recently had under consideration the acquisition of a further eight acres of land on the west side of the existing school area, on which further school extensions could be made, and a much needed recreation ground laid out. . . . At their last meeting the County Education Committee, largely at the instigation of Colonel Lockhart, decided to recommend the County Council to purchase a total area of 9.85 acres at a price of £5,800. Colonel Lockhart and Mr. H. F. Lockhart [meaning the appellant] have purchased and offered to give an area of woodland between Eastgate and the land to be acquired, conditionally upon the authority purchasing the whole of the area available, and this offer was gratefully accepted. The Grammar School is a decided asset to a town of Hexham's character, and it is to be hoped that at the next meeting of the County Council the scheme will go through." On October 13, 1924, the respondent wrote to the editor of the Hexham Courant a letter referring to this article, and the letter was published in the newspaper on October 18. This letter, which was complained of as a libel, was as follows:—

"THE GRAMMAR SCHOOL.

"Sir,—Is the information with regard to the purchase of land contained in your interesting paragraph of the 4th inst. fully accurate? It is stated that Colonel and Mr. H. F. Lockhart have offered to give the dene in Eastgate to the County Council if the Council agree to take the whole of the adjoining land. If the Messrs. Lockhart have really made this offer it is a very handsome gift and they deserve the thanks of the community. But (1) the dene was bought for £900 odd by the late Mr. Riddle, who was, I believe, one of the late William Alexander's executors, to whom the adjacent property belongs; and (2) I was told while the negotiations with the County Council were proceeding that the Messrs. Lockhart, acting either as mortgagees of the property or as the owners by conveyance from Mr. Riddle, insisted that the Council must buy the dene as well as the site they had in view; and (3) the action of Messrs. Lockhart in making the Urban Council pay a high price for the small piece of the dene required for rounding off the corner at the top of Eastgate would appear to indicate that they were not disposed to make a gift to the public. My question as a ratepayer is whether I am to feel grateful to the Messrs. Lockhart, or whether I, with others, am paying for the dene by having its price included in the £5,800 stated to be the sum payable for the 9.85 acres adjoining. The site and the dene should go together, but do not let there be any misunderstanding as to the cost.

"Yours truly,
"RATEPAYER."

Colonel Lockhart died on May 15, 1925, and later on the same day the appellant issued the writ in this action.

By the statement of claim the appellant, after setting forth the letter, pleaded that by the said letter the respondent meant that the appellant and his brother's offer of a gift was a sham, and that posing as benefactors to the school and under the pretence of making a free gift the appellant and his brother were offering to sell the dene at a high price to the Council by insisting upon selling the 9.85 acres at an excessive price in order to recoup themselves the price which they had paid for the dene when they bought it.

The respondent denied that the words complained of bore the meanings alleged or any defamatory meaning, and he also put in a plea of fair comment.

At the trial the respondent admitted that the allegations of fact contained in the letter were not true and abandoned his plea of fair comment, with the result that the only issue before the jury was whether the words complained of were defamatory. The jury returned a verdict in favour of the respondent and Mr. Justice Talbot thereupon directed that judgment should be entered for the respondent.

An application for a new trial was refused by the Court of Appeal.

The Master of the Rolls said that, though he would himself have come to a different conclusion, it appeared to him impossible for the Court to say that the letter must necessarily bear such an interpretation that twelve reasonable men could not find the verdict which they did in fact find.

Lord Justice Atkin and Lord Justice Lawrence, but for the opinion of the Master of the Rolls, would have come to the conclusion that no reasonable men could possibly have put an innocent interpretation upon the letter, but in deference to the opinion of the Master of the Rolls they agreed that the appeal should be dismissed.

Mr. Norman Birkett, K.C., and Mr. N. L. Macaskie appeared for the appellant; and Mr. Jowitt, K.C., Mr. Lowenthal, K.C., and Mr. Archibald Wilson for the respondent.

LORD BUCKMASTER.—My Lords: The appellant was the plaintiff in a libel action brought against the respondent claiming damages for defamation due to the publication in a newspaper known as the Hexham Courant of an anonymous letter on October 18, 1924. The action was tried before Mr. Justice Talbot with a special jury at Newcastle-upon-Tyne and resulted in a verdict for the defendant. The appellant appealed to the Court of Appeal seeking to set aside the verdict on the ground that it was against the weight of evidence. The Court of Appeal dismissed the appeal, and from that judgment this appeal was brought. The appellant, who is 75 years of age, has resided during the whole of his life at Hexham, and from 1878 to 1909 practised there as a solicitor with his brother. Both the appellant and his brother were greatly interested in the development of Hexham Grammar School. This was an old grammar school dating from Queen Elizabeth, rebuilt in 1910 upon a new site. In November, 1923, the Education Committee of the County Council entered into negotiations for the purchase of land adjacent to the school, and during the course of such negotiations the appellant and his brother offered to give a strip of land adjoining the proposed purchase, an offer which was accepted in October, 1924. On October 4 a statement appeared in the Hexham Courant by one of its contributors discussing the extension of the school and concluding with the following statement:—

"At their last meeting the County Education Committee, largely at the instigation of Colonel Lockhart, decided to recommend the County Council to purchase a total area of 9.85 acres at a price of £5,800. Colonel Lockhart and Mr. H. F. Lockhart have purchased and offered to give an area of woodland between Eastgate and the land to be acquired, conditionally upon the authority purchasing the whole of the area available, and this offer was gratefully accepted. The Grammar School is a decided asset to a town of Hexham's character, and it is to be hoped that at the next meeting of the County Council the scheme will go through."

It was consequent upon this that the respondent wrote to the paper the alleged libel under the signature of "Ratepayer."

[His Lordship read the letter above set out.]

In his defence the defendant among other defences said that the allegations of fact in his letter were true, and that they were fair comment made in good faith. At the hearing it was proved that all the relevant statements were false, and thereupon the defendant withdrew his plea of "fair comment" and tendered no evidence, relying merely upon the defence that the statement was not defamatory, and this issue the jury determined in his favour. The appellant alleges that no twelve reasonable men acting reasonably could fairly come to this conclusion, and on that ground seeks to set the verdict aside.

In the Court of Appeal the Master of the Rolls thought that there was no ground for saying that the answer given by the verdict was one which twelve reasonable men could not reach. It appears by the judgments of Lord Justice Atkin and Lord Justice Lawrence that they did not agree with this opinion, Lord Justice Atkin saying that if left to himself he should have decided that no reasonable men could come to the conclusion to which they did come, but that the opinion of the Master of the Rolls prevented him from giving effect to that view. In that I think he was wrong; the fact that one Judge thinks a verdict is not unreasonable does not in itself render a verdict unassailable. It is a mere expression of opinion from which others might differ, for the question of reasonability is not capable of rigid definition. Were it otherwise the opinion of one Judge in a Court of Appeal in favour of a verdict so challenged would prevent the other members forming the majority of the Court from giving a contrary decision. But though I am not satisfied with the reasoning, I think the conclusion of the Court of Appeal must be accepted. A claim for defamation is essentially a matter upon which a jury's verdict must be taken; if the words are plainly defamatory without innuendo, and the jury refuse so to decide the verdict is perverse; so also if the innuendo is so clear that there really is nothing for real consideration. If the words are not defamatory, the Judge can so hold and withdraw the case from the jury—but if the matter is one upon which the question of innuendo can be properly weighed by the jury, it is for them to find whether the words bear the defamatory interpretation or not. The question, therefore, in this case is whether the innuendo is so obvious that it is impossible to believe that it could be disregarded by twelve reasonable men, and that question is a different one from merely saying what the opinion of any Judge would be upon the document. To me this letter was a mean and spiteful reflection upon men who had acted generously towards the town; the questions in the letter themselves suggest to my mind an answer in that sense, but that is not the point for our determination. It is true, as pointed out on behalf of the respondent, that the letter was no answer to anything that the appellant or his brother had said and that it was a statement of things which they might lawfully have done. I do not agree with the further contention that to say that a man has done acts which are within the law cannot be defamatory; there are many cruel actions done in exercise of indisputable legal rights, the wrongful assertion of which against any man would be plainly defamatory, but none the less these are matters which may be borne in mind by a jury in considering their verdict. No complaint here is made against the summing up and the learned Judge leaves expressly to the jury the question whether the letter was intended as an inquiry and whether it contained a reflection on the plaintiff. With the matter so left to the jury, it seems to me impossible to complain when the verdict has been given.

"Independently of all questions as to privilege, the manner of the publication, and the things relative to which the words are published, and which the person publishing knew, or ought to have known, would influence those to whom it was published in putting a meaning on the words, are all material in determining whether the writing is calculated to convey a libellous imputation. There are no words so plain that they may not be published with reference to such circumstances, and to such persons knowing these circumstances, as to convey a meaning very different from that which would be understood from the same words used under different circumstances."

It is, of course, not true to say that a jury's verdict in these circumstances can never be assailed. A plain and obvious defamation incapable of any innocent explanation, if found by the jury to be non-libellous, would certainly be set aside, but such cases occur so rarely that within the last century there are only two to which our attention has been drawn in which this power has been exercised. The one is Levi v. Milne (4 Bingham, 195) and the other is Parmiter v. Coupland (6 M. and W., 105). It is unnecessary to discuss the earlier of these cases. It is even possible that a different view might be taken of it to-day, but in the latter case, according to the report, a series of libels had been published of the then late Mayor of Winchester, imputing to him partial and corrupt conduct and ignorance of his duties, as Mayor and justice of the peace for the borough. The jury having found for the defendant, the verdict was set aside, for the words were obviously libellous and the only justification appeared to be that they were spoken of a man in a public capacity —a defence, of course, that was wholly inadequate.

It is unnecessary to examine the further cases in which similar questions have arisen, for the judgment of Lord Justice Scrutton in the case of Broome v. Agar (44 The Times L.R., 339) contains a full and, in my opinion, a most accurate statement of the true position. In that case a chauffeur brought an action against his late employer, alleging that she had slandered him by saying that he gave joy rides to women in her car, and that he was a rotter. The Judge left to the jury the question whether the words were defamatory or not, and the jury answered this question in the negative. The Court of Appeal, Lord Justice Russell dissenting, refused the plaintiff's application for a new trial, based on the ground that the verdict was unreasonable and perverse. I think that that case was properly decided, and that the principle of its decision covers the present dispute. It was possible for the jury to hold, in the present case, that the words were not defamatory, and it is no ground for setting aside their verdict that this opinion is one that I do not share.

Lord Dunedin regretted the decision of their Lordships, but he was not prepared to differ upon a question of English procedure. He regretfully concurred.

Lord Phillimore.—My Lords: When an action for libel is brought to trial the written or printed words may be so plainly and necessarily defamatory that the Judge should instruct the jury that they are calculated to bring the plaintiff into hatred or contempt, and should forthwith proceed to direct their attention to the question of damages. This is well laid down in Odgers on Libel at pages 119 and 121 of the fifth edition, though the case which he relies upon as his principal authority is not a very satisfactory one.

Where a Judge does so direct a jury, if the jury should find a verdict contrary to his direction, it may be deemed perverse, and may be set aside, and a new trial may be ordered.

But in the case now pending before your Lordships, counsel for the plaintiff did not ask the Judge to give such a direction and the Judge did not give it. I quote from his summing up: "Therefore, as I say, the only question remaining for your determination, and it is one which is eminently and entirely for you, is what meaning is to be attached to this letter of which the plaintiff complains. In other words, would an ordinary person reading that letter infer that the plaintiff had done something which was not to his credit, and would anybody who read that and believed what was there have felt of the plaintiff less esteem, respect or regard than he otherwise would?"

In my opinion he was right. The letter to the newspaper which was the vehicle of the alleged libel was ungenerous and mean, and none the better for being anonymous. Its purport was to take away from the plaintiff and his brother a meed of praise which a previous article in the same newspaper had bestowed upon them. But if carefully and critically analysed it did not assert, and might be considered not to convey, the impression that the plaintiff had claimed this praise for himself or had complacently acquiesced in its bestowal by others.

The jury, it is true, might have well said to themselves that considering the hasty way in which ephemeral productions of this kind are read and the slight and possibly inaccurate recollection that a reader would have of the previous article, the reader might be led to suppose that the plaintiff and his brother were posing as public benefactors and might be led therefore to think poorly of them; and if the jury had taken this view and had found a verdict for the plaintiff with temperate damages I should have been well content. But I could not say that the letter necessarily conveys this view.

Again, there are three statements in the letter which are not true. I do not say untruthful, but not true. And the result of these is to assert or imply that the plaintiff and his brother being Governors of Hexham Grammar School were getting full price for some land which they were conveying to the school. This is going very near the wind; and again I should have been content if the jury on account of these words had found a verdict for the plaintiff. But I cannot say that they of necessity would bring the plaintiff into hatred or contempt. A man is entitled to make the best of his property. There are people who think that business and charity, or business and public spirit, should be kept apart; and if this view commended itself to the members of the jury they were the constitutional tribunal to give expression to it.

I agree with Lord Justice Atkin in his judgment in the Court of Appeal when he sets out certain hypothetical language and proceeds as follows: "If that language had been expressly used and the jury found that it was not defamatory, I apprehend that no Court would fail to come to the conclusion that such a verdict was perverse and could not stand, with the result that the case would have to be submitted to another jury."

But I do not follow many of the observations which he and the other members of the Court made with regard to the particular language of the letter which is complained of.

Concluding as I do that the words were not of necessity defamatory, I think that the verdict must stand and that the judgment of the Court of Appeal was right and should be affirmed.

IN RE LEEDS CORPORATION AND CHADWICK.*

Insurance (Unemployment)—Relief work—Temporary worker — Work provided by local authority—Arrangement with Poor Law authority—Work in alternate weeks—Non-insurability of worker—Unemployment Insurance Act, 1920 (10 and 11 Geo. V., c. 30), s. 47 (1) (b)—Unemployment Insurance Act, 1927 (17 and 18 Geo. V., c. 30), Sched. IV.

The Court held under the Unemployment Insurance Act, 1920, that a man employed by a local authority by arrangement with the guardians of the poor, under a scheme by which he was given work each alternate week from Thursday to Wednesday, for a full period of 48 hours, at the district rate of wages, was not employed full time within the meaning of section 47 (1) (b) of the Act of 1920, as amended by the Fourth Schedule to the Unemployment Insurance Act, 1927, and was not, therefore, insurable.

This was a reference by the Minister of Labour under section 10 of the Unemployment Insurance Act, 1920.

Between January, 1928, and May 22, 1928, William Chadwick had been employed as a general labourer by the Leeds Corporation under an arrangement made between the corporation and the Leeds Board of Guardians, as follows :—

The guardians from time to time submitted lists of men who, owing to the amount of relief pay to which they were entitled after investigation of their cases by the guardians, and in view of their physical ability to perform manual work, were eligible, in the opinion of the guardians, for work of public utility. The corporation selected certain schemes, such as the making of roads, &c., on which the guardians' men, working under a corporation foreman, were solely employed on the alternate week system. The guardians paid the corporation the actual amount that would have been paid in relief, or an amount equal to the wages where these were less than the relief.

The rate of pay was the recognized district rate for the work done. The employing departments were responsible for the payment of wages.

Having nominated an employee, the guardians were not further concerned, except that they paid the corporation such sum, not exceeding the amount paid in wages, as would have been paid directly by the guardians in the form of Poor Law relief. Any deficiency as compared with the relief to which the employee was entitled was made good by the guardians. It was a feature of the arrangement that, to spread the benefit over as large a number of employees as possible, an employee was given a week's employment alternately with a week for which he was not employed, a week for that purpose beginning on Thursday morning and finishing on Wednesday night.

Another feature of the arrangement was that employment under it was to cease as soon as a person under it had acquired a title to unemployment benefit by virtue of the unemployment insurance contributions that had been paid by the corporation in respect of that employment. On the other hand, as soon as the person concerned ceased to be entitled to draw unemployment benefit he again became eligible for employment under the scheme until he again qualified for unemployment benefit, and so on.

Chadwick had previously been in receipt of unemployment benefit during six different periods in 1921, 1922, 1923, and 1924. He was employed under the corporation scheme in general labouring work on public works and was paid at the appropriate district rate for such work—namely, 1s. 1d. per hour. During the alternate weeks of employment he worked 8¾ hours on Thursday, Friday, Monday, Tuesday, and Wednesday, and 4¼ hours on Saturday—48 hours in all. The average number of hours normally worked by labourers in the employment of the corporation otherwise than under the scheme referred to was, from Thursday to Wednesday, also 48 a week.

Chadwick, as a married man with three children, was qualified to receive from the guardians 34s. a week poor relief in cash or in kind.

Chadwick had been previously employed under another scheme by which the corporation took men for works of public utility from the Labour Exchange on an alternate week system, working 48 hours per week, from Thursday to Wednesday.

By section 47 of the Unemployment Insurance Act, 1920 :—

" (1) For the purposes of this Act . . . (b) A person engaged in temporary work provided by a central body or distress committee under the Unemployed Workmen Act, 1905, or towards the provision of which any such central body or distress committee has contributed under that Act, shall not be deemed to be an employed person within the meaning of this Act. . . ."

The Fourth Schedule to the Unemployment Insurance Act, 1927, thus amends section 47 :—

" At the end of para. (b) of subsection (1) there shall be inserted the following words: and where in consequence of an arrangement made by a Poor Law authority a person is engaged in work provided by a local authority he shall not, if a contribution towards his remuneration is made by the Poor Law authority, be deemed to be such an employed person.

" Provided that the foregoing provision with respect to persons engaged in work provided by a local authority shall not apply in the case of any person who has previously been in receipt of unemployment benefit and is employed in full-time work provided by the authority.

" For the purpose of this provision a person shall not be deemed to have been employed in full-time work unless he has worked for such number of hours in each week as would normally have been worked by him if he had been employed on the same work otherwise than under such an arrangement as aforesaid."

The Attorney-General (Sir Thomas Inskip, K.C.) and Mr. C. W. Lilley appeared for the Minister of

* Reported by J. W. Hall, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Labour ; Sir Henry Slesser, K.C., and Mr. Arthur Henderson for the Leeds Corporation.

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL contended that Chadwick was not insurable. For the purpose of payment of contributions "week" meant "calendar week," and the effect of this scheme would be that for every week worked from Thursday to Wednesday two contributions were payable. After 30 contributions, or 15 weeks' actual work, the man would become entitled to unemployment benefit, possibly for as long as 18 months. Local authorities were very anxious to put on the unemployment fund men who should be relieved out of the rates. He submitted that "week" must have the same meaning throughout the Acts and that full time was not worked by Chadwick in any week.

He was stopped by the Court.

SIR HENRY SLESSER submitted that Chadwick had worked 48 hours per week in each week of employment, and this was the time which would normally be worked in other employment, and that it was immaterial that in the alternate weeks he was not employed.

Mr. JUSTICE ROCHE, in giving judgment, said that the history was, shortly, this :—Under section 47 (1) (b) of the Unemployment Insurance Act, 1920, persons engaged on temporary work by a distress committee, &c., were not to be deemed insured persons. But the matter was further dealt with in the Act of 1927. By section 15 of that Act amendments, set out in the Fourth Schedule, were made in the Act of 1920. One of the sections amended was section 47 (1) (b). The effect of the main amendment was that, if a Poor Law authority arranged with a local authority for the employment of persons, a person so employed was not to be deemed an "employed person." But there was a proviso that he was to be deemed an employed person if he had previously been entitled to unemployment benefit and was in full-time employment. Then there was a definition or explanation of full-time employment, and that was what he had to construe.

His Lordship stated the facts and proceeded : It was said that Chadwick was in full-time employment within the meaning of that definition. He was of opinion that Chadwick was not in full-time employment for the following reasons :—He thought, but it was not necessary to decide, that Chadwick was only working 24 hours of each week for the purpose of this Schedule, and that by "each week" each "calendar week" must be understood. For certain purposes the Act of 1920 defined week as "calendar week," and Chadwick's contributions, if he were insured, would be payable in respect of each calendar week. He did not think that there could be a different week for the purpose of this arrangement.

But, even if a calendar week were not required, the whole period of employment must be regarded, or at least the fortnight in respect of which the payment of Chadwick's wages and relief was in fact calculated. Whichever was required, it was manifest that the normal number of hours was not worked in the fortnight. The hours worked were 48, instead of 96, and so also if the longer period were taken.

Sir Henry Slesser had argued that the working of 48 hours and then 0 hours might be normal working ; that it was the method adopted by the corporation ; and that these were the normal hours of working on this work. He (his Lordship) could only say that he did not adopt that construction. The Schedule referred to normal hours of work otherwise than under such an arrangement.

Jones v. Ocean Coal Company, Limited (15 The Times L.R., 339 ; [1899] 2 Q.B., 124), a case under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, had been referred to. Lord Justice Vaughan Williams there said at p. 129 :—

"It seems to me that if the state of work were such that during the whole 12 months the master could only give three days' work a week to his men, it would still be true within the meaning of this clause to say that the workmen had been employed during the whole of the 12 months, for the relation of master and servant would have existed during the whole time. The real question is whether there has been any break in that relation."

That exactly expressed his view of this case. He was not deciding that Chadwick was not insurable because there were some breaks, but if he were to be regarded as continuously in the employment of the corporation, though he only worked alternate weeks, then he was not working the normal hours in each relevant week, and was, on that ground, not insurable.

Chan. Div. (Clauson, J.) } 1928. July 31.

LORD ELLESMERE AND OTHERS v. WALLACE.*

Gaming—Contract—Entry of horse for race—Money prize—Entrance fee—Forfeiture of fee in event of horse not running—Wagering contract — Unenforceability — Gaming Act, 1845 (8 and 9 Vict., c. 109), s. 18.

A contract between the Jockey Club and a racehorse owner that he will pay an entrance fee for the privilege of running a horse in a race for a money prize, and that if the horse does not run he will forfeit the entrance fee or part of it, is a contract by way of wagering and is unenforceable by reason of s. 18 of the Gaming Act, 1845.

This was an action by Lord Ellesmere, senior steward of the Jockey Club, on behalf of himself and all other members of the Jockey Club ; by Lord Wolverton, Major Sir Leonard Brassey, M.P., and Sir Samuel Scott, M.P., as trustees of the Jockey Club ; and by Messrs. Weatherby and Sons, of 15, Cavendish-square, W., printers and publishers of the "Racing Calendar," against Mr. Edgar Wallace, author, dramatist, and an owner of racehorses. The plaintiffs claimed a declaration that the defendant was liable to pay, in accordance with the rules of racing, £4 as forfeiture fees which they alleged to be due because a horse named Master Michael, which the defendant had nominated for two races at Newmarket, did not run.

The Jockey Club framed and published "Rules of Racing," which regulated all race meetings held under its sanction. Entries of horses for races at such race meetings were lodged at its "Registry Office," also at 15, Cavendish-square, and information about these meetings and the entries for them was contained in the "Racing Calendar." Messrs. Weatherby and Sons were "authorized stakeholders" to whom, under the "Rules of Racing," entrance money and forfeits in connexion with the race meetings were payable.

In the "Racing Calendar" of April 12, 1928, Messrs. Weatherby and Sons published a notice of the First Spring Meeting for 1928 at Newmarket, stating that the entrance money payable by the nominator of a horse entered for the "Peel Handicap" was £5 and for the "Long Course Selling Plate" £2; that these sums were payable to Messrs. Weatherby and Sons at the "Registry Office"; and that if the horse failed to run £2 of the entrance money would in each case be forfeited (if already paid), or be payable as a forfeit (if not already paid) to them.

The defendant, in acceptance of that offer, nominated a horse named Master Michael for the two races. Master Michael did not run in either of the races, and £4, it was alleged, became forfeit to Messrs. Weatherby and Sons. By letter dated May 7, 1928, Messrs. Weatherby and Sons demanded payment of the £4, but the defendant refused to pay.

Messrs. Weatherby and Sons pleaded that they were acting as principals and/or as agents of the other plaintiffs.

The defendant pleaded, inter alia, that there was no contract with the plaintiffs or any of them, and no consideration. He contended alternatively that if there were a contract, it was a contract by way of gaming or wagering within the Gaming Act, 1845, section 18, and was rendered void and unenforceable by the provisions of that statute and by the provisions of the Gaming Act, 1892.

The case was said to be a test action.

The Hon. Geoffrey Lawrence, K.C., and Mr. Theobald Mathew appeared for the plaintiffs; Mr. Archer, K.C., and Mr. H. M. Giveen for the defendant.

Mr. LAWRENCE, in opening the case, stated the issue, and said that the racecourse at Newmarket belonged to the Jockey Club. If the owner of a horse wished to withdraw his horse from a race he would have to pay a forfeit of £2. The forfeits went to the race fund. The substantial part of the defence was the last paragraph, pleading that the contract, if any, was a contract by way of gaming or wagering. Mr. Edgar Wallace had written, in answer to the letter demanding payment of the £4, that he did not propose to pay, and that he was interested in the controversy regarding the avoiding of nominations because, it was said, entrance fees and forfeits for which an owner had made himself liable during his life were not recoverable from his executors on his death.

Counsel read many of the rules in "Rules of Racing," including rule 86, which provided that all entries of horses for races should become void on the death of the nominator. It was said by the defendant that all entrance fees paid and forfeits incurred were bets which the nominator made with the other entrants. Rule 155 provided that if the entrance money exceeded the stake, half should be payable to the Rous Memorial Fund and the Bentinck Memorial Society, and the other half to charity.

The rules, coupled with the notice in the "Racing Calendar," formed a contract when the terms of the notice were accepted, and it was a perfectly legal contract. That depended on the provisions in the Gaming Act, 1845, section 18, and a consideration of the law previous to that statute. Section 18 was the really material section. It enacted that all contracts by way of gaming and wagering should be null and void, and that no suit should be brought to recover money or any valuable thing which was alleged to be won upon any wager, or which should have been deposited in the hands of any person to abide the event on which any wager should have been made. There was a proviso that that enactment should not be deemed to apply to any subscription, or contribution, or agreement to subscribe, or contribute, for or towards any plate, prize, or sum of money to be awarded to the winner of any lawful game, sport, pastime, or exercise. That proviso, counsel submitted, applied to entrance moneys in respect of horseracing, which were subscriptions towards a prize.

It was clear that ever since 1740 at Newmarket, and since 1745 everywhere else, horseracing for prizes over £50 was lawful.

Counsel then cited the statutes 13 Geo. II., c. 19, 18 Geo. II., c. 34, and 3 and 4 Vict., c. 5, and Evans v. Pratt (3 Man. and G., 759). Statutes in the reigns of Charles II. and Queen Anne had been construed to apply to horseracing, and 13 Geo. II., c. 19, was passed to legalize horseracing.

The entrance fee for a horserace was a subscription for a prize or sum of money to be awarded to the winner of any lawful game, sport, or pastime within the meaning of the proviso to section 18 of the Gaming Act, 1845, and was, consequently, not a contract by way of gaming and wagering which that section made null and void. There was no contract between the entrants, but only between the individual entrant and the Jockey Club, and that was not a wagering contract, because the Jockey Club could not win but could only lose. The entrant also had other interests than the mere winning of the stake. He hoped by winning the race, especially such a race as the Derby, to make his horse very much more valuable. The only consideration moving from the Jockey Club was a promise to allow the entrant to run his horse in the race. There was nothing in the "Rules of Racing" which created any contractual obligation between the various entrants. If this were held to be a wagering contract so would entries for tennis club tournaments or for a cattle show.

MR. JUSTICE CLAUSON said that he saw no logical distinction between a horserace for which entrance money was paid and which was decided by the excellence of the horses and a competition such as a cattle show, where entrance money was paid and the allocation of the prize money was determined by the excellence of the beasts. At the same time, the references which had been made to cattle shows and tennis tournaments showed the far-reaching effect of the decision which was sought in the present proceedings.

Mr. LAWRENCE said that in the ordinary meaning of the English language an entrance fee was not a wager. Since 1740 entrance money which was to go eventually to one of the entrants had been recognized by the Legislature as legal and proper, and it was impossible to imagine that the Legislature, when passing the Gaming Act, 1845, intended to treat a contract to pay an entrance fee for the privilege of being allowed to enter a competition as a wagering contract. When Miss Helen Wills paid her entrance fee for the Wimbledon Tennis Tournament she did not do so with a view to winning a cup. She did it to secure the privilege of being allowed to play in the tournament and to have an opportunity of becoming champion. Peers v. Caldwell (32 The Times L.R., 190; [1916] 1 K.B., 371) showed that in every case it had to be determined what was the real consideration for which the entrance money was paid.

MR. JUSTICE CLAUSON said that he protested against having to dive into the minds of those who paid entrance fees, but unless Mr. Edgar Wallace was absolutely indifferent to his chance of winning a stake the transaction might be a wagering contract.

Lord Ellesmere, giving evidence, said that, apart from the chance to win a stake, there were many reasons for entering a horse in a race. If he ran well his value increased both as a racehorse and as a horse for stud purposes, and his winning also increased the value of his dam and his sire. The entrance money was an insignificant part of the value of a race to the winner. Winnings helped the winner to continue horse-breeding, and owners were also able to dispose of horses after selling races.

Mr. ARCHER, in opening the defendant's case, said that the plaintiffs must rely on a contract, and whatever the contract was it clearly was not one merely for the holding of the lawful sport of horseracing, but was also by way of wagering. It was part of the wagering contract that the expenses should abide the event, but the two were divisible. The executive, in effect, bet £200 to £2 against the horse of an entrant winning, and there was no difference between that and a bet with a bookmaker.

Counsel said that in the present case the Jockey Club was in the position of a stakeholder, and a contract with a stakeholder was a contract "by way of gaming or wagering" within section 18 of the Act of 1845. The element of a stakeholder was quite absent in Carlill v. Carbolic Smoke Ball Company (8 The Times L.R., 680 ; [1892] 2 Q.B., 484). The vice against which the Act of 1845 was designed was that of allowing persons to sue for money if their title to it depended on an uncertain event, and the Court, in a case like the present, had to determine whether the contract under consideration was infected with that vice. The real object of the transaction had to be regarded. No sportsman thought that the real object of a bet was the bet itself. The Act of Parliament did not call on his Lordship to decide whether in the present case there was more gaming or wagering or more consideration for the value of horses and the welfare of bloodstock. Any money put up by a competitor which he ran the risk of losing as the result of a horserace was a wager. He referred to Irwin v. Osborne (5 Ir. C.L.R., 404).

Mr. LAWRENCE replied.

MR. JUSTICE CLAUSON, in his considered judgment, said that the defendant nominated a horse for two races at the Newmarket First Spring Meeting, 1928 —namely, the Peel Handicap, a sweepstake of five sovereigns each, of which two sovereigns were to be forfeit, with 200 sovereigns added money, 15 entries or the race to be at the option of the Stewards ; and a Long Course Selling Plate of 200 sovereigns, entrance two sovereigns, 10 entries or the race to be at the option of the Stewards, the winner to be sold by auction for 300 sovereigns. When the time for the races came the defendant's horse did not run. The defendant did not pay any part of the entrance fee for either race. The plaintiffs claimed two sovereigns in respect of the nomination for the Peel Handicap, being the portion of the entrance fee made forfeitable; and two sovereigns in respect of the nomination for the Long Course Selling Plate, being the total entrance fee. The Jockey Club conducted the Newmarket Spring Meeting, and the plaintiffs represented the Jockey Club.

He held that the effect of the nominations by the defendant, subject to the operation of section 18 of the Gaming Act, 1845, was to constitute two contracts between the defendant and the Jockey Club, which, subject as aforesaid, were admitted to be binding and valid. Mr. Lawrence pointed out in his argument, the accuracy of which was not impugned by counsel for the defendant, that while horseracing was at common law a lawful sport certain statutes from the time of Charles II. up to 3 and 4 Vict., c. 5, operated to restrict certain forms of, and contracts relating to, horseracing, but these restrictions were swept away by the Gaming Act, 1845. Under that Act horseracing was left a lawful sport. This case accordingly turned on the application to the facts of section 18 of that Act.

His LORDSHIP read the section, and continued. The plaintiffs contended that the transactions between the defendant and the Jockey Club were, within the proviso to the section, a subscription or agreement to subscribe to a prize to be awarded to the winner of a lawful sport (as, indeed, in his (his Lordship's) opinion, it clearly was), and that even if the contracts were by way of gaming and wagering the proviso exempted them from the operation of the section. That construction was adopted, though with some hesitation, in Batty v. Marriott (5 C.B., 818). But there was an alternative construction— namely, that the proviso applied only to such subscriptions as were not contracts by way of wagering —and that was adopted by the Court of Appeal in Diggle v. Higgs (2 Ex. D., 422) and by the Privy Council in Trimble v. Hill (5 App. Cas., 342). The law was, therefore, settled by the Court of Appeal and the Privy Council. Accordingly, the plaintiffs failed on the first point, and the question whether the contracts were "by way of gaming and wagering" must be decided. If they were, he must hold them null and void by reason of the first sentence of section 18.

There was no contract between the various entrants inter se to contribute stakes which were to abide an event, and the contracts here were between the club and the defendant. It was essential to a wagering contract that each party might either win or lose under it, his winning or losing being dependent on the issue of the event (per Mr. Justice Hawkins in Carlill v. Carbolic Smoke Ball Company, 8 The Times L.R., 680 ; [1892] 2 Q.B., 484, at p. 491). The defendant stood to win or lose. The club stood to lose in the case of the Peel Handicap the 200 sovereigns added money, and, in the case of the Selling Plate, the 200 sovereigns. As between the club and the defendant, the club stood to win £5 on the Peel Handicap if the defendant's horse ran and failed to win or be placed, and £2 if the horse failed to run ; and on the Selling Plate £2 in the like events.

He came to the conclusion, therefore, that in the case of each of the contracts in question the essential element of wagering was present—namely, that each party might under each contract either win or lose as the event turned out. It was said that both contracts might be read as contracts under which, in consideration of the entrance fee, the club contracted to give the defendant the opportunity (said to be very important for all breeders and owners of racehorses) to exhibit his animal's powers at the Newmarket Spring Meeting, and that the prize was a mere subsidiary matter ; and that in the case of the Selling Plate the contract was to give the defendant the chance of having his horse sold in favourable circumstances. He could not so read the contracts, which appeared to be nothing more nor less than contracts under which the defendant risked his entrance fee to gain a prize, while the club risked the added money and the prize against the entrance fee.

The plaintiffs contended that, in fact, the real interest of the club in such contracts as the present was not pecuniary gain, but the encouragement of sport and horse-breeding. That might well be so, but that argument was addressed to the motive which actuated the club in entering into the contract, and he could not consider the motives of the parties or those of the club, however excellent, in relation to a contract which he found, on the face of it, to be a contract by way of wagering.

His conclusions could be summed up very shortly. He was not free, by reason of authorities which bound him, to construe section 18 of the Gaming Act, 1845, as enacting that the contracts of entrants to such races as those in question, whether they were or were not contracts by way of wagering, were enforceable in the Courts. He accordingly had to consider whether the contracts between the Jockey Club and the defendant were or were not contracts by way of wagering. He held that they were because, on the face of them, they were arrangements by which each party staked something of value on the issue of an uncertain event.

The action would be dismissed on the ground that it sought to enforce contracts which, being by way of wagering, were null and void by reason of section 18 of the Gaming Act, 1845. If the defendant wished for the costs he must have them.

Mr. GIVEEN.—I do not ask for costs.

MR. JUSTICE CLAUSON.—Then the action will be dismissed without costs.

ENGLISH INSURANCE COMPANY, LIMITED v. OFFICIAL RECEIVER and LIQUIDATOR OF THE NATIONAL BENEFIT ASSURANCE COMPANY, LIMITED.*

Company — Winding up — Proof — Contract of marine insurance—No stamped policies—Rejection of proof.

Held, that the liquidator had rightly rejected a proof by the English Insurance Company, Limited, in the winding up of the National Benefit Assurance Company, Limited, in that the contract between the two companies in respect of which the proof of debt was advanced was a contract of marine insurance and no stamped policy of marine insurance was issued to the English Insurance Company, Limited, as required by law, and therefore the contract was invalid.

Decision of the Court of Appeal (44 The Times L.R., 14; [1928] Ch., 74) affirmed.

This was an appeal from a decision of the Court of Appeal (44 The Times L.R., 14; [1928] Ch., 74) affirming a decision of Mr. Justice Eve (43 The Times L.R., 594).

The question raised by the appeal was whether a contract entered into between the English Insurance Company, Limited (hereinafter called the English Company), and the National Benefit Assurance Company, Limited (hereinafter called the National Company), was or was not a contract of marine insurance. The National Company was in liquidation and the liquidator rejected a proof of debt by the English Company arising out of the contract on the ground that its subject matter was marine insurance, and that, as no properly stamped policies of marine had been issued to the English Company, it was invalid under the provisions of section 93 of the Stamp Act, 1891, and sections 22 and 23 of the Marine Insurance Act, 1906.

Mr. Justice Eve upheld the decision of the liquidator and the Court of Appeal (Lord Hanworth, M.R., Lords Justices Sargant and Lawrence) affirmed the decision of the learned Judge.

The terms of the agreement are stated in the report of the case before the Court of Appeal, and they sufficiently appear from the opinion of the Lord Chancellor.

Mr. Porter, K.C., and Mr. Andrewes-Uthwatt appeared for the appellants; Mr. Dunlop, K.C., and Mr. L. W. Byrne, for the respondent, were not called upon.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR.—My Lords, this is an appeal against an order of the Court of Appeal affirming an order of Mr. Justice Eve which upheld the decision of the Senior Official Receiver that the appellant company was not entitled to prove in the liquidation of the National Benefit Assurance Co., Limited, in respect of claims arising under an agreement in writing made between the appellant company and the National Benefit Assurance Company, and dated January 27, 1922. That agreement, which was described as a participation agreement, provided that the National Company should be entitled to and should accept a quota participation equal to a one-eighth share of all and every risk underwritten by the appellant company. By article II. it was provided that the participation should be equal to 50 per cent. of the share retained by the appellant company at their own risk of all marine assurances accepted on and after the first day of January, 1920, with a limit of £1,875 on any one ship. The agreement went on to make provision that the appellant company should alone settle all claims which might arise under its policies, and that the National Company should have no right to interfere with settlements but should be bound thereby. The appellant company was to have commissions on the net premiums and on the profits derived by the National Company from the business under the agreement. Accounts were to be settled and paid quarterly. By article IX. the appellant company was given a right, upon default in punctual payment, to give seven days' notice in writing to the National Company requiring payment of the amount due, and if the National Company did not pay within seven days the appellant company was entitled to cancel the agreement immediately by giving written notice to that effect; and it was further provided that, at any time after the termination of notice under the agreement, the appellant company had the right to cancel the participation of the National Company in the whole or any part of the then current or outstanding marine business.

The National Company was ordered to be wound up by the Court on July 25, 1922, and the Official Receiver became its liquidator.

No insurance policies were ever issued to the appellant company by the National Company in respect of risks accepted by the latter under the terms of the agreement, and the Official Receiver refused to accept liability for losses on risks falling within the terms of the agreement, on the ground that there was no stamped policy ever issued and that the contract was therefore void under the provisions of the Stamp Act, 1891, and of the Marine Insurance Act, 1906.

It was conceded by the appellant company that if the participation agreement of January 27, 1922, was a contract for sea insurance within the meaning of the Stamp Act, 1891, or a contract of marine insurance within the meaning of section 1 of the Marine Insurance Act, 1906, they must fail in their present claim; but it was argued on their behalf that, upon its true construction, the agreement was not a contract for sea or marine insurance but was a partnership agreement under which the National Company became the insurer jointly with the appellant company of all persons who took out marine insurance policies with the appellant company.

My Lords, in my opinion, this contention fails. I regard the participation agreement as an ordinary re-insurance agreement under which the National Company agreed to indemnify the appellant company against the risks assumed by the latter on the marine policies issued during the currency of the agreement. If the appellant company's contention is correct, it follows that privity of contract was created between the insured and the National Company in respect of policies issued by the appellant company during the period covered by the participation agreement. It is to be observed that the agreement dated back for over two years, so that many of the risks in which the National Company participated had actually expired before the agreement was entered into; and it is further to be observed that under article IX. of the agreement the appellant company had the right in certain events to cancel the participation of the National Company in the then outstanding marine business. My Lords, it seems to me very improbable that an agreement couched in such language could have been intended by the parties to create any contractual liability between the persons insured by the appellant company and the National Company. It is common ground that no intimation was ever given to persons taking policies from the appellant company that the National Company had any interest therein, and in none of the policies issued by the appellant company was there any reference to the National Company as an insurer. I think the true effect of the participation agreement is correctly stated in the judgment of Lord Justice Sargant in the Court of Appeal. In my view the meaning of the document is that the appellant company were to carry on their business as principals and that the National Company were, as between themselves and the appellant company, to receive a proportion of the premiums paid to the appellant company, less commission, and were, in consideration of such receipt, to indemnify the appellant company against a proportion of the losses suffered by the appellant company as principals. The agreement seems to me to have all the elements of re-insurance and to contain the stipulations which are normally to be found in a contract of re-insurance.

It follows that in my judgment the decision of the Courts below was correct and that the absence of a duly stamped policy is fatal to the appellants' claim. I move your Lordships accordingly.

Viscount Sumner.—My Lords, I agree that the appeal must fail. The whole question turns upon the construction of a singular document, and, unless it can be shown that this document is not a treaty of re-insurance, the appellants, as has been conceded from the first, are in the wrong.

The pivot of the argument is the word "participation" and the word "participator"—words which are sprinkled with a liberal hand all over the agreement—but it is obvious that the word itself is neutral and indefinite, and until you have made up your minds in what the parties are to participate and how, I do not think that any definite conclusion can be arrived at to affect the present issue.

It is quite true that nowhere throughout the agreement is it said that the National Company is to re-insure the English Company, although the words "re-insurance" and "re-assured" are used in other connexions; nor is it ever said that this is a contract of indemnity by which the participator indemnifies the participatee, but in every other respect the features of a re-insurance treaty appear upon the face of the document. By article I. the participator is "entitled to and shall accept a quota participation equal to a one-eighth share of all and every risk." Now there is no occasion to bind the participator to accept a share in all and every risk, unless the agreement means that, as and when an original risk is taken by the English Company, the National Company is entitled and bound to stand behind it and to accept a part of that risk. Then there is in article II. a singular arrangement for relation back which, as the noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack has pointed out, is quite inconsistent with any partnership arrangement existing as from the year 1920; and in the latter part of article II. the words "any special re-insurance" are apparently used in contradiction to the arrangement with this participator, which I should therefore assume to be a general re-insurance; all the more so because the participator has a maximum limit to his participation in respect of any one ship, which is different from participating simply by a proportion of the risk originally taken and appears to me to be appropriate only to the participator's taking a re-insurance line of his own with a limit of £1,875 on any one ship re-insured. Then twice in article V. reference is made to the amount "ceded" and the risks "ceded" under this agreement—words which have their place in a re-insurance treaty and not, as it seems to me, in a partnership or a joint adventure agreement. In article VI. the company retains the right to settle all claims under its policies, which of course really are its policies if this is a re-insurance, but are not truly its policies but the common policies of the two companies, if they have entered into some kind of joint account transaction. In article IX. there is again a reference to "current or unexpired risks accepted hereunder until the expiry thereof," which seems to me to show a different basis for winding up the accounts from that which would arise under any kind of partnership transaction. Finally, under article X. there is a provision that "the participator is absolutely bound in every case to follow the fortunes of the Company," which is re-insurance practice pure and simple, expressed in rather artless words, and is quite unnecessary if it relates to some obligation between partners, as to which of course this would be implied. Then it says: "It shall not prejudice the Company if it should accidentally happen that it has incorrectly advised or omitted to advise the participator of any particulars relating to this agreement," which I think is a clause wide enough to include, among other things, the obligation of the English Company, as the re-assured, to make disclosure to the re-insuring company of matters material to the risk and known to it, and under this clause it is excused from failure to make that disclosure before the insurance is effected, but I do not see that there is any appropriateness in the words in connexion with a partnership.

My Lords, on the other side it is contended that this agreement effects some sort of common relation between the parties, the only really definite thing about which is that it is not re-insurance, and one is left to take one's choice of any relationship that the words can describe short of re-insurance. Though it is not an impossible thing, it is a novel idea to me that two insurance companies should become partners in a regular partnership. The Lord Chancellor has pointed out the singular results that would happen if they were both engaged in writing the original risks as partners, the National Company being an undisclosed partner liable at the option of the assured to pay the whole of the loss, and having to get back its share of the loss from the English Company as it can, supposing the English Company were to fall on the same evil days as the National Company has fallen upon.

My Lords, I do not personally think that the provisions that I have referred to would have any place in any kind of partnership agreement. They would most of them be implied, and I certainly cannot construe the contract as a partnership or joint adventure agreement merely because it uses the word "participation." It was skilfully argued—because it is obvious that a good deal of resource was required to explain what the agreement really was—that, if it was not a partnership and was not a joint adventure, it was at least an agreement to share the risks as between the two parties. Now if it is an agreement to share the risks, it still appears to me it must operate by way of re-insurance. Nothing else would explain the provisions of the contract. There might be an agreement to share the results over a given period, an agreement that profits and losses should be ascertained, and, if the account was one way the participator should pay, and if it were the other way he should receive, but why then put in any provision for following settlements or receiving a share in salvages? In that view the result of the contract is what the participation is to apply to.

My Lords, I have therefore come to the conclusion as a matter of construction that the decisions in the Courts below were right. I only wish to add that, had it been otherwise, I think there might have been some difficulty in seeing how the establishment of a partnership arrangement would have saved the parties from the application of the Stamp Act, 1891. I express no opinion upon the subject, except that I wish to say that if it were necessary to draw from the case of Brett v. Beckwith (26 L.J.Ch., 130) the proposition that Mr. Porter extracted from that not very clearly reported case, I should wish to hear the case argued very fully before I could come to the conclusion that Lord Romilly either purported to hold or could justifiably have held that, if there was a partnership, the Act of George III. would be given the go-by.

Lord Atkin.—My Lords, I agree that this appeal fails.

The question that has been propounded to us is whether the agreement in this case amounts to a re-insurance. If it does amount to a re-insurance it is admitted that the appellants must fail. The test of whether it is a re-insurance or not has been in my view quite correctly stated to be the question whether or not the re-insurers or the alleged re-insurers have assumed a contractual liability to the original assured, for such an original contractual liability is not an incident of re-insurance, and if such an original liability had been assumed then there would have been a contract of insurance upon which a stamp had already been paid on the policy issued by the English Company, who it is said for this purpose were the partners, or the agents, apart from a partnership, of the National Company.

Now, my Lords, accepting that test, it seems to me quite plain that the parties here by their agreement did not intend the National Company to assume any liability towards the original assured. The liability is a liability which is limited in the original agreement to one-eighth of the risk in consideration of a receipt of one-eighth of the premium—it was varied afterwards by making it two-ninths. There are provisions by which the agreement is to relate back to insurances which were made within two years before the agreement in question, and there are provisions by which the interest, such as it is, of the National Company may be limited by the action of the English Company either in re-insuring or in granting similar participations to other companies. If in fact it was a partnership or an agency, then the National Company became bound in the full sum to the original assured, for there would be no limit known to him and he could have asserted as against the partner of the English Company the full liability. I cannot help thinking that the last legal result that the National Company ever contemplated was that they would or might have to assume the full and complete liability on the risks to the original assured, with no prospect of ever receiving, or no right in any case to receive, more than the particular share of the premium which the agreement gave them.

My Lords, for the reasons that have been given by the noble Lord on the Woolsack and by the noble Viscount, I am satisfied that this was in fact a policy of re-insurance. No liability was intended to be assumed by the National Company to the assured, and that being so the effect of the agreement is that for a definite portion of the premium which the English Company received the National Company undertook to indemnify the English Company against the specific proportion of the risk to be ascertained in accordance with the agreement. The result is, it appears to me, that on the contention put before us this appeal must fail.

I should like to add one other word, for I feel that this result is unfortunate in some respects from the business point of view. After all, re-insurance of marine risks is a perfectly legitimate business, and the result, as appears from the discussion before your Lordships, is that it is impossible to conduct this form of business, by which a company that engages in marine insurance tries to secure in advance that its risks shall be fairly distributed by re-insurance policies, by any contract which can be enforced in Courts of Law. As I say, I think that is a matter which might reasonably be considered. If it is the considered policy of the Exchequer that such business as this should go untaxed, then it seems to me that it would be right that the fiscal legislation should make that clear, so that parties might embark on business of this kind. On the other hand, if it is desirable, as it well may be desirable, that the Exchequer should take its share by taxing this business which goes on, as we all know, to a considerable extent, then it seems to me that it would be right that provision should be made by which the present rules relating to the taxing of marine re-insurance should be altered, so that it would be possible for persons who desire to engage in business of this kind—as I say, in my opinion legitimate business—to be entitled to come to the Courts if necessary to enforce their rights. At present they are outlaws moving outside the pale, and it is difficult to see why that should be the position. But that has no effect upon the legal relations of the present parties, and on the matter which has been put before us I agree that this appeal should be dismissed.

REX v. CONFIRMING COMMITTEE OF THE COUNTY OF SOUTHAMPTON—EX PARTE SLADE.*

Licensing — Ordinary removal — Refusal on ground that monopoly value ought to be paid for a new licence—Jurisdiction—Licensing (Consolidation) Act, 1910 (10 Ed. VII. and 1 Geo. V., c. 24), s. 26

Though licensing justices have no jurisdiction to make the grant of an ordinary removal of a licence subject to any condition as to payment of monopoly value, they are entitled to refuse the removal upon the sole ground that it would confer a great pecuniary gain upon the applicant, and that he ought therefore to apply for a new licence and pay monopoly value.

Dictum of Lord Alverstone, C.J., in Rex v. Drinkwater (21 The Times L.R., 514; [1905] 2 K.B., 469) approved and followed.

These were rules nisi for certiorari and mandamus calling on the confirming committee of the county of Southampton to show cause why a certain order made by them on or about April 25, 1928, refusing the application of Mr. William Slade for the confirmation of the provisional grant of the ordinary removal of the licence of the Bird-in-Hand, Gosport-road, Fareham, should not be quashed, and to command them to hear and determine the application according to law, on the grounds: (1) that the confirming committee sought to attach a condition to the grant of an order for removal; (2) that they had failed to consider the convenience of the public, the fitness of the premises, the fitness of the applicant, or any other relevant matters; and (3), alternatively, that when considering such matters they had before them no evidence to warrant them in differing from the licensing justices.

Mr. William Slade was the licensee of the Bird-in-Hand, the licence being an old beerhouse on-licence within the meaning of the Licensing (Consolidation) Act, 1910, Schedule II., Part 1. The owners of the house, Messrs. Kinnell and Hartley, Limited, acquired a new site, and on March 5, 1928, Mr. Slade applied for the removal of the licence of the Bird-in-Hand to premises to be erected on the new site. A bench of 12 licensing justices unanimously resolved to sanction the removal, which was strongly supported by the police as being in the interests of the neighbourhood generally.

The Quarter Sessions of the county of Hants, as the confirming authority of that county, had duly delegated their powers to a committee, which, on April 25, 1928, heard the unopposed application of Mr. Slade, and refused to confirm the removal on the ground that monopoly value would not be attracted.

Sir Francis Charles Gore, K.C.B., chairman of the confirming committee, deposed in his affidavit that the Bird-in-Hand was situated in a somewhat sparsely populated locality and in the immediate vicinity of another licensed house, and that the proposed new site was 450 yards away and in the centre of a large number of houses occupied by persons of the working classes. The committee felt difficulty in confirming the removal order because the two sites were so far apart and in neighbourhoods with such different prospects as regarded customers. They were of opinion (a) that the pecuniary gain to the brewers and the tenant, if the application were granted, would be considerable; and (b) that the monopoly value of the new premises would be substantial.

They unanimously resolved to refuse the application because it appeared to them that this was not a case which should be dealt with by way of removal order whereby the payment of monopoly value would be avoided to the detriment of the public. No question arose as to the fitness of the applicant or of the proposed new premises.

Mr. Blake Odgers showed cause for the confirming committee; Sir Reginald Mitchell Banks, K.C., and Mr. Healy supported the rules.

The Lord Chief Justice (Lord Hewart), in giving judgment, said that it was made clear by the affidavit of Sir Francis Gore, who had been for many years chairman of the confirming committee, that that committee did direct their minds to the sort of topic which was said by the applicant to be irrelevant. It was now said, not that that topic—the escaping of monopoly value—was irrelevant, but that it ought not to afford the sole reason for refusing to give validity to the order of the licensing justices. The law on the subject was to be found, so far as the statute was concerned, in section 26 of the Licensing (Consolidation) Act, 1910. It was significant that that section provided that no such order—i.e., of the licensing justices authorizing the removal—should be valid unless it was confirmed by the confirming authority. Nor were any limits set by the statute to the matters which the confirming authority might take into account in deciding whether to confirm the order.

It was conceded by Sir Reginald Mitchell Banks that the licensing justices might take into account whether what was asked was practically a new licence. When one looked at Rex v. Drinkwater (21 The Times L.R., 514; [1905] 2 K.B., 469) one found the following emphatic words of Lord Alverstone:—

"I wish, however, to say that I do not indicate or suggest that the justices have not a discretion as to whether they will, or will not, make an order sanctioning the removal; and, speaking for myself, I think they are entitled and ought to take into consideration the circumstance, if it exists, that by making the order a great pecuniary gain would be conferred upon the applicant, and the public would lose that pecuniary gain, which might have been preserved to them if the application had been for the grant of a new licence. It must not be thought, therefore, that I suggest that the justices have not a discretion to refuse to make a removal order upon that ground amongst others."

And Mr. Justice Kennedy, as he then was, said:—

"I agree with my Lord that our decision must not be taken as suggesting in any way that the justices have not a discretion with respect to the granting or refusing of the application to remove the licence."

* Reported by J. W. Hall, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Mr. Justice Ridley agreed without comment. It was said that those observations of Lord Alverstone and the statement by Mr. Justice Kennedy were of the nature of obiter dicta. So, in a sense, they were, but they were remarkably near the topic that was then being dealt with.

Sir Reginald Mitchell Banks suggested that in referring to "that ground amongst others" Lord Alverstone intended to say that they could not refuse the removal solely on the ground of monopoly value. He (Lord Hewart) did not think that that was the true view, but that Lord Alverstone was saying: "It must not be thought that I think the justices have not jurisdiction to refuse on that ground, as well as on some other grounds." It was not intended to convey that that might not be the decisive, or the sole, ground. There was nothing here to be complained of and the rules ought to be discharged.

The other learned Judges agreed.

BEVAN v. NIXON'S NAVIGATION COMPANY, LIMITED*.

Master and Servant—Compensation for injury by accident—Reduction to lower grade by reason of partial incapacity—Ability to perform lower-paid work—Inability to obtain it owing to state of labour market—Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906 (6 Edw. VII., c. 58), Sched. I. (1) (b), (3)—Workmen's Compensation Act, 1923 (13 and 14 Geo. V., c. 42), s. 16.

Held (Lord Shaw of Dunfermline and Lord Blanesburgh dissenting), that a skilled workman who would, if uninjured, have continued to be employed as a skilled workman, but who, as the result of an accident arising out of and in the course of his employment has been reduced to the grade of an unskilled workman and driven to seek work in such lower grade, and who, though he has recovered sufficiently to be able to perform such unskilled work, is, in fact, unable to obtain such unskilled work solely on account of labour conditions, is nevertheless, for the purpose of the calculation of compensation, to be treated as "able to earn" the wages of a worker in such lower grade.

This was an appeal from a decision of the Court of Appeal affirming an award of the County Court Judge of Glamorgan under the Workmen's Compensation Acts, 1906-1925.

The facts are fully stated in the opinion of Lord Dunedin.

Mr. Upjohn, K.C., Mr. A. T. James, K.C., and Mr. W. Shakespeare appeared for the appellant; and Mr. Edward Cave, K.C., and Mr. Edgar Dale for the respondents.

* Reported by H. B. Hemming, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Viscount Dunedin.—My Lords, the circumstances out of which this appeal arises are as follows:—

The appellant was a collier and worked at the face. He had been employed by the respondents for forty years up to 1919. At that time his wages were £2 13s. 3d. per week. In April, 1919, he was certified as suffering from the industrial disease of nystagmus. This prevented him from working at the face. Up to May, 1920, he was paid full compensation as for total disablement at the rate of £1 per week. By this time he was fitted for surface work though not for work at the face, and he was employed on surface work up to 1922 when the pit ceased working. It was reopened in December, 1926, and is still working. From June, 1922, till May, 1927, he was paid on the basis of partial incapacity. The sum actually paid from December 2, 1926, to May 17, 1927, was at the rate of 15s. 1d. per week. Since June, 1922, he was unable to find any surface work. On April 29, 1927, he filed a request for arbitration alleging that the compensation to be paid to him should be raised from 15s. 1d. to £1 per week as from December 2, 1926. The respondents countered this by a demand that the compensation should be reduced to 5s. 3d. as from May 17, 1927. This was based on an assertion that he was able to earn, in spite of the nystagmus, wages of £2 2s. 8d. per week, and that his inability to find work had no connexion with the nystagmus.

The case came before the arbitrator. He found certain facts, and the material ones, stated in proposition, are these:—

(1) That but for the nystagmus the appellant would be getting work at the face and would be earning £2 13s. 2d. per week.

(2) That his physical condition with the nystagmus fitted him for surface work for which at current rates he would be paid £2 2s. 8d. per week.

(3) That he could not get surface work solely on account of labour conditions.

The arbitrator then stated that the two alternatives were either that he should award £1 per week, being the maximum calculated as for total incapacity, or 5s. 3d. per week, being half the difference between the pre-accident figure of £2 13s. 3d. and a wage of £2 2s. 8d. which the workman must be taken as able to earn. The arbitrator, after a long review of the cases in which he showed clearly that he was personally in favour of the first alternative, came to the conclusion that he was bound by the case of Cardiff Corporation v. Hall (27 The Times L.R., 339; [1911] 1 K.B., 1009). The Court of Appeal also held themselves bound. That case was decided on the Act of 1906. It dealt with the right interpretation of clauses (1) (b) and (3) of the first schedule. For clearness' sake, it may be well to set them out.

"(1) The amount of compensation under this Act shall be . . . (b) where total or partial incapacity for work results from the injury, a weekly payment during the incapacity not exceeding fifty per cent. of his average weekly earnings during the previous twelve months, if he has been so long employed, but if not then for any less period during which he has been in the employment of the same employer, such weekly payment not to exceed one pound. . .

"(3) In fixing the amount of the weekly payment, regard shall be had to any payment, allowance, or benefit which the workman may receive from the employer during the period of his incapacity, and in the case of partial incapacity the weekly payment shall in no case exceed the difference between the amount of the average weekly earnings of the workman before the accident and the average weekly amount which he is earning or is able to earn in some suitable employment or business after the accident, but shall bear such relation to the amount of that difference as under the circumstances of the case may appear proper."

The whole controversy turned on the words "is earning or is able to earn." Does "is able to earn" mean "is in such a physical condition that he is able to earn" and that alone, or does it also include the proviso of employment if the workman fairly attempts to get it? Sir Herbert Cozens-Hardy, M.R., took the latter view. Lords Justices Moulton and Buckley the former. Their opposing views are clearly set forth. Sir Herbert Cozens-Hardy, M.R., says, at page 1013:—

"This state of facts raises the question whether an employer, admittedly liable to pay compensation for an accident which disables the man from following his former occupation, can obtain an order for the termination or reduction of the compensation by merely proving physical ability to do light work without either offering to provide such work or adducing some evidence that light work can be obtained in the neighbourhood where the man resides, and of a suitable character. In my opinion, apart from authority, this question should be answered in the negative. The effects of the accident have not been removed, and I cannot think that the workman ought to have his compensation reduced merely on the ground that he is physically able to do a different kind of work, which, in truth, cannot be procured. It is not a case in which the effects of the original injury have completely disappeared so that the man is as capable as ever he was. In that case the employer, who does not guarantee the labour market, is free from all further liability."

"It is impossible to hold that the employer necessarily or generally guarantees the conditions of the labour market where there is partial incapacity any more than he guarantees that the workman shall get employment where incapacity has for the time ceased. An example will make this clear. Suppose that in the business of a mechanical fitter there is a class of work requiring a special fineness of touch or keenness of sight so that it can only be done by persons specially gifted in these respects and that it accordingly commands higher wages. Suppose also that an accident happens to one of these first-class fitters which injures his sight or touch to such an extent that he now has that sense only in an average degree of perfection, and thus is qualified only for the work of an ordinary fitter, but which does him no other injury. His position after the accident is that he has lost thereby the difference of earning power of a first-class fitter as compared with an ordinary fitter. But he has lost no more. I can see no reason why his chance of obtaining employment or his power of earning wages should be treated for any purpose as different from that of a man who has all his life been an average fitter, and, inasmuch as the employer does not guarantee the state of the labour market for one who is and has previously been an average fitter, I cannot see why he should guarantee the state of the labour market for the workman who has now become one."

Lord Justice Buckley says, at page 1026: "It has been laid down that upon an original arbitration the state of the labour market is altogether outside the question of compensation: that the question is, not whether the man can in the then state of the labour market get a place, but whether as a result of the accident he is under an incapacity for work which prevents him from being as eligible as he was before the accident for a place. The same in my opinion is true upon an application to review. Having regard to any incapacity for work personal to the workman arising from the injury, what is the difference between the amount of his average weekly earnings before and the average weekly amount which he is earning or is able to earn in some suitable employment or business after the accident? This is the question to be answered. The two following propositions are of course distinct: First, that owing to incapacity for work arising from the accident the condition of the workman is such that his labour is not saleable or is saleable only at a reduced figure, and, secondly, that his labour is saleable or is saleable at the same figure as before the accident but that he has failed to find a purchaser. The former and not the latter is the relevant proposition in the question of compensation. To express the same thing more briefly, inability to earn for the purposes of Schedule I., paragraph 3, is inability to get employment owing to some incapacity for work personal to the workman to the exclusion of inability to get employment owing to the state of the labour market. The employer may be called an insurer of 'capacity for work' but he is not an insurer of a 'right to work.' The Workmen's Compensation Act is not a Right to Work Act."

Now the Cardiff case (supra) has ruled the practice ever since the date of it, but it is not binding on your Lordships. This appeal is truly an appeal against the Cardiff case (supra). It was argued by the appellant's counsel that the Cardiff case (supra) had been displaced by what was said in this House in the three cases reported under the name of Portland Colliery Co., Limited v. Murray (39 The Times L.R., 579; [1923] A.C. 566). My Lords, I think this is a mistake. The point in all the three cases was the same and was this. A partially incapacitated workman was paid compensation as such, he being employed in work that suited his incapacity; then in the war time the wages for that work rose beyond the figure which he had earned in pre-accident days and the compensation then ceased. Wages then fell and the question then was whether, the physical condition of the workman being unchanged, it was competent for the Court to revert to a payment of compensation. The present question was never raised. In my opinion the decision is summed up thus at page 577: "The right to receive compensation for partial incapacity then revives, and the amount due in respect thereof necessarily involves inquiry as to what the man is competent to earn."

A single sentence of the head-note is misleading; doubtless founded on the fact that in one of the cases the Second Division of the Court of Session had remitted to the arbitrator to determine compensation where the fact was established that the man could not find work, and that in my opinion I had said they had "rightly done so." But the present point was not before the House and was never argued.

My Lords, had I sat on an appeal against the Cardiff case (supra) in 1912 or 1913, I find it hard to say what my opinion would have been. I have always felt the strength of the argument that the words are not "able to work" but "able to earn," and that it is hard to say that a man is able to earn when there is no employment at which he can earn. But the present case is not in 1912, it is now. The application for arbitration bore to be made under the Act of 1925; but that is an error, for although the date of 1925 is passed yet section 50 of that Act says that it shall not apply in any case where the accident happened before the first day of January, 1924. But then there is the Act of 1923, and section 31, subsection (2), of that Act says that it is to be considered as one with the principal Act, to wit the Act of 1906. Now the Act of 1923 was passed in the knowledge that the interpretation of the original section was as stated, and section 16 of the Act of 1923 is as follows: "If a workman who has so far recovered from the injury as to be fit for employment of a certain kind proves to the satisfaction of the judge of the county court that he has taken all reasonable steps to obtain, and has failed to obtain, such employment, and that his failure to obtain such employment is a consequence, wholly or mainly, of the injury, the judge shall order that his incapacity shall, for the purposes of the principal Act, continue to be treated as total incapacity for such period, and subject to such conditions, as may be provided by the order, without prejudice, however, to the right of review conferred by paragraph (16) of the First Schedule to the principal Act:

"Provided that every such order shall be made subject to the condition that it shall cease to be in force if the workman receives unemployment benefit."

It may not be amiss to state, though it has not any real bearing on the argument, that this section is repeated totidem verbis in section 9 (4) of the Act of 1925, so that the decision in this case will rule cases arising under that Act.

My Lords, I am unable to resist the light thrown on the whole position by this section. It seems to me necessarily to exclude the idea that "able to earn" applies to any circumstances not personal to the man himself. It deals expressly with the case of the man who cannot find work and it sets the criterion whether the failure to find the work is due wholly or mainly to the accident. Here we are faced with the finding in fact that the failure to find work was due solely to the state of the labour market, but that state of affairs is expressly excluded by the section.

The appellant laid great stress on the fact that the accident had the effect of driving the appellant from one class of work to another. The case is actually dealt with by Lord Moulton in the opinion quoted. But as regards section 16 be it observed that that deals with fitness for employment of a certain kind, i.e., not his original employment. It is as regards that which I may call substituted employment that the criterion is put. I am, therefore, somewhat unwillingly driven to the conclusion that in face of section 16 it is impossible to say that the Cardiff case (supra), when applied to a case after the passing of the 1923 Act, is wrong.

I move that the appeal be dismissed with costs.

LORD SHAW.—My Lords, I have considered and reconsidered this case. If the judgment of the Court of Appeal stands then I do not entertain any doubt that it pro tanto defeats the main object of the Workmen's Compensation Acts, and it unduly and improperly reduces the scale of compensation awarded therein.

The case was tried before a most experienced County Court Judge whose statement discloses his conviction to the same effect, and further indicates that but for the Cardiff case (27 The Times L.R., 339; [1911] 1 K.B., 1009) he would have had no hesitation in awarding to the injured miner on the scale or footing of £1 instead of 5s. 3d. per week. That is to say, he could not have seen his way to hold that the injured collier, who was no longer fit by reason of the accident for work at the face, could be treated as able to earn the wages of a surface worker when in point of fact no such work was procurable by him. He was forced, however, by the state of the law, and particularly by the decision of the Cardiff case (supra), to give the smaller award.

When the case reached the Court of Appeal, the learned Judges similarly referred to the Cardiff case (supra), Lord Justice Lawrence doing so simpliciter, and Lord Justice Atkin refraining from expressing his individual opinion on the principle involved. Lord Hanworth, the Master of the Rolls, alone committed himself to the enunciation of doctrines similar to those pronounced in the case mentioned. I am of opinion that the Cardiff case (supra) was wrongly decided.

I hold further that this House is substantially committed by declaration here made to a similar opinion.

In the Cardiff case (supra) the Master of the Rolls, Sir Herbert Cozens-Hardy, dissented, and he founded his dissent upon powerful authority. The question, although difficult to answer, can be simply stated. Under the statute the measure of compensation to be awarded to an injured workman in respect of his injury is the difference between what he earned before the accident and "the average weekly amount which he is earning or is able to earn in some suitable employment or business after the accident."

In Clark v. Gas Light and Coke Company (21 The Times L.R., 184) a gasworks coal porter was injured, but the workman had physical capacity enough to be a gate-keeper or watchman, the duties of that employment not requiring the full use of an injured hand. It was also found that the man had made all reasonable efforts to get this light work and had been unable to get it and the arbitrator accordingly refused to reduce the compensation. An appeal against this refusal was dismissed: and Sir Richard Henn Collins, Master of the Rolls, dealt with the proposition as to what was meant by "being able to earn." "It was argued," said he, "that the question whether his opportunity of finding work from which he might earn the same wages had been narrowed in consequence of the accident ought not to be taken into consideration, the one and only question being as to his physical capacity for work. Here the applicant had made bona fide efforts to find such work as he was capable of doing and had failed. It was said that he must put up with such incapacity to get work without having recourse to his employers, and that all considerations of the existing conditions of the market must be shut out." That appeared to him to be contrary to common sense and not to be involved in the authorities, still less in the Act itself.

Founding upon this case and upon Proctor v. Robinson ([1911] 1 K.B., 1004), Sir Herbert Cozens-Hardy, in a passage bearing precisely upon the facts of the present case, puts the question as to "whether an employer, admittedly liable to pay compensation for an accident which disables the man from following his former occupation, can obtain an order for the termination or reduction of the compensation by merely proving physical ability to do light work without either offering to provide such work, or adducing some evidence that light work can be obtained in the neighbourhood where the man resides, and of a suitable character." "In my opinion apart from authority," says Sir Herbert Cozens-Hardy, "this question should be answered in the negative. The effects of the accident have not been removed, and I cannot think that the workman ought to have his compensation reduced merely on the ground that he is physically able to do a different kind of work, which, in truth, cannot be procured."

In my view these opinions of Sir Richard Henn Collins and Sir Herbert Cozens-Hardy correctly state the legal principle to be applied.

The majority of the Court of Appeal, however, consisting of Lords Justices Moulton and Buckley, were of a different opinion. Says the former at p. 1020 : "His" (the workman's) "position after the accident is that he has lost thereby the difference of earning power of a first-class fitter as compared with an ordinary fitter. But he has lost no more."

My Lords, I dissent from this view. The measure of damages given in the statute is not the difference of earning power but the difference in fact between what was earned in wages before the accident and what he is earning or is able to earn in wages. It is wages he has lost by reason of the accident. He has been displaced also by reason of the accident from a position in which de facto he did, and also de facto he could now, earn wages to a position in which he does not earn such wages and is not able to earn such wages. The learned Lord Justice proceeds to say that he cannot see why the employer should guarantee the state of the labour market for the workman so displaced.

There is no question of guarantee. The question is one of fact. The workman there, as in the present case, was displaced by reason of the accident from the region of employment into a region of unemployment. No guarantee is asked for the state of the labour market, but compensation is asked for the situation of the workman having been changed from a position in which wages were actually earned to a position in which, whether by the state of the labour market or for any other reason, wages cannot be obtained.

Lord Justice Buckley puts the question whether as a result of the accident he is under an incapacity for work which prevents him from being as eligible as he was before the accident for a place. This, in my opinion, does not correctly state the two factors of the comparison set down by the Act. These are, firstly, wages received before the accident and, secondly, wages not received after the accident. It is not a question of comparative eligibility, it is a question of difference in receipts—a money question. The learned Lord Justice adds at p. 1027 that the relevant proposition in compensation is that "The condition of the workman is such that his labour is not saleable or is saleable only at a reduced figure."

I do not think that this is at all a correct statement of the issue in a compensation case. It is not saleability of labour that is the factor of comparison set up by the Act ; that factor is the receipt of wages before and the receipt of wages after the accident. If the workman was put into the position by reason of the accident that his wages received were to be compared with what he was earning or able to earn in wages after the accident, it seems to me no solution of the problem to introduce the idea of the saleability of labour. Nor indeed, even if the phrase were employed, could the saleability of labour be introduced as a factor of comparison so as to cover the case of labour offered but not accepted by purchase. Until you have the latter operation there is no earning whatsoever. The learned Lord Justice's propositions are summed up when he says at p. 1027 : "The employer may be called an insurer of 'capacity for work,' but he is not an insurer of a 'right to work.'"

Again I think this analogy of insurance fails. It is true that "the Workmen's Compensation Act is not a Right to Work Act." No. It does not deal with a right to work ; it does not make that any standard of comparison as before and after an accident, but it does deal not with the right to work but with the power to earn wages, and it is that money comparison which makes the standard of compensation in money which the Act, I feel certain, meant to set up. For this reason I myself feel unable to accept the Cardiff case (supra) as setting forth a sound interpretation of the Act.

But, my Lords, I regret to observe that sufficient attention has not been paid to the decision of this House upon the question now again before it. The question at issue in this case is succinctly and accurately made to turn upon the words "is earning" or "is able to earn," and does the phrase "able to earn" mean and only mean "physically able to work although in fact unable to earn anything" ?

I refer in particular to the case of Ball v. Hunt and Sons, Limited (28 The Times L.R., 428 ; [1912] A.C., 496). The workman in that case lost the sight of an eye. He was unable to obtain work, being a one-eyed man, although his ability to work remained exactly as it was before. But the importance of the case is that it dealt with the general question of the introduction of the subject of labour conditions into such an issue. Lord Macnaghten put the matter thus at p. 501 : "As Lord Halsbury observed in the case of Lysons v. Andrew Knowles and Sons, Limited (17 The Times L.R., 156 ; [1901] A.C., 79), 'the first thing one has to do is to apply one's mind to what is the substantive intention and meaning of the statute.' It seems to me that the injury for which the statute gives compensation is not mutilation or disfigurement or loss of physical power, but loss or the diminution of the capacity to earn wages in the employment in which the injured workman was engaged at the time of the accident."

Lord Atkinson touches the exact point of this present case when he says at p. 505 : "There would be no meaning, it would appear to me, in these provisions making the amount of wages which were, are, or can be earned so much the basis of compensation, if the market for the workman's labour has to be left out of consideration. The earning of wages depends as much on the demand for the workman's labour as it does upon his physical ability to work."

It should be borne in mind that the case of Ball (supra) was the case in which the physical appearance of the man was so altered as to reduce his chance of employment, but it is to be borne in mind that the general question was also fully treated as those sentences show. In my own opinion I quote the case of Clark v. Gas Light and Coke Company (supra) with approval. But in Ball's case (supra), from which these citations are made, reference was made to the Scottish case of Boag v. Lochwood Collieries, Limited ([1910] S.C., 51), in which the Lord Justice-Clerk put the question thus:—

"Is it any reason for reviewing the payment to say that the employers cannot find him suitable work for his capacity, or that he has not been able to find such work himself? If the appellant means that his averments if proved would of themselves be a sufficient ground for saying that compensation must be increased to the full allowance under the statute, I should certainly not for myself yield for one moment to any such demand. I take it that the whole question is that of 'capacity to work,' which cannot be decided merely by the fact that the workman has not got work, but only by such evidence as satisfies the Court whether or not he is able to work."

My Lords, I pause here to observe that that is precisely the doctrine of the Cardiff case (supra). It is boldly and baldly stated. This is how I am reported as having dealt with it in Ball v. William Hunt and Sons, Limited (supra). "This is a particular affirmance of the proposition that incapacity under the Act must be limited to physical incapacity and to that alone. So stated, I think the proposition—with which I have already dealt at length in the earlier part of my opinion—to be an unsound proposition and the decision of Boag's case (supra) to be erroneous."

A decision in Macdonald v. Wilsons and Clyde Coal Company (28 The Times L.R., 431; [1912] A.C., 513) to the same effect was pronounced by this House in 1912 also to be erroneous.

My Lords, I now ask myself how the principles that are set forth by this House apply to the facts of the present case. It has been found by the learned arbitrator that but for the nystagmus the appellant would be getting work at the face and would be earning £2 13s. 2d. per week. The first factor of comparison is thus clear. From that field of work in which to-day, but for the accident, he would have been employed at the wage stated, he had been displaced by the accident. He has been unclassed from the field of work known as work at the face. He has been declassed into the field of work known as surface work. In that field of work it is not questioned that he cannot obtain employment. That is one of the outstanding features of the position. He has been unclassed from an employed field and declassed into an unemployed field. His employment at wages has been succeeded by unemployment and no wages. The cause for his change from the one position to the other is the accident. The compensation for that accident is to be measured by the difference between the one condition and the other.

The answer is: "Oh! He may not be earning now, but he is physically able to earn now." The question is what is he able to earn? He may be able to work, but is he able to earn? Does not earning mean something more than work? Earning means working for wages and getting wages; and when the statute says "or is able to earn" that means "or is able to work for and to get wages." This unfortunate workman by reason of the accident is not able to work for and get wages. Earning means earning wages; not earning approval or gratitude, but earning money. It is replied that he is physically able, to which the answer is, of what avail is physical power if a man is driven into a sphere where it cannot be exerted so as to produce wages? The comparison between ability to work does not follow his former ability to work or to work at the face. He has been physically disabled and he is a disabled man for face working who is now confronted with the task of trying to get work where there is none available. This position has been directly brought about by the accident and consequent disease.

It appears to me that the compensatory provision provided by the Acts of Parliament is by the Cardiff case (supra) and the present case improperly impaired. The learned arbitrator points out the hardships that will result if this be reckoned to be the state of the law, and the smoothness with which the other view can in accordance with fair dealing operate.

Finally, my Lords, I think it a mistake to conclude that the undoubted hardship under the Cardiff case (supra) was ever accepted by Parliament or that Parliament meant (1) to confirm and accentuate that hardship and (2) to set at nought the above quoted pronouncements in this House by the provisions of section 16 of the Act of 1923.

The question is: Has the appellant's failure to obtain employment as surface worker resulted wholly or mainly from the injury? I am clearly of opinion that it has. The injury drove him from the working face and his employment there. He was driven to an unemployed sphere of labour, to use the language of the Act, solely or mainly by the injury. As to that radical fact the opinion of the arbitrator is clear. He expressly finds "that but for the nystagmus from which he was suffering, the appellant would, since the 2nd December, 1926, have been employed as a collier and earning wages at least equal to his pre-accident wages."

It was argued that the arbitrator attributed his plight as workman solely to labour conditions. This is quite a mistake. The arbitrator's declaration is that in labour conditions applicable to surface work he cannot get employment as a surface labourer. But labour conditions did not drive him to that rank: he was driven into that rank by the accident alone. Labour conditions in the work of a miner at the face are admitted to be such as to give him work and wages as such. Disabled from that work and wages, not by labour conditions but by the accident, he is thrown into a rank in which labour conditions preclude him from earning wages. But these conditions only apply to surface work, not to the work from which he was driven. And it humbly appears to me that the reference to labour conditions of surface work imports nothing to the purpose of this case, for the man's grievance and loss are that he was, from the accident and the accident alone, excluded from a grade where no such adverse labour conditions exist to another in which they do exist. And it is only after this has happened, because of the accident and not because of any labour conditions, that he is put under the range of labour conditions which offer him no opening. I firmly but respectfully dissent.

Lord Phillimore.—My Lords, I find myself in agreement with the opinion which has been pronounced by the noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack. If the matter were res integra I should have been prepared to hold that the words "able to earn in some suitable employment or business" pointed to some personal capacity of the workman and not to the concomitant circumstances in which he might exercise that capacity. But the matter is not res integra. Unless the reasoning in the opposite direction compelled me I would not disturb the construction which has been put upon these words since the case of Cardiff Corporation v. Hall (27 The Times L.R., 339; [1911] 1 K.B., 1009) was decided in 1911. I do not think that there has been any discontinuity in the series of cases which have been decided since. In fact, the only suggestion to the contrary is derived from an obiter expression of the noble Lord now on the Woolsack which he has explained, as it seems to me correctly, in the opinion which he has just delivered. In Ball v. Hunt and Sons, Limited (28 The Times L.R., 428; [1912] A.C., 496) it was the physical injury which prevented the man from earning money, though that disability was not a disability for work if he could find employment, but one which made him less presentable and therefore less likely to be employed.

But the matter does not rest here. The legislation of 1923, for which the Consolidation Act of 1925 is now substituted, appears to me to recognize the correctness of the decision in Cardiff Corporation v. Hall (supra) as defining the law as it then stood and to make such amendment of the law as later experience has shown to be desirable, and the workman who claims relief must bring himself within the terms of section 9, subsection 3, of the Act of 1925.

LORD CARSON.—My Lords, the Court of Appeal felt bound to follow the decision in the case of Cardiff Corporation v. Hall (27 The Times L.R., 339 ; [1911] 1 K.B., 1009). That case had been fully discussed and considered by that Court as recently as the year 1927 in the case of Lewis v. Guest, Keen and Nettlefold, Limited (43 The Times L.R., 436 ; [1928] 1 K.B., 20) where the same argument as we have listened to in this case was put forward, viz., that having regard to the decisions of Heathcote v. Haunchwood Collieries Co., Limited ([1918] A.C., 52), Woodilee Coal and Coke Company v. M'Neill (34 The Times L.R., 10 ; [1918] A.C., 43), and Portland Colliery Co., Limited v. Murray (39 The Times L.R., 579 ; [1923] A.C., 566)—all decisions of this House—the Cardiff case (supra) could no longer be considered law. The Court of Appeal refused to accept this view, and with that conclusion I entirely agree, and in my opinion there is nothing in any of the decisions expressed in your Lordships' House which prevents us from treating the Cardiff case (supra) as correct. On the other hand, I cannot read the judgments of Lord Loreburn and Lord Shaw in Ball v. Hunt and Sons, Limited (28 The Times L.R., 428 ; [1912] A.C., 496) without coming to the conclusion that these noble and learned Lords at least approved of the decision. For my own part I would like to say that I do not, even if it is open to do so, for a moment question the soundness of the decision of the majority in the Cardiff case (supra). It is unnecessary to go into the reasoning of the learned Judges who decided that case in detail, but in my opinion to construe the words "is earning or is able to earn" as creating a liability on behalf of the employer to guarantee work in the case of partial incapacity would be to add provisions of insurance to the Schedule which are not deducible from the language used. But, my Lords, it is unnecessary to pursue this consideration further having regard to the argument addressed to your Lordships by the learned counsel for the respondents arising out of the provisions of the Act of 1923 already quoted. This argument was not considered by the Court of Appeal, as counsel for the respondents were not called upon. Although, holding the views I have already expressed about the Cardiff case (supra), it is unnecessary to go further into this argument, I would like to add that I entirely agree with the noble Viscount on the Woolsack that section 16 of the Act of 1923 seems "necessarily to exclude the idea that 'able to earn' applies to any circumstances not personal to the man himself." I should like also to point out that so far as has been suggested to us it is in this section for the first time that failure to obtain employment is incorporated as an ingredient in making a claim in such a case, and this goes far to show that such or a similar condition is not to be deduced from the language of clause 3 of the first Schedule. My Lords, I agree that this appeal should be dismissed with costs.

LORD BLANESBURGH (read by Lord Shaw of Dunfermline).—My Lords, the facts upon which the claim of the appellant here must rest may be conveniently stated in serial form. So presented they seem to be exceptionally striking. Rarely in such a case are the findings so clear.

1. The appellant's employment at the respondents' collieries was that of a collier or hewer at the coal face—a well-known branch of skilled labour with its own rules of working and its own rates of pay.

2. The appellant in April, 1919, was certified to be suffering from miner's nystagmus, one of the diseases to which the Workmen's Compensation Acts apply. The date of his disablement was the 19th April, 1919. His "incapacity for work" then commenced.

3. That expression as used in the Act of 1906, expanded, as it must be, by interpretation, means the inability of the disabled workman to earn wages by the work at which he was employed at the date of disablement. See per Lord Macnaghten in Ball v. Hunt and Sons, Limited (28 The Times L.R., 428 ; [1912] A.C., 496, at p. 500). It follows that it is in respect of this incapacity as so defined and none other that the appellant is entitled, under the statute, to receive compensation.

4. From the date of his disablement down to the hearing of the reference the appellant's "incapacity for work" in this sense had been complete. For him work at the face had been out of the question, and that solely as a result of his disablement. The appellant "but for his nystagmus from which he suffered would have been employed . . . as a collier earning at least his pre-war wages" of £2 13s. 2d. a week. Such is the finding of the learned arbitrator.

5. It is implicit in that finding and it is not disputed that since the termination of the coal strike on December 2, 1926, there was neither labour trouble nor economic stringency effective to interrupt the appellant's employment at his old work had his disablement permitted him to continue it.

6. This, however, has not been the case in relation to the only work which since his disablement the appellant has been capable of doing, namely, surface work—a branch of unskilled labour as well defined as is working at the face a well defined branch of skilled labour. The appellant would have taken and would take any surface work if he could get it. But none such, owing solely to labour conditions affecting the market for this class of unskilled worker, has been available for or obtainable by him. As a consequence the appellant at the time of the reference had, since the 2nd December, 1926, been idle altogether. His "capacity for work" in the statutory sense had been destroyed entirely ; and no suitable work of any other kind was available for him, willing as he was to do it if it had been.

7. It is agreed that were he able to find employment as such the wages of the appellant as a surface worker would be £2 2s. 8d. a week.

There is not to be found in the Cardiff case (27 The Times L.R., 339 ; [1911] 1 K.B., 1009), so frequently already referred to, the clearly cut divergence in labour conditions which is to be found here as affecting the workman's former work and that to which he was relegated by his disability, and it may well be doubted whether upon facts which, as in the present case, invest the true meaning of the words "incapacity for work" with a decisive significance, much that was said in the Cardiff case (supra) would have been said at all. On the above facts as found, however, the learned arbitrator conceiving, and most probably rightly, that to them the Cardiff case (supra) applied, and that he was thereby required to charge the appellant in account with the receipt in each week of the above £2 2s. 8d. —although in fact the man had received nothing and had no expectation of receiving anything from surface work—held that the maximum compensation that could be awarded to the appellant was 5s. 3d. a week—the half, to a ½d., of the difference between the two sums of £2 13s. 2d. and £2 2s. 8d. And this was the amount actually awarded. But the learned arbitrator intimated that if he had not been prevented by a decision of the Court of Appeal—Lewis v. Guest, Keen and Nettlefold, Limited (43 The Times L.R., 486; [1928] 1 K.B., 20)—from giving effect to his own opinion that the Cardiff case (supra) was no longer law, his award in favour of the appellant would have been one for £1 a week. The award actually made having been upheld by the Court of Appeal, the first question now—it was originally the only question on the appeal—is whether in the Cardiff case (supra) the majority of the Court—Lords Justices Moulton and Buckley—were right when in effect they held that the statute precluded an arbitrator in such circumstances as have been found here from making any higher award than that which is now in question.

The answer depends entirely upon the meaning to be attributed to the words "able to earn" in the 3rd clause of the First Schedule to the Act of 1906, already under your Lordships' notice. Do these words refer to the average weekly amount which the disabled workman can earn if he cares and tries or do they extend to and include the amount which he is physically fitted to earn in some suitable work, irrespectively altogether of the question whether such work is available for him or not?

My Lords, all concerned have again and again been warned by this House that the language of this statute must be read fairly, taking the words in their common and ordinary signification. So reading this paragraph I cannot think that its meaning is difficult to discover. This portion of it is dealing with cases of partial incapacity—cases, that is to say, of disabled workmen who either may not be altogether unfitted for their old work or who, if they are, may still remain able to do work of some other kind. And as it is no part of the scheme of the Act that the injured worker, only partially disabled, is to remain in idleness at his employer's expense and is not, as against the maximum compensation provided, to be charged with his actual or potential earnings during his period of disability, the arbitrator is directed "to ascertain the average weekly amount which he is earning or is able to earn in some suitable employment or business," that is, the actual fact, if he is earning, or, if he is not earning, an estimate of what he is able to earn. See per Lord Justice Farwell in Bevan v. Energlyn Colliery Company (28 The Times L.R., 27; [1912] 1 K.B., 63, at p. 72). And the reason for the alternative form is given by Lord Dunedin in Heathcote v. Haunchwood Collieries Co., Limited ([1918] A.C., 52, at p. 56), where he explains that it is thereby open to the employer who objects to the figure of actual earnings being taken to urge and show that the amount which the claimant is earning is not really what he might earn if he were to take proper steps to get the most remunerative employment he could find.

It will be noted that there is not there nor is there in the paragraph itself a word to suggest that, even by way of estimate, is the workman to be charged with the "average" earnings of any employment or business however "suitable" if neither the employment nor the business was open to him. To my mind, indeed, the fact that it is only with his "average" earnings in "some" "suitable" employment or business that the claimant is by estimate to be charged, shows, if the whole frame and purpose of the clause do not already proclaim it, that there must not only be ability to do the work but an opportunity of getting it, if, in respect of earnings therefrom, the workman is to be charged by way of estimate with any receipt at all.

Mr. Cave did not suggest that the absence of opportunity could never be effectively set up by a workman sought to be charged with earnings not in fact obtainable. He agreed, as I understood him, that the appellant here could not have been charged with such earnings, if there had not been in the district in which he lived or in one to which he would naturally go, an established outlet for surface labour. The rule in the Cardiff case (supra) had no application to a case where the inability to secure employment in a lower grade was due to the fact that there was no market for such work available to the workman. The assigned reason for that rule made this clear. It is applicable only for the reason that the employer "does not guarantee the state of the labour market" or, as it was put by Lord Justice Buckley, because while the employer under the Act may be called an insurer of "capacity to work," he is not an insurer of a "right to work."

Here then is disclosed the ratio decidendi of the Cardiff case (supra), and with the disclosure is revealed, as I believe, the fallacy which underlies it.

In what connexion, under this statute, is the statement true that the employer does not guarantee the state of the labour market? Surely, only in this, that as liability to unemployment is a feature of all industrial labour a workman has no right to be placed in this respect by means of compensation in a more favourable position after the accident than he would have been in if he had never met with it. Accordingly the Courts have held that a workman is not entitled to compensation for unemployment due to fluctuations of trade. But, ex necessitate rei, these fluctuations must be and are confined to fluctuations in the demand for "the work in which the injured workman was employed at the time of the accident"—to use again Lord Macnaghten's words in Ball v. Hunt and Sons, Limited (supra). Such fluctuations, when they appear in the grade to which the workman is reduced, as a result of the accident, have merely, so far as the statute is concerned, the effect—truly as potent as the worker's actual disability for the work—of preventing him from earning anything in that otherwise "suitable" employment.

Lord Justice Moulton, in the Cardiff case (supra), evidently felt this difficulty, and he sought to meet it by his illustration of the case of the first-class fitter which, as it has already been quoted, I need not again transcribe. But if the Lord Justice had had the advantage we enjoy of Lord Macnaghten's explanation of the phrase "incapacity for work" he could not have said, as in the passage referred to he did say, that all that his first-class fitter had lost as a result of the accident was the difference of earning power of a first-class fitter as compared with an ordinary fitter. Moreover, he would have found a very good reason why his first-class fitter's chance of obtaining employment or his power of earning wages should be treated as different from that of a man who had all his life been an average fitter. Nor could his final statement with reference to the employer's guarantee of the labour market have been made. If the Lord Justice had realized what Lord Macnaghten's subsequent judgment discloses, that it was his fitter's incapacity for work as a first-class fitter that was the concern of the statute; that it was for his loss of wages in that work and for nothing else that he was entitled to compensation; that the average earnings from "suitable" work with which his fitter might, in certain circumstances, be charged was work suitable not to a second-class fitter but to a first-class fitter, the Lord Justice must, as I think, have realized that his illustration, with his judgment founded upon it, disappeared.

At any rate, I reach the conclusion that the judgment of the majority of the Court in the Cardiff case (supra) was—certainly as applied to a case like the present, where trade depression affected the "suitable" employment only—erroneous, and that the correct decision was that enunciated by the Master of the Rolls at p. 1014 in words applicable also to the present case : "I cannot think that the workman ought to have his compensation reduced merely on the ground that he is physically able to do a different kind of work, which, in truth, cannot be procured." And this brings me to the second question raised on the appeal, namely whether the insertion of section 16 in the Act of 1923 is not the equivalent of a legislative recognition that the principle of the Cardiff case (supra) now applies to clause 3 of the First Schedule.

My Lords, this question has never before been raised in any case. It is raised now, and, in your Lordships' House too, for the first time. It is true that the respondents, not having been called upon in the Court of Appeal, had no opportunity of raising it there. But they might have taken the point in their printed case and they did not. It was, for the first time, sprung by Mr. Cave upon the House, and, I suspect, also upon the appellant, in the opening speech for the respondents. In the result your Lordships are called upon to decide a question of far-reaching importance unassisted either by the views of the Court of Appeal upon it or by any fully matured reply of the learned counsel for the appellant. In these circumstances I have considered the point so raised as carefully as I could and I have reached the conclusion, with real misgiving due to the fact that it is not the conclusion of all your Lordships, that the point now taken is not tenable.

First of all, my Lords, I would observe that it is not lightly to be assumed that the legislature would accept in such a "workmen's" Act as that of 1923 a principle which bears so heavily, and so illogically, upon the workman as that of the Cardiff decision (supra) when applied to a case like the present. Even if the view of the learned arbitrator was mistaken as to the Cardiff case (supra) it is, nevertheless, I think, difficult for that case and those cases to which he refers to live quite comfortably together, and it cannot, I believe, in any sense be affirmed that the views of the majority in the Cardiff case (supra), as contrasted with those of the then Master of the Rolls, have ever commanded general acceptance. If this judgment has anything to be said for it, they did not deserve to do so. It is true that the Cardiff case (supra) has been not infrequently cited, but it has usually been referred to for Lord Justice Moulton's observations on the "odd lot," and any approval of the case subsequently expressed has been mainly of these observations. When not cited its principle has been more than once ignored.

But approaching now the point more closely it is clear first of all that section 16 was enacted alio intuitu. It has been held that the section was passed for the relief and advantage of the workman and has not the effect of depriving him of any rights that he had previously possessed, Clarke v. United Steel Companies, Limited (18 B.W.C.C., 525), Crossley Bros., Limited v. Brunyee (18 B.W.C.C., 320, at p. 325). Its main innovation is contained in the words "wholly or mainly" and it has by these words done two things. It has modified the previous rule that an arbitrator could not give compensation on the footing of total incapacity unless the workman could show that his failure to obtain employment was due wholly to his injury. It did, however, something much more immediately beneficial. By enabling, in certain cases, partial incapacity to be treated as total, the section preserved in being for the benefit of these cases, in respect of an accident occurring on or before December 31, 1903, the provisions of the Workmen's Compensation (War Additions) Acts which otherwise as to them would have been repealed by the Act of 1923.

But further, the section does not, in fact, even for its own purposes, embody the principle of the Cardiff case (supra). It requires the applicant to prove that his failure to obtain employment was a consequence "wholly or mainly" of the injury. Under the principle of the Cardiff case (supra) it was never necessary for the workman, in order to escape from its application to him, to show more than that his failure to obtain employment in suitable work was to some extent a consequence of the injury.

And, finally, and perhaps most important of all, let this be said. As a result of the Act of 1923, the new section, with the First Schedule to the Act of 1906, is now found in the same statute—clause 3 of the Schedule—quite unaltered. The section and the clause deal with different matters in quite different words, and while, so far as the section is concerned, common sense would seem to require that before a workman can be treated, even in a statute, as retaining a status of total incapacity, his failure to obtain employment should be attributable at least "mainly" to his injury, there is no reason, either in common sense or otherwise, why in order that an employer should remain liable to compensate a workman is respect of his "incapacity for work" it should be necessary for more to be shown than that other suitable work is not obtainable. In other words, neither in principle nor in outlook nor in result is there any connexion at all between the section and the clause.

In my judgment, therefore, this new and ingenious suggestion—the first and true invention, I cannot doubt, of the respondents' advisers—fails them on examination.

On the whole case I would be for allowing the appeal.

LAWRENCE v. GEORGE MATTHEWS (1924), LIMITED.*

Master and Servant—Compensation for injury by accident—Commercial traveller killed by falling tree while cycling on employers' business—Accident arising "out of . . . the employment."

A commercial traveller, motor-cycling along a road in the course of his employment, was struck by a falling tree and killed. The fall of the tree was caused by a violent wind which was blowing at the time. Compensation was awarded to the widow. On an appeal upon the ground that the accident occurred by reason of the gale, and did not arise out of his employment,

Held, by Sankey and Russell, L.JJ. (Lord Hanworth, M.R., dissenting), that as the deceased's employment brought him into a zone of danger the accident arose out of that employment, and the question what caused the fall of the tree was immaterial and irrelevant.

This was an appeal from a decision of the Judge of the Wolverhampton County Court, sitting as arbitrator under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1925.

The following statement of facts is taken from the judgment of Lord Hanworth, M.R.

By an award dated May 25, 1928, the County Court Judge, sitting at Wolverhampton, decided in favour of the applicant, the widow of Victor Allen Lawrence, claiming as a dependant upon her husband who died on November 2, 1927, as the result of an accident.

Victor Allen Lawrence was a commercial traveller, and by an agreement made between him and George Matthews (1924), Limited, on February 11, 1927, he agreed to devote his whole time to the service of, and to use his best endeavours to obtain orders for, and promote the interests of, that company within the counties of Salop, Stafford, Chester, Worcester, and Hereford.

Lawrence was paid by a commission on orders introduced to the company and accepted by them, and he had to defray his own travelling expenses. Although the company did not prescribe his journeys, he travelled to the knowledge of the company on a motor-cycle with a side-car. He was engaged upon his duties as such traveller on October 28, 1927, and, while returning by road—apparently homewards—from a journey on which he had secured at least one order for the company, he was struck by a falling tree blown down by a severe gale which swept the district on that evening, and was so seriously injured that he died, as already stated.

Several points were taken by the employers at the arbitration. The Judge decided in the widow's favour that the deceased was a workman within the Act, that she was a dependant, and that the accident arose out of and in the course of his employment.

The appeal is taken on the one point, which was argued before this Court—namely, that the accident did not arise out of his employment.

The evidence proved that the employers did not interfere with or direct the deceased's journeys—he went on his business in his own way and at his own times. The County Court Judge held that the deceased died from an accident which, if not ordinary in the sense that it occurs every day, yet is not infrequent, and is the kind of accident to which anyone who travels on the road is exposed. He decided that it arose out of and in the course of the employment, and awarded compensation as stated.

The employers appealed.

Mr. Cave, K.C., and Mr. Collingwood, for the employers, contended that the accident arose purely and simply from the gale. It was not an ordinary risk of the highway and had nothing to do with the employment. Any person along the road might have met a similar piece of bad luck. It was something altogether outside the ordinary risks of a commercial traveller.

Mr. Edgar Dale and Mr. H. A. Tucker, for the applicant, submitted that the test governing these cases was whether the employment brought the deceased into the zone of danger. It was not easy to divide risks into exact categories. Whether a risk might or might not be expected, the test was whether it was incurred by reason of the employment.

Their Lordships reserved their decision, and delivered the following written judgments:—

The appellants claim that the accident was due to the forces of nature, and not to any duty, or obligation, or cause incidental to the employment, and that there was no evidence upon which the Judge could hold that it arose out of his employment.

There are a number of cases in which it appears to have been decided that employers are not liable to their workmen for accidents due to extraneous forces, unless the employment exposed the workman specially to risk, or placed him under a disability by depriving him of the means of protection from, or avoidance of, the dangers.

Thus in Kelly v. Kerry County Council (1 B.W.C.C., 194)—the case of a workman whose duty it was to clear out gullies, and who, while so engaged, was struck by lightning—it was held that his death was not occasioned by an accident arising out of his employment. But it was held otherwise in Andrew v. Failsworth Industrial Society, Limited (20 The Times L.R., 429; [1904] 2 K.B., 32), where a man was struck by lightning when engaged upon a scaffold in laying bricks at a height of over twenty feet from the ground. So in Knyvett v. Wilkinson Bros., Limited (87 L.J., K.B., 722), where a man was in course of his duty collecting debts, and was killed by a bomb from an enemy aircraft, in the street, that case was decided not to be within the Act; and a similar result was reached in Allcock v. Rogers (34 The Times L.R., 324; 11 B.W.C.C., 149) in the case of a potman killed by a bomb while cleaning a brass plate on a door in the street, for there was no evidence of any special danger attaching to the spot where the man was told to work. Then in George Anderson and Co. (1905), Ltd. v. Adamson (6 B.W.C.C., 874), in the case of a man who was placed by his work at a disadvantage in protecting himself, it was held that there was evidence to support a finding in favour of the workman.

In Allcock v. Rogers (supra) it is recognized that if a workman is called by his duty to face street risks he is protected by the Act if the accident arises from such risks—such as collisions—as indeed was decided in Dennis v. White and Co. (33 The Times L.R., 434; [1917] A.C., 479). Slipping on ice on the pavement while walking along it in the course of duty has been similarly accepted as giving a right to compensation —White v. W. and T. Avery, Limited (9 B.W.C.C., 663).

In Allcock v. Rogers (supra) Lord Wrenbury propounds a test. He says (11 B.W.C.C., at p. 153): "In the course of his employment this man was in a certain place. Was there any evidence that it was a dangerous place? For the present purpose a dangerous place is a place which as a place is dangerous, a place which has some quality which results in danger—for instance, that an insecure wall, which may fall, exists there." Applying the above rules to the case before them the House of Lords negatived the right of the potman to recover while in the street cleaning a brass plate.

In the present case it would seem that there was no evidence that the injury suffered by the deceased was by an accident arising out of his employment, for it cannot be surmised in general that passing along a road involves a general risk of falling trees. Such an incident can occur, but only if the forces of nature are exercised upon the tree, and to such a mishap all persons in the locality are liable. Earl Loreburn, L.C., in Warner v. Couchman (28 The Times L.R., 58 ; [1912] A.C., 35, at p. 37), quoted with approval the following passage from the judgment of Lord Justice Fletcher Moulton in the same case in the Court of Appeal (27 The Times L.R., 121 ; [1911] 1 K.B., 351, at p. 357): "When we deal with the effect of natural causes affecting a considerable area, such as severe weather, we are entitled and bound to consider whether the accident arose out of the employment, or was merely a consequence of the severity of the weather to which persons in the locality, and whether so employed or not, were equally liable. If it is the latter it does not arise out of the employment."

Again (see per Lord Wrenbury in Allcock v. Rogers, supra), there is in the present case no evidence that the road where the accident occurred had any quality which made it more dangerous than any other place, unless the presence of trees adjacent to the road is to be deemed a standing danger. The only evidence was that danger resulted in the place, but not that it resulted from any danger connected with the road as a road.

To revert to Dennis v. White and Co. (supra), that decision appears to have turned upon this: that the boy was directed to go on a bicycle to fetch some plaster—the errand and the mode of executing, it were directed by his employers. "As soon as it is established that the work itself involves exposure to the perils of the streets the workman can recover for any injury so occasioned." See per Lord Finlay, L.C. ([1917] A.C., at p. 482). He adds that there are cases in which it is necessary to inquire whether the nature of the employment specially exposes a workman to a risk of a general nature. Where the risk is one shared by all men, whether in or out of the employment, in order to show that the accident arose out of the employment it must be established that special exposure to it is involved. In his closer application of that principle to the case before him Lord Finlay adds ([1917] A.C., at p. 482) : "But when a workman is sent into the street on his master's business, whether it be occasionally or habitually, his employment necessarily involves exposure to the risks of the streets, and injury from such a cause arises out of his employment."

Lord Parker ([1917] A.C., at p. 492), dealing with this class of cases, says that the contrast is between persons engaged in the particular employment, or under the particular circumstances, and persons not so employed or not so employed under the same circumstances.

Now in the present case Lawrence chose his own means of locomotion. He might have gone by train, or in some cases in a horse vehicle, or walked. I cannot find any evidence that he was directed to travel in a manner that necessarily exposed him to this risk.

Applying the reasoning in the speeches of the learned Lords in Dennis v. White and Co. (supra) it appears to differentiate the present case from the one before them. Owing to the manner, method, and time of transit, which Lawrence himself selected, he chanced to be on this road where, owing to the forces of nature which happened to be expended on the tree, he was involved in its fall and suffered injuries ; but there appears to be lacking any direction by his employers which caused him to be where he was at that moment.

Dennis v. White and Company (supra) was decided in June, 1917, after Thom or Simpson v. Sinclair (33 The Times L.R., 247 ; [1917] A.C., 127) (March, 1917), which is referred to in the Lord Chancellor's speech in Dennis v. White and Company (supra). The latter case, therefore, must be taken to embody the principles laid down in Thom or Simpson v. Sinclair (supra). The workgirl was obliged by the conditions of her employment to be in a particular building, which as a place was dangerous and subjected her to the risk of the particular accident that befell her. Certain principles are stated by Lord Haldane for guidance as to the interpretation of the Act.

He holds that the doctrine whereby it is said that an injury by accident arises out of the employment, if injury has been inflicted on the workman by any accident, such as something falling upon him, which would not have happened to him if his employment had not caused him to be in the place at which the accident occurred at the time of its occurrence, the place and time having thus been conditions of the result brought into existence by the employment, is too vague.

He says that a further condition seems to be required: a condition that the injury should have arisen, not merely by reason of presence in a particular spot at a particular time, but because of some special circumstance attending the employment of the workman there—in other words, his duty calling him there.

In his conclusion upon the facts of the case before him Lord Haldane said in Thom or Simpson v. Sinclair (supra), at p. 136: "It is enough that by the terms of her employment the appellant had to work in this particular shed and was in consequence injured by an accident which happened to the roof of the shed." Lord Shaw says (at p. 142) that the expression "'arising out of the employment' applies to the employment as such—to its nature, its conditions, its obligations, and its incidents. If by reason of any of these the workman is brought within the zone of special danger and so injured or killed, it appears to me that the broad words of the statute, 'arising out of the employment,' apply."

Once more testing the facts of the present case by the above rules, I do not find it possible to hold that Lawrence met with this accident by reason of any of the four facets of his employment above stated.

The cases of Upton v. Great Central Railway Company (40 The Times L.R., 204 ; [1924] A.C., 302), where the workman was sent from station "A" to station "B" to do some work, and on his return journey met with an accident at station "B"; and Dennis v. White and Company (supra), where the boy was sent on an errand on his bicycle in the streets, both contain a direction from the employers which is absent in the present case. Lawrence was where he was because of his own free-will. He laid out his plans and methods and times as he pleased. He rode homewards—if that is the right inference—when he did, and by the route that he selected, not under any orders of his employers. He was not acting in execution of any particular duty. If liability for the accident is laid upon his employers they would be rendered his insurers against almost any personal accident which he might incur during the whole subsistence of the agreement of February 11, 1927, except during such time as he was actually within his own curtilage.

Upon the question whether the point under discussion is one of fact or law, I think the observations of Lord Finlay, L.C., in Dennis v. White and Company ([1917] A.C., at p. 489) are conclusive. The question is whether, on the facts proved and recorded by the County Court Judge, the accident arose out of the employment. The Lord Chancellor adds that this is not a question of fact but of law. This Court can therefore review the conclusion of the County Court Judge, and, in my judgment, ought to do so. I must add that I have found the case a very difficult one, and have hesitated long in coming to the above conclusion ; more especially as I am not in accord with my colleagues. But I feel bound to express my opinion as above because of the absence of any direction or duty chargeable to the employers. On all other points, and on their general view of the law and the decisions, I am in agreement with them.

Quite early in the case-law on the subject two lines of authority began to emerge, among many others ; the first being where the personal injury to the workman was caused by an accident resulting from the forces of nature, the second being where the personal injury arose from the ordinary risks incurred by the workman when in a street or public place. With regard to the first of these cases—namely, accidents arising from the forces of nature—the rule appears to have been established that to enable the workman or his dependents to succeed it was necessary to prove that the position in which he was in the course of his employment subjected him to more than an ordinary risk of being injured.

This rule was established in the English, Irish, and Scottish Courts of Appeal in what may be conveniently classified as the lightning or heat cases, for example, in the English Court of Appeal in Andrew v. Failsworth Industrial Society, Limited (20 The Times L.R., 429 ; [1904] 2 K.B., 32), where the man was struck by lightning while working in a place where he was subject to more than an ordinary risk of being struck ; a similar case would be that of a steeplejack at the top of a steeple in a storm. The converse case, where the doctrine was established in the Irish Court of Appeal, was Kelly v. Kerry County Council (1 B.W.C.C., 194), where it was held that the workman in question, who was struck by lightning, was not in a position where he was subjected to more than an ordinary risk of being struck.

In the Scottish Court of Appeal there was the case of Robson, Eckford and Company, Limited v. Blakey (5 B.W.C.C., 536), where the bending position in which the workman was at the time when he was seized with heat apoplexy rendered him more liable in hot weather to be so seized. The liability for accidents arising from the ordinary risk of the streets and public places proceeds upon the ground that, where in the course of the man's employment he has to incur the risk of such accidents, personal injury caused by them arises out of his employment. This was the effect of the decision of the House of Lords in Dennis v. White and Company (33 The Times L.R., 434 ; [1917] A.C., 479).

Lord Finlay, L.C., says ([1917] A.C., at p. 482): "Where the risk is one shared by all men, whether in or out of employment, in order to show that the accident arose out of the employment it must be established that special exposure to it is involved. But when a workman is sent into the street on his master's business, whether it be occasionally or habitually, his employment necessarily involves exposure to the risks of the streets and injury from such a cause arises out of his employment. There is nothing in the Act about any necessity for showing that the employment involves an extra or special risk, and once it is clear, as it is in the present case, that the accident was the result of a risk necessarily incidental to the performance of the servant's work, all inquiry as to the frequency or magnitude of the risk is irrelevant. It is quite immaterial whether the nature of the employment involves continuous or only occasional exposure to the dangers of the streets. The frequency of the exposure to a risk increases the chance of the occurrence of an accident, but it has no bearing on the question whether it arose out of the employment, which is settled by the fact that such exposure was one of its terms, whether on many occasions or on one."

The lines and the reasons upon which all these decisions proceed are fairly clear, and, if one had to look to this class of decisions only, there might be a difficulty in supporting the judgment of the learned Judge in saying that the accident arose out of the employment of the deceased in this case ; for it is not easy to say that there was any evidence which showed that he was subjected to more than an ordinary risk of being struck by the falling tree. The difficulty in the present case is that it partakes in some measure of both classes of case above referred to—that is to say, that to some extent the street accident cases, and to some extent the forces of nature cases, apply to it. The principles applicable to it may to some extent be deduced from the case of Thom or Simpson v. Sinclair (33 The Times L.R., 247 ; [1917] A.C., 127).

That case was decided by the House of Lords on March 8, 1917, while Dennis v. White and Company (supra) was decided by the House of Lords on June 14, 1917. It appears to me that it made some modification in the reasoning and would probably have caused some difference in the results of cases decided previously to it.

With regard to the forces of nature cases, Lord Haldane in Thom's case (supra) seems to draw a distinction between an accident which arises directly, say, for the sake of example, from a stroke of lightning, and indirectly, in this sense that the stroke of lightning brings about a collapse of a wall which falls upon, and so causes the personal injury to, the workman. He says ([1917] A.C., at p. 136) : "Whether the remoter cause of the roof falling was the collapse of a neighbouring wall, or the falling down of some high adjacent building, or a stroke of lightning, seems to me immaterial in the light of this construction. It is enough that by the terms of her employment the appellant had to work in this particular shed and was in consequence injured by an accident which happened to the roof of the shed. The accident is one arising out of the employment not the less if ultimately caused by the fall of someone else's wall than if it had been caused by inherent weakness of the employer's roof."

With regard to the street accident cases the decision emphasizes the importance of locality in considering whether the accident arose in the course of a man's employment. Earlier in his judgment Lord Haldane says ([1917] A.C., at p. 134): "But where a man is ordered to work under a particular roof and that roof falls in on him, it is not clear that the accident belongs to that category. If the particular accident would not have happened to him had he not been employed to work under the particular roof, there seems to be nothing in the language of the Act which precludes an occurrence from being held within it which satisfies the test proposed by the first of the alternative constructions modified to the extent I have suggested. The falling of the particular roof could only happen in one place, and the presence there of the person injured was due to the employment. The question really turns on the character of the causation through the employment which is required by the words 'arising out of.' Now it is to be observed that it is the employment which is pointed to as to be the distinctive cause, and not any particular kind of physical occurrence. The condition is that the employment is to give rise to the circumstance of injury by accident. If, therefore, the statute when read as a whole excludes the necessity of looking for remoter causes, such as some failure in duty on the part of the employer as a condition of his liability, and treats him rather as in a position analogous to that of a mere insurer, the question becomes a simple one. Has the accident arisen because the claimant was employed in the particular spot on which the roof fell? If so, the accident had arisen out of his employment, and there is no necessity to go back in the search for causes to anything more remote than the immediate event, the mere fall of the roof, and there need be no other connexion between what happened and the nature of the work in which the injured person was engaged."

Again Lord Shaw says ([1917] A.C., at p. 144): "My Lords, the cases above cited, nine in number, are in truth all what might be termed 'location' cases, and, although there is much variety of expression by the learned Judges, I think that they form a body of authority in support of the construction of the statute which your Lordships are now sanctioning. In each and all it was because of the nature, conditions, obligations, or incidents of the employment by which the workman was brought within the zone of special danger that injury by accident was pronounced to have arisen out of the employment."

And Lord Parmoor says ([1917] A.C., at p. 145): "The fact that the risk may be common to all mankind does not disentitle a workman to compensation if in the particular case it arises out of the employment. Any stranger walking along a road in a mine may be exposed to the risk of an accidental fall of coal, but this does not affect the claim of a miner who in the course of his duty, or to obtain access to his work, is unfortunately injured by such fall."

The view of the House of Lords in Thom's case (supra) may be summed up as follows: Where death or personal injury results directly from the operation of natural forces—e.g., lightning—the dependents of a workman must show that the workman was specially exposed to such forces. Where the death or personal injury does not directly result from natural forces but from a cause which is induced by some natural force—e.g., where lightning knocks down a wall or a storm blows down a tree, and the wall or tree, as the case may be, causes personal injury at any place to the workman—he is entitled to recover if he was at the time when he suffered the injury at the place during the course of his employment.

Applying these cases, I think it may be difficult to divide the question for determination into two watertight compartments, but, having regard to the fact that the tree fell upon the deceased I do not think it is necessary to go into the remoter question what caused the tree to fall upon him, and, having regard to the fact that the incidence of the man's employment brought him within the zone of special danger, I am of opinion that the Judge was right in finding that the accident arose out of and in the course of the employment, and that the appeal should be dismissed.

I need hardly say that I have reached this conclusion with great diffidence as my Lord, the Master of the Rolls, holds a contrary opinion, but I think we do not differ on the principles to be applied; his view is that there was no evidence upon which the County Court Judge could find as he did.

The point whether the accident arose out of the employment, in view of the various authorities, occasions much difficulty. For an accident to arise out of the employment, some "causal relation" or "causal connexion" between the accident and the employment must be established. The difficulty is (1) to determine upon the authorities what character of causal relation or causal connexion is sufficient for this purpose, and (2) to decide whether the facts of a particular case establish a causal connexion of the character required.

Upon a consideration of the numerous decisions which were cited to us, the authorities to me seem to establish the following propositions:—

(1) If the accident results from a risk which is necessarily incident to the performance of the servant's work, the accident arises out of the employment; all inquiry as to the frequency or magnitude of the risk is irrelevant, and it makes no difference that members of the public face the same risk. That appears to me to be a correct statement of the decision of the House of Lords given in Dennis v. White and Company (33 The Times L.R., 434; [1917] A.C., 479) on June 14, 1917.

(2) If a workman is injured by an accident resulting from a risk to which everyone is subject, but of which it can be said that the workman runs more than the normal risk, the accident arises out of his employment because the abnormal risk was necessarily incident to the performance of his work. That appears to me a correct statement of the decision of the Court of Appeal in Andrew v. Failsworth Industrial Society, Limited (20 The Times L.R., 429; [1904] 2 K.B., 32), where a bricklayer in an elevated position on a scaffold was killed by lightning. The proposition also covers the decision in George Anderson and Company (1905), Limited v. Adamson (6 B.W.C.C., 874), where the necessity of the workman's adopting a stooping position at his work caused him to run more than the normal risk.

(3) If a workman is injured from an accident resulting from a risk to which every one is subject, but which is not necessarily incident to the performance of his work or to which he is not by his work abnormally subjected, the accident does not arise out of his employment.

Thus in Knyvett v. Wilkinson Brothers, Limited (87 L.J., K.B., 722), where a traveller was injured by a bomb while walking in the street in the discharge of his duties, it was held that the accident did not arise out of his employment; and in Allcock v. Rogers (34 The Times L.R., 324; 11 B.W.C.C., 149) the House of Lords held (on March 21, 1918) that where a potman was injured by a bomb while standing in the street cleaning his employer's brass door-plate the accident did not arise out of his employment.

In cases falling within the first two propositions sufficient causal relation or causal connexion is established between the accident and the employment.

In cases falling within the third proposition it is not.

The case now under appeal before us cannot, I think, be brought within either of the first two propositions. The risk of being injured or killed by a falling tree was not necessarily incident to the performance of Mr. Lawrence's work, nor can it be said to be a risk to which he was abnormally subjected. The case would fall within the third proposition, and, but for the element to which I now call attention, the accident could not be said to arise out of his employment.

The authorities seem to me, however, to establish a fourth proposition—namely, that sufficient causal relation or causal connexion between the accident and the employment is established if the man's employment brought him to the particular spot where the accident occurred, and the spot in fact turns out to be a dangerous spot. If such a locality risk is established, then the accident arises out of the employment—even though the risk which caused the accident was neither necessarily incident to the performance of the man's work nor one to which he was abnormally subjected.

This fourth proposition is based upon the decision of the House of Lords in Thom or Simpson v. Sinclair (33 The Times L.R., 247 ; [1917] A.C., 127) on March 8, 1917. In that case a girl employed as a fish curer was at her work in a shed. A wall on adjoining land and belonging to a third party collapsed from its own instability on to the shed ; the shed in consequence fell in and injured the girl. It was held by the House of Lords that the accident arose out of the employment. The causal relation was established because the employment having brought the worker to the particular spot exposed her to the danger which, in fact, existed there. Lord Haldane discusses the matter in detail. He considers the two rival contentions as to the meaning of the words "arising out of the employment." The first contention was expressed thus ([1917] A.C., at p. 133): "According to one of them the language used is satisfied if injury has been inflicted on the workman by any accident, such as something falling on him, which would not have happened to him if his employment had not caused him to be in the place at which the accident occurred at the time of its occurrence, the place and time having thus been conditions of the result brought into existence by the employment. Once establish this and it is said that no further causal connexion need be sought." That contention, Lord Haldane says, is too vague. It seems that this must be so ; otherwise I think the two bomb cases, Knyvett v. Wilkinson Brothers, Limited (supra) and Allcock v. Rogers (supra), would have been decided differently. The second contention ran thus ([1917] A.C., at p. 134) : "Unless . . . . the accident was due to something the man was doing in the course of his employment or was exposed to as a peculiar danger by the nature of his employment, the conditions required by the statute are not fulfilled." That, according to Lord Haldane, is too strict. Indeed it seems clear that if the second contention were correct the decision in Thom or Simpson v. Sinclair (supra) itself must have been the other way. The contention adopted and applied in Thom or Simpson v. Sinclair (supra) appears to me to be this: If the accident has occurred to the workman by reason of the employment bringing about his presence at the particular spot and so exposing him to a danger which in fact is proved to exist at that particular spot, then the accident arises out of his employment. That I believe to represent correctly the effect of the decision in Thom or Simpson v. Sinclair (supra). I will refer to some passages in the speeches and then apply their language to the present case.

Lord Haldane says ([1917] A.C., at p. 135):—

"Has the accident arisen because the claimant was employed in the particular spot on which the roof fell? If so, the accident has arisen out of the employment and there is no necessity to go back in the search for causes to anything more remote than the immediate event, the mere fall of the roof, and there need be no other connexion between what happened and the nature of the work in which the injured person was engaged."

Later he says ([1917] A.C., at p. 136) :—

"If, therefore, the language in question were to be construed upon principle and apart from authorities, I should be prepared to hold that it was satisfied where, as here, it has been established as a fact that it was as arising out of her employment that the appellant was under the roof by the falling in of which she was injured. Behind the fact that the roof fell we cannot go. . . . . Whether the remoter cause of the roof falling was the collapse of a neighbouring wall, or the falling down of some high adjacent building, or a stroke of lightning, seems to me immaterial in the light of this construction. It is enough that by the terms of her employment the appellant had to work in this particular shed and was in consequence injured by an accident which happened to the roof of the shed. The accident is one arising out of the employment, not the less if ultimately caused by the fall of some one else's wall than if it had been caused by inherent weakness of the employer's roof."

Lord Shaw says ([1917] A.C., at p. 142) :—

"In short, my view of the statute is that the expression 'arising out of the employment' is not confined to the mere 'nature of the employment.' The expression, in my opinion, applies to the employment as such—to its nature, its conditions, its obligations, and its incidents. If by reason of any of these the workman is brought within the zone of special danger and so injured or killed, it appears to me that the broad words of the statute 'arising out of the employment' apply."

At page 144—after citing numerous authorities—he says : "My Lords, the cases above cited, nine in number, are in truth all what might be termed 'location' cases, and although there is much variety of expression by the learned Judges, I think that they form a body of authority in support of the construction of the statute which your Lordships are now sanctioning. In each and all it was because of the nature, conditions, obligations, or incidents of the employment by which the workman was brought within the zone of special danger that injury by accident was pronounced to have arisen out of the employment."

In this case of Mr. Lawrence the accident arose because his employment took him to the particular spot on which the tree fell. The immediate event, the fall of the tree, is sufficient ; there need be no other connexion between what happened and the nature of Mr. Lawrence's work. It was as arising out of his employment that Mr. Lawrence was within reach of the tree by the falling of which he was injured. Behind the fact that the tree fell we cannot go ; whether the remoter cause was a violent wind seems immaterial. By reason of the nature, conditions, obligations, or incidents of Mr. Lawrence's employment he was brought within the zone of special danger ; the accident to him which happened there arose out of his employment.

In Allcock v. Rogers (supra) the House of Lords, on March 21, 1918, affirmed the decision of the Court of Appeal on the ground that there was no locality risk. Thom or Simpson v. Sinclair (supra) was cited and the principle of that decision is embodied in and indeed specifically referred to in the speech of Lord Wrenbury when he uses this language (11 B.W.C.C., at p. 153): "In the course of his employment this man was in a certain place. Was there any evidence that it was a dangerous place? For the present purpose a dangerous place is a place which as a place is dangerous—a place which has some quality which results in danger—for instance, that an insecure wall, which may fall, exists there. If this is so, it does not matter whether anyone knew or anticipated that it was dangerous. . . . This place was not by any evidence shown to be a dangerous place ; there is no evidence that it had any quality which made it more dangerous than any other place. The only evidence is that danger resulted in the place, but not that it resulted from any danger connected with the place as a place. Thom or Simpson v. Sinclair (supra), in my opinion, does not apply."

The result is that, in my opinion, Mr. Lawrence's case fails within my fourth proposition, which is founded on Thom or Simpson v. Sinclair (supra). His employment brought him to a danger spot—i.e., a spot which had a quality which resulted in danger. The lurking danger was the tree. The danger materialized—i.e., the tree fell. The cause of the fall is immaterial and irrelevant. The falling tree caused injury to him ; this was an accident which arose out of his employment.

The appeal fails.

THOMAS v. HUGHES.*

Education—School attendance—Employment—Refusal of exemption—Non-attendance—Extenuating circumstance—Education Act, 1921 (11 and 12 Geo. V., c. 51), Part IV.

Where an education authority has refused an application for exemption from school attendance on the ground of employment the fact of such employment can be neither a "reasonable excuse" for non-attendance, nor an extenuating circumstance entitling the justices under the Probation of Offenders Act, 1907, to dismiss a summons against the parent.

This was a case stated by justices for the county of Carnarvon.

On February 20th, 1928, an information was preferred by John Owen Thomas, school attendance officer (hereinafter called "the appellant"), against William Hughes (hereinafter called "the respondent") for that he on February 13th, 1928, and on divers other dates within six months then passed, then being the parent of a certain child named Robert Hughes of not less than five years, nor more than 15 years of age, to wit, of the age of 15 years or thereabouts, who was then residing with him, unlawfully and without reasonable excuse did neglect and omit to cause such child to attend school as required by the bye-laws duly made by the education authority, the Carnarvonshire County Council.

The justices were of opinion that the case against the respondent had been proved, but having regard to the extenuating circumstances under which the offence was committed and in exercise of the discretion vested in them under and by reason of the Probation of Offenders Act, 1907, they deemed it inexpedient to inflict any punishment and dismissed the said information and made no order as to costs.

The following facts were admitted or proved :

(a) That the respondent's child, the said Robert Hughes, was born on February 2nd, 1913, and was therefore at the date of the hearing of the said information 15 years of age.

(b) That bye-laws made by the Education Committee of the Carnarvonshire County Council on July 31st, 1924, under Part IV. of the Education Act, 1921, which bye-laws were still in force, provided (inter alia) as follows:—

"2. The parent of every child of not less than 5 nor more than 15 years of age shall cause such child to attend school, unless there be a reasonable excuse for non-attendance.

"3. Any of the following reasons shall be a reasonable excuse, namely :—

(a) That the child is under efficient instruction in some other manner.

(b) That the child has been prevented from attending school by sickness or any unavoidable cause.

(c) That there is no Public Elementary School open which the child can attend within three miles measured according to the nearest road from the residence of the child, provided that, where the Local Education Authority provides suitable means of conveyance for a child between a reasonable distance of its home and a Public Elementary School such reason shall not be a reasonable excuse.

"6. Every parent who shall not observe, or shall neglect, or violate these bye-laws, or any of them, shall, upon conviction, be liable to a penalty not exceeding, with the costs, twenty shillings for each offence."

(c) That between January 24th, 1928, and February 13th, 1928, respectively, there had been twenty-nine openings of the school and that the said Robert Hughes had not attended school once between the said dates.

(d) That on four occasions application had been made under section 46 (3) of the Education Act, 1921, to the appropriate authority on behalf of the said Robert Hughes for exemption from the obligation to attend school but that such applications had been refused on the ground that no financial hardship was thereby involved.

(e) That provision had been made at the Llandudno Central School for the education of children over 14 years of age.

On behalf of the appellant it was contended :—

(a) That although the said Robert Hughes attained the age of 15 years on February 2nd, 1928, he was bound under the said bye-laws and under section 138 (1) of the Education Act, 1921, to attend school until the conclusion of the current term in or about the first week in April, 1928.

(b) That the discretion of the education authority or committee of the said County Council to grant or refuse exemption from the obligation to attend school was absolute and unfettered.

* Reported by J. W. HALL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

(c) That the education authority and not the justices were the judges of whether exemption should be granted on the ground of employment or otherwise.

(d) That the justices could not entertain the question whether the fact of employment was a reasonable excuse.

On behalf of the respondent it was stated, but not on oath, that the said Robert Hughes was employed by Messrs. W. H. Smith and Son, stationers, of Llandudno, at wages amounting to 15s. a week, and that they were prepared to employ him permanently if the applications for exemption made on his behalf were successful. It was also stated that two previous informations against the respondent for similar offences had been dismissed on payment of costs.

The question upon which the opinion of the Court was desired was whether the justices, upon the above statement, came to a correct determination and decision in point of law.

Mr. Pritt, K.C., and Mr. Ralph Sutton appeared for the appellant ; the respondent was not represented.

The LORD CHIEF JUSTICE (LORD HEWART) [after reading the case].—It has been held more than once, and it has been made perfectly clear, that where there has been under the Education Acts a refusal by the education authority to grant exemption, that refusal is not to be defeated by any circuitous method. Otherwise the Act would be so much waste paper. If there has been a refusal to exempt on the ground of employment, it is not a reasonable excuse for non-attendance that there is employment in fact. Here it is not said that there was a reasonable excuse, but that there were extenuating circumstances. What are said to be the extenuating circumstances ? There is not in the case a hint of anything that gives an answer to that question unless it be paragraph 8 : "On behalf of the respondents it was stated, but not on oath, that the said Robert Hughes was employed by Messrs. W. H. Smith and Son, stationers, of Llandudno, at wages amounting to 15s. a week and that they were prepared to employ him permanently if the applications for exemption made on his behalf were successful. It was also stated that two previous informations against the respondent for similar offences had been dismissed on payment of costs." If that standard were applied to the Act it would follow that where exemption on the ground of employment had been refused, the fact of employment might nevertheless be an extenuating circumstance. The very thing which was rejected as a ground of exemption might be used to nullify the refusal.

One may feel sympathy with the parent who is not allowed to accept for his son employment at a commencing wage of 15s. a week with a prospect of permanent employment, but that reasoning cannot prevail. The words of Mr. Justice Avory in Rennie v. Boardman (78 J.P., 420) are very much in point : "The question was whether the respondent had failed in the duty of causing the child to attend school, and the fact that he had sent the child to work at a mill could not be an excuse for not causing it to attend. By sending it to the mill he was preventing it from attending school. How that could be an excuse I do not see. The whole of these contentions were bad, and there only remains the question whether the justices were warranted by section 1 (1) of the Probation of Offenders Act, 1907, in dismissing the information. This Court has more than once pointed out that that provision does not justify the justices in saying that a particular offence created by statute is in their opinion a trifling offence and that therefore they will not put the law in force, but it only justifies them in saying that when an offence has been committed the circumstances make that particular offence an offence of a trifling nature." Here the justices have thought fit to employ the phrase, not that the offence was of a trivial nature, but that they had regard to the extenuating circumstances. Upon analysis the extenuating circumstances seem to be no more than a restatement of the fact that the offence was committed. The boy was not at school because he was at work ; he ought not to have been at work because he ought to have been at school. There were no materials on which the justices could dismiss this under the Probation of Offenders Act, 1907, but the amount of the penalty is, of course, entirely for them.

LAKE v. CRONIN.*

Revenue — Bookmaker's certificate — Clerk of bookmaker—Carrying on the business—Requirement of certificate—Finance Act, 1926 (16 and 17 Geo. V., c. 22), ss. 15 (1) (b), 17 (1) (b), 18.

This was a case stated by York justices.

Mr. Charles William Joseph Cronin, the respondent, an officer of Customs and Excise, preferred an information under the Finance Act, 1926, against the appellant, Mr. Lawrence Lake, alleging that on October 5, 1927, he carried on at York the business of a bookmaker without having in force a proper certificate as required by section 15 (1) (b) of the Finance Act, 1926, whereby, and by force of section 17 (1) (b) of the Act, the appellant was liable in respect of that offence to an Excise penalty of £100. On February 20, 1928, the justices convicted the appellant and fined him £10.

The following facts were proved or admitted :—Mr. Lewis Lindley Hunt was a bookmaker and had taken out a bookmaker's certificate and also an entry certificate in respect of premises at 43B, Fosgate, York. On October 5, 1927, the appellant, Mr. Lake, was in sole charge of the premises and was seen by the respondent to receive two or three bets by telephone and enter them on a slip. The respondent asked Mr. Lake to take out a bookmaker's certificate, and Mr. Lake requested a week's grace to find out if that was necessary. On October 22, 1927, Mr. Lake received a letter from the Commissioners of Customs and Excise telling him that a certificate was necessary.

No one else was employed at the premises except Mr. Lake. He was engaged by Mr. Hunt on a weekly salary basis and had sole charge of the premises in the absence of Mr. Hunt, who attended race meetings in other towns during the flat racing season. At one period Mr. Hunt had been absent for ten days consecutively.

Mr. Lake admitted that, though he had no authority to open new accounts with any person in the absence of Mr. Hunt, he could accept personal bets and bets over the telephone up to a certain amount fixed by Mr. Hunt; and that he had no responsibility. He answered the telephone and recorded messages.

The respondent contended that Mr. Lake was a bookmaker within the meaning of section 18 of the Finance Act, 1926, which provides:—

"The expression 'bookmaker' means any person who, whether on his own account or as servant or agent to any other person, carries on, whether occasionally or regularly, the business of receiving or negotiating bets. . . ."

He said that if Mr. Lake were receiving or negotiating bets for Mr. Hunt, which was admitted, and had no certificate, he should be convicted.

The appellant contended that a person, simply because he took instructions over the telephone in regard to transactions and wrote them on a piece of paper, could not be carrying on the business of a bookmaker under the definition. The Act did not say that a person who received or negotiated bets should hold a certificate, but a person who carried on the business of receiving or negotiating bets. Mr. Lake said that he was merely taking bets as Mr. Hunt's clerk.

Reference was made to a circular on Betting Duty, No. 129, issued by the Commissioners of Customs and Excise on October 11, 1926. Paragraph 5 read:—

"Persons employed by and under the direction of bookmakers in a merely subordinate and mechanical capacity (such as clerks, telephone operators, messengers, &c.) are not required to take out personal certificates."

The justices found that Mr. Lake did carry on the business of a bookmaker without having in force a proper certificate, and fined him as stated.

Mr. Birkett, K.C., and Mr. Bertram Long appeared for the appellant; the Solicitor-General (Sir Boyd Merriman, K.C.) and Mr. W. Bowstead for the respondent.

The Lord Chief Justice (Lord Hewart), in giving judgment, recapitulated the facts found in the case, read the definition of "bookmaker," and said that it was not easy to imagine a much more comprehensive definition. A bookmaker was a person who carried on the business of receiving and negotiating bets. It mattered not whether he carried it on on his own account or as the servant or agent of some other person, or whether he did so occasionally or regularly. What were the suggested limits of that definition? Mr. Birkett had suggested two: (1) that the business referred to must be the business of the bookmaker himself; in other words, that the business which the person accused was carrying on must be his own and not another's. That seemed manifestly at variance with the plain words of the definition. How could it be his own business if he were carrying it on as a servant or agent? (2) That if the person accused were to fulfil the character of one carrying on the business as servant or agent, he must be clothed with an authority so utterly complete as to be, as it were, the duplicate original of the owner, and that when a restriction of any sort was imposed he could not be said to be carrying on the business.

Reference had been made to the cases of Robbins v. Commissioners of Inland Revenue (36 The Times L.R., 542; [1920] 2 K.B., 677) and Graham v. Lewis (5 The Times L.R., 21; 22 Q.B.D., 1). With all respect to Mr. Birkett's ingenious argument, these cases, instead of helping it, were directly opposed to it. They depended on the fact that though the persons there concerned were carrying on the business it was not their own business. That was not merely not this case but the direct opposite of it, because the Act here involved said, "whether on his own account or as servant or agent to any other person."

It was said that it was untrue to describe Mr. Lake, though he was in sole charge, as carrying on the business of receiving or negotiating bets because the total business of receiving or negotiating bets would require the authority of the principal. The case of Robbins v. Commissioners of Inland Revenue (supra) showed how ill-founded that contention was.

It might be that there were persons employed in a bookmaker's office in a merely subordinate or mechanical capacity, and it would be manifestly incorrect to say that they were carrying on the business. When the justices had correctly apprehended the definition it became a question of fact in each case for them to say whether the person charged was carrying on the business. Circumstances might be various, but on these materials it was impossible to say that there was not evidence, and ample evidence, on which they might hold that Mr. Lake was carrying on the business.

If the argument on behalf of the appellant were to prevail it would follow that a bookmaker could employ any number of servants in different parts of the United Kingdom and so long as he told them that no account must exceed, say, half a million pounds, none of them would require a certificate, The appeal would be dismissed.

HART v. HUDSON BROS., LIMITED.*

Weights and Measures—False or unjust weight—Charge against principal—Actual offender—Right of principal to bring before the Court—Weights and Measures Act, 1878 (41 and 42 Vict., c. 49), s. 25—Sale of Food (Weights and Measures) Act, 1926 (16 and 17 Geo. V., c. 63), ss. 12 (5), 15 (1).

By s. 12 (5) of the Sale of Food (Weights and Measures) Act, 1926, "Where an employer or principal is charged with an offence against this Act, he shall be entitled on information duly laid by him, and on giving not less than three days' notice of his intention to the prosecution, to have any other person whom he charges as the actual offender brought before the Court at the time appointed for hearing the charge, and, if after the commission of the offence has been proved, the employer or principal proves to the satisfaction of the Court that he had used due diligence to enforce the execution of this Act, and that the said other person had committed the offence in question without his consent, connivance or wilful default, the said other person shall be summarily convicted of the offence and the employer or principal shall be exempt from any penalty. . . ."

Held, that as s. 15 (1) of the above Act provides that it is to be construed as one with the Weights and Measures Acts, 1878 to 1926, a defendant who is charged under s. 25 of the Act of 1878 with having a false or unjust weight for the sale of food may adopt the procedure provided for by s. 12 (5) of the Act of 1926.

This was a case stated by Surrey Justices.

The respondents were charged at Sutton on an information laid by the appellant on behalf of the Surrey County Council with unlawfully having in their possession for use for trade a scale which was false or unjust contrary to section 25 of the Weights and Measures Act, 1878. The following facts were proved or admitted:—

On February 3, 1928, an inspector of weights and measures visited the premises of the respondents at 40, High-street, Sutton, where he examined a 20lb. price-computing weighing instrument which the repondents had in their possession for use for trade. It was found to be ½oz. deficient in weight. The respondents' manager in the shop agreed that that was so and at the inspector's request adjusted the scale with a balancing key. The inspector retested the instrument and found it correct.

The respondents gave notice to the appellant under section 12 (5) of the Sale of Food (Weights and Measures) Act, 1926, that they intended to bring before the Court at the time appointed for hearing the charge their servant, the manager of the branch shop where the offence had been committed, as the person whom they charged as the actual offender.

At the hearing, after the commission of the offence had been proved to the justices' satisfaction, the respondents proved to the justices' satisfaction that they had used due diligence to enforce the execution of the Weights and Measures Act, 1878, and that the manager had committed the offence in question without their consent, connivance, or wilful default.

The appellant contended that the procedure under section 12 (5) of the Sale of Food (Weights and Measures) Act, 1926, was not applicable to proceedings in respect of offences under the Weights and Measures Act, 1878, but that such procedure was applicable only to proceedings under the Act of 1926.

The respondents contended that as by section 15 (1) of the Act of 1926 that Act was to be construed as one with the Weights and Measures Acts, 1878 to 1926, the provisions of section 12 (5) of the Act of 1926 must be read into each and all of the earlier Acts, and that the safeguards therein provided were applicable in respect of offences under all the Weights and Measures Acts.

The justices found that the respondents had committed the offence charged and were of opinion that the provisions of section 12 (5) of the Act of 1926 were applicable to the proceedings and dismissed the information against the respondents. They also dismissed the case against the manager on payment of costs.

By section 12 (5) of the Sale of Food (Weights and Measures) Act, 1926:—

"Where an employer or principal is charged with an offence against this Act he shall be entitled on information duly laid by him, and on giving not less than three days' notice of his intention to the prosecution, to have any other person whom he charges as the actual offender brought before the Court at the time appointed for hearing the charge, and if, after the commission of the offence has been proved, the employer or principal proves to the satisfaction of the Court that he had used due diligence to enforce the execution of this Act, and that the said other person had committed the offence in question without his consent, connivance, or wilful default, the said other person shall be summarily convicted of the offence and the employer or principal shall be exempt from any penalty. . . ."

By section 15 (1) "This Act . . . shall be construed as one with the Weights and Measures Acts, 1878 to 1926. . . ."

Mr. H. D. Roome appeared for the appellant; Mr. Montgomery, K.C., and Mr. Walter Frampton for the respondents.

The Lord Chief Justice (Lord Hewart), in giving judgment, read the case and said that it might be observed that the scale was unsatisfactory not in the sense that it was wrongly constructed or inherently defective but only that it was not adjusted with a key, a defect quickly remedied in the presence of the inspector.

The argument for the appellant was that the procedure under the later statute was not applicable to proceedings taken under the earlier statute. But Mr. Roome, with his usual candour, had directed their attention to the two cases which were most against him. In Canada Southern Railway Company v. International Bridge Company (8 App. Cas., 723) Lord Selborne said, at p. 727:—

"It is to be observed that those two Acts are to be read together by the express provision of the seventh and concluding section of the amending Act; and therefore we must construe every part of each of them as if it had been contained in one Act, unless there is some manifest discrepancy making it necessary to hold that the later Act has to some extent modified something found in the earlier Act."

"Some manifest discrepancy." Applying that canon, he could not think that there was any manifest discrepancy in giving in the case here charged the kind of possible defence to the employer which was contemplated in section 12 (5). See Willingale v. Norris (25 The Times L.R., 19; [1909] 1 K.B., 57) per Lord Alverstone, C.J., and Mr. Justice Bigham.

In the present case it was expressly provided that "This Act shall be construed as one with the Weights and Measures Acts, 1878 to 1926." Construing the Act in that way, he found it impossible to say that the justices were wrong in law, and he had come to the conclusion, not without hesitation at first, that the appeal failed. The words of Mr. Justice Walton in Willingale v. Norris (supra) were applicable:—

"This case is a striking example of the difficulties and obscurity which arise from legislation by reference to and incorporation of other statutes."

Mr. Justice Acton and Mr. Justice Branson agreed.

ADAMS v. CAMFONI.*

Licensing—Supply of liquor otherwise than during the permitted hours — Unauthorized act of errand boy—Non-liability of licensee—Licensing Act, 1921 (11 and 12 Geo. V., c. 42), s. 4 (a).

A boy of 16, employed by the holder of an off-licence solely as an errand boy, supplied two bottles of whisky to a customer in his employer's absence, at a time when the premises were not open for business, and outside the permitted hours. He had never at any time been authorized to sell to or supply customers.

Held, that he was not a servant or agent of the employer within the meaning of s. 4 (a) of the Licensing Act, 1921, so as to make the employer liable under that section for supplying intoxicating liquor otherwise than during the permitted hours.

This was a case stated by the Stipendiary Magistrate for Cardiff.

On January 18, 1928, the respondent, Alfonso Camfoni, was charged by an information preferred against him by the appellant, Sidney Adams, an inspector of police, for that he, on December 14, 1927, did unlawfully by his agent supply in certain licensed premises, to wit, 168, Bute-street, Cardiff, during hours other than permitted hours, certain intoxicating liquor, to wit, whisky, to be consumed off the premises, contrary to section 4 of the Licensing Act, 1921. And one Ernest John was charged by the said information with unlawfully aiding and abetting the said Alfonso Camfoni in the commission of the said offence. Both charges were dismissed.

By section 4 of the Licensing Act, 1921, no person shall, except during the permitted hours (a) either by himself or by any servant or agent sell or supply to any person in any licensed premises or club any intoxicating liquor to be consumed either on or off the premises. It is enacted by section 18 of the said Act that the provisions of the said Act with respect to licensed premises apply to any premises or place where intoxicating liquors are sold by retail under a licence.

The following facts were proved or admitted :—

(a) On December 14, 1927, Alfonso Camfoni was the holder of a spirit dealer's Excise licence authorizing him to sell spirits by retail for consumption off the premises at 168, Bute-street aforesaid.

(b) On that date one Angel Gonzalez was in the employment of the said Alfonso Camfoni as manager of the wine and spirit business carried on by the said Alfonso Camfoni at 168, Bute-street aforesaid.

(c) On the same date the said Ernest John, a youth 16 years of age, was in the employment of Camfoni as an errand or messenger boy in connexion with the said business carried on at 168, Bute-street aforesaid.

(d) On December 14, 1927, whilst the said premises were not open for business, the said Ernest John, in the temporary absence of the said Alfonso Camfoni and of the said Angel Gonzalez, served one George Paris with two bottles of whisky from the stock at 168, Bute-street, during hours other than permitted hours.

(e) The said Ernest John received no payment from the said George Paris in respect of the said bottles of whisky.

(f) The said Alfonso Camfoni, when charged on the same day with the offence mentioned in the information, replied : "John has no right to supply anything at all."

No evidence was adduced by the appellant that the said Ernest John:

(a) Had any express or implied authority either on December 14 or at any other time to sell or supply to any customer any part of the stock in 168, Bute-street aforesaid.

(b) Had been left in charge of the said premises 168, Bute-street aforesaid, either on that day or at any other time.

(c) Had ever taken any part in selling or supplying to customers any of the stock in the said premises.

(d) Had ever been employed by the said Alfonso Camfoni or the said Angel Gonzalez in any capacity other than that of a mere errand or messenger boy.

It was contended on behalf of the said Alfonso Camfoni that the mere fact that the said Ernest John was employed by the said Alfonso Camfoni as an errand or messenger boy was not by itself sufficient to make the said Ernest John an agent or servant of the said Alfonso Camfoni within the meaning of section 4 of the Licensing Act, 1921, and that in the absence of any other evidence the information against the said Alfonso Camfoni ought to be dismissed.

It was contended on behalf of the appellant that the mere fact that the said Ernest John was employed by the said Alfonso Camfoni as an errand or messenger boy was by itself sufficient to make the said Ernest John an agent or servant of the said Alfonso Camfoni within the meaning of section 4 aforesaid, and that even in the absence of any other evidence the said Alfonso Camfoni and the said Ernest John ought to be convicted.

The Stipendiary Magistrate was of the opinion that the contention on behalf of Alfonso Camfoni was correct and that there was no evidence from which he could infer that the said Ernest John was acting as an agent or servant of the said Alfonso Camfoni. He therefore dismissed the said information against the said Alfonso Camfoni and the said Ernest John.

The question for the opinion of the Court was whether upon the above statement of facts the said determination was correct and what should be done in the premises.

Mr. P. B. Morle appeared for the appellant ; Mr. Joshua Davies, for the respondent, was not called upon.

The Lord Chief Justice (Lord Hewart) said, in giving judgment, that it was not clear from the case whether in supplying the whisky John was honestly, though mistakenly, intending to serve his master's interests by supplying one of his master's customers on credit, or whether he was dishonestly taking his master's goods and supplying them to some person for his own ends.

It had been contended that the effect of section 4 of the Licensing Act, 1921, was to put the respondent in the position of an insurer warranting that neither he nor anybody else on his premises should sell or supply his goods otherwise than during permitted hours. He could not find any such meaning in the section. The section was said to be taken from the Defence of the Realm Regulations, but it did not appear that the interpretation contended for had been put upon those words ; on the contrary, in Williams v. Pearce (32 The Times L.R., 285 ; 80 J.P., 229), in which they were dealt with, Lord Reading, C.J., said, at page 232 : "This regulation only carries out the policy manifested in the Licensing Acts. It is nothing new. I cannot find in the authorities to which our attention has been called anything which assists the contention for the respondent on this point," and this was concurred in by Mr. Justice Sankey and Mr. Justice Low. On the evidence the magistrate came to the conclusion that what happened was something of an accidental kind done by one who, no doubt, in a sense was in the respondent's service, but against orders and not in the course of performing any duty delegated to him. It was impossible to say that the magistrate was wrong, and the appeal must be dismissed.

MR. JUSTICE ACTON and MR. JUSTICE BRANSON concurred.

REX v. MINISTER OF TRANSPORT—EX PARTE LEICESTERSHIRE AND WARWICKSHIRE ELECTRIC POWER COMPANY.*

Electricity—Special order—Revocation—Electricity Supply Act, 1919 (9 and 10 Geo. V., c. 100), s. 26.

The power conferred by s. 26 of the Electricity Supply Act, 1919, to amend or revoke by special order any provisional order made under the Electric Lighting Acts and confirmed by Parliament does not include a power to amend or revoke a special order by another special order.

This was a rule nisi for a certiorari calling upon the Minister of Transport to show cause why a Special Order made by the Electricity Commissioners, entitled the Polesworth and District Electricity Special Order, 1927, should not be quashed on the ground that clause 12 thereof was ultra vires the Commissioners. The prosecutors were the undertakers under the Atherstone and District Electricity Special Order, 1922, and they complained that clause 12 of the Polesworth Order illegally purported to revoke the Atherstone Order so far as concerned a considerable part of their district, and to substitute the Pooley Hall Colliery Co., Ltd. as undertakers in the district so transferred. All other relevant facts and the material statutory provisions are set out fully in the judgment of the Lord Chief Justice.

The Solicitor-General (Sir Boyd Merriman, K.C.) and Mr. W. Bowstead showed cause for the Minister of Transport ; Mr. Tyldesley Jones, K.C., and Mr. Arthur Moon, K.C., appeared for the Pooley Hall Colliery Co. ; Mr. W. A. Greene, K.C., and Mr. Frederick W. Wallace supported the rule.

* Reported by J. W. HALL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

THE LORD CHIEF JUSTICE.—This is an order nisi for a writ of certiorari to be directed to the Minister of Transport to remove into this Court a Special Order made by the Electricity Commissioners under the Electricity Supply Acts, 1882 to 1926, in respect of the rural district of Tamworth in the counties of Stafford and Warwick, part of the rural district of Atherstone in the county of Warwick, and parts of the rural districts of Ashby and Market Bosworth in the county of Leicester, and entitled "The Polesworth and District Electricity Special Order, 1927," upon the ground that clause 12 of that Order is ultra vires the Commissioners. Clause 12 of that Order is in these terms : "As from the commencement of this Order so much of the Atherstone and District Electricity Special Order, 1922, as relates to (a) the Rural District of Tamworth (b) the Parishes of Baddesley Ensor, Baxterley and Polesworth in the Rural District of Atherstone and (c) the part of the Parish of Grendon in the last-mentioned rural district which is situate to the north-west of the south side of Whittington Lane and its continuation as a footpath from Whittington to the Atherstone to Pinwall Road shall be and is hereby revoked." To express that matter in a more concise and simpler form, it comes to this, that in 1922 a Special Order, under the Electricity Supply Act, 1919, and the other Electricity Acts, was made which is called "The Atherstone and District Electricity Special Order." In 1927 another Order was made under these statutes called "The Polesworth and District Electricity Special Order," and the area of country comprised in the later Order coincides, as to part of it, with the area of country comprised in the first Order, and the second Order not only enables persons there mentioned to exercise powers in that area, but excludes from that area the persons who had been given certain powers in it by the previous Order ; in other words, the later Order to a certain extent revokes the previous Order ; and the question is whether there is power, by one Special Order under these Acts, to revoke another Special Order.

The question is one of jurisdiction, and it is said, on the part of the applicants for the rule, that in making this Order, so far as it amounts to a revocation of the previous Order—in other words, to the extent of clause 12 of the new Order—the Electricity Commissioners have exceeded their jurisdiction. The question is whether that allegation is correct.

One naturally asks first of all : Where is it said that the power is to be found which enables the Electricity Commissioners to do that which they have done? The answer to that question is that it is said the power is to be found in section 26 of the Electricity Supply Act, 1919. That section provides as follows: "Anything which under the Electric Lighting Acts may be effected by a Provisional Order confirmed by Parliament may be effected by a Special Order made by the Electricity Commissioners and confirmed by the Board of Trade under and in accordance with the provisions of this Act, or by an Order establishing a joint electricity authority under this Act, and references in those Acts and the Electric Lighting (Clauses) Act, 1899, to Provisional Orders shall be construed as including references to such Special Orders and Orders as aforesaid, except that the paragraphs numbered (1) to (4) of section four of the Electric Lighting Act, 1882, shall not apply to such Special Orders and Orders as aforesaid, and any Provisional Order made under the Electric Lighting Acts and confirmed by Parliament may be amended or revoked by any such Special Order or Order as aforesaid." There follows a proviso that "a Special Order made in pursuance of the powers conferred by this section shall be laid before each House of Parliament, and shall not come into force unless and until approved, either with or without modifications, by a resolution passed by each such House." Now it is apparent at once that that section does not in terms confer a power to revoke a Special Order. It does in terms confer a power to revoke a Provisional Order, and it is said that the result is grotesque, if, while a Provisional Order, which needed confirmation by Act of Parliament, may be revoked by Special Order, a Special Order in its turn cannot be revoked except by Act of Parliament.

Now it is quite obvious that this section is a difficult section, and it is deplorable that a matter which could have been made perfectly clear should have been left in any sort of obscurity, especially where the subject matter of the controversy involves such a question as taking away or diminishing acquired rights. It therefore becomes a little important to see how this question of revocation stood before the passing of the Act of 1919. In section 3 of the Electric Lighting Act of 1882 it was indeed provided that "The Board of Trade may from time to time license any local authority as defined by this Act, or any company or person, to supply electricity under this Act for any public or private purposes within any area," subject to certain provisions; and one of these provisions was that "the licence may make . . . regulations"—among other things—"for the revocation of the licence where the licensees fail to perform such duties." As the matter stood, therefore, at that time the revocation of a licence depended upon the power to revoke expressed in the licence, but by section 4 of that Act it was provided that "The Board of Trade may, from time to time, by Provisional Order authorize any local authority, company, or person to supply electricity for any public or private purposes within any area, without requiring such consents as are required to the granting a licence under this Act, and for such period, whether limited or unlimited, as the Board of Trade may think proper, but in all other respects subject to the like provisions as in the last section contained with respect to licences, and subject also to the following provisions." To pause there for one moment, the employment of that phrase "in all other respects subject to the like provisions as in the last section contained with respect to licences" involved this result, that the Provisional Order, in its turn, might contain a provision about the revocation of the licence if and when the licensees failed to perform their duties. But over and above the power to be derived from what was expressed in the Provisional Order itself the power of revocation depended upon two things: one was the remaining four paragraphs of section 4; and it is not until one comes to the last of these paragraphs that anything is said about revocation; and it is to be observed that everything which section 4 of this statute has to say upon the topic of revocation is contained in the last of these four paragraphs: "Any Act confirming any Provisional Order granted in pursuance of this Act may on the application of the undertakers thereby authorized to supply electricity, be repealed, altered, or amended by any subsequent Provisional Order granted by the Board of Trade and confirmed by Parliament." In other words, subject to anything that might be expressed in the Provisional Order akin to that which might have been expressed in a licence on the topic of revocation, revocation could take place only so far as this section is concerned on the application of the undertakers thereby authorized to supply electricity. If it was desired to repeal or to alter or to amend the Provisional Order by a subsequent Provisional Order, it needed initiative on the part of the undertakers.

Then came the Electric Lighting (Clauses) Act of 1899, and that Act provided by section 1 among other things that certain provisions contained in the Schedule to the Act "shall be incorporated with and form part of every Provisional Order made by the Board of Trade after the commencement of this Act under the Electric Lighting Acts, save so far as they are expressly varied or excepted by the Order"; and when one turns to these clauses one finds that the topic of revocation is dealt with in two ways. First of all, where the clauses are dealing with particular matters such as area of supply or security and accounts, there is a provision for revocation of the Order in case of proved default; and again, under the heading "Revocation of Special Order" in clause 63, it is provided that if certain events happen and certain matters are ascertained and certain inquiries are made the Board of Trade may revoke the Order; more than that, it is provided by clause 66 that in addition to the other powers which the Board of Trade shall have in that behalf they may revoke the Special Order at any time with the consent and concurrence of the undertakers.

So the matter stood when the Electricity Supply Act of 1919 was passed. What is it that emerges from an examination of these various provisions? It is this: that except where some express provision in the Order itself had been fulfilled or where some specified default had been made or suffered, or where the undertakers themselves made application, there was no power to alter, revoke, or amend the Provisional Order by any subsequent Order, subject, of course, always to what may be done in this respect as in so many other respects by an Act of Parliament.

Now it is in these circumstances that section 26 of the Electricity Supply Act of 1919 in terms provides that "any Provisional Order made under the Electric Lighting Acts and confirmed by Parliament may be amended or revoked by any such Special Order or Order as aforesaid." It is said if "any Provisional Order," why not "any Provisional or Special Order"? Speaking for myself, I cannot help thinking the answer is obvious, in the form of another question. If the words "any Provisional Order may be revoked" were intended to mean "any Provisional Order or any Special Order may be revoked," why in the name of lucidity and fairness did the Act not say so? It has not said so. What has it said? The section says, "Anything which under the Electric Lighting Acts may be effected by a Provisional Order confirmed by Parliament may be effected by a Special Order made by the Electricity Commissioners and confirmed by the Board of Trade under and in accordance with the provisions of this Act, or by an Order establishing a joint electricity authority under this Act." Now what do these words mean? These words are manifestly a reference to section 6 and section 7 of the Act, which provide for the setting up of joint electricity authorities; but section 7 of the Act, dealing with the Order giving effect to schemes for that purpose, expressly provides by subsection 3, "an Order made under this section may be altered by a subsequent Order made, confirmed, and approved in like manner as the original Order." In other words, it took an express statutory provision to enable the Electricity Commissioners to alter, by a subsequent Order, an Order made under that section.

To return to section 26 of the Electricity Supply Act, 1919, the section continues in these words:

"and references in those Acts and the Electric Lighting (Clauses) Act, 1899, to Provisional Orders shall be construed as including references to such Special Orders and Orders as aforesaid, except"—now comes this remarkable exception—"that the paragraphs numbered (1) to (4) of section four of the Electric Lighting Act, 1882, shall not apply to such Special Orders and Orders as aforesaid, and any Provisional Order made under the Electric Lighting Acts and confirmed by Parliament may be amended or revoked by any such Special Order or Order as aforesaid." Now what is the paragraph numbered (4) of section 4 of the Electric Lighting Act of 1882? That is the paragraph which confers the power to repeal, alter, or amend. It is said that that is the paragraph which contains the limitation upon the power. True; but the very same paragraph as that which contains the limitation is the paragraph, and the only paragraph, which confers the power; in other words, the power was given and was given only subject to the limitation. What is it? "Any Act confirming any Provisional Order granted in pursuance of this Act may, on the application of the undertakers thereby authorized to supply electricity, be repealed, altered, or amended by any subsequent Provisional Order granted by the Board of Trade and confirmed by Parliament." Take that paragraph away and what becomes of the power of revocation? It is said that if you take that paragraph away you leave the power of revocation but you take away the limitation upon it. That seems to me to be an impossible contention. It would be strange indeed if the meaning of this section were, when it says that paragraph (4) shall be of no application, that the true intention of the legislature was that the power of revocation should indeed remain, but should remain unfettered by the condition which is therein imposed. Then one comes to the last words of section 26 of the Act of 1919: "and any Provisional Order made under the Electric Lighting Acts and confirmed by Parliament may be amended or revoked by any such Special Order or Order as aforesaid"; "any Provisional Order," but not "any Special Order." It is said that that is a grotesque result, a ludicrous result, but is it? What was the position? Here was an expert body of Electricity Commissioners being set up. May it not well have seemed right and proper that that body, bringing its skill and judgment to bear upon previously existing Provisional Orders, should have power to revoke them? May it not well have been thought that the Electricity Commissioners should have the power of starting with a slate which they had made to their satisfaction clean; but there is nothing inconsistent in making a provision of that kind with the further provision that what the Electricity Commissioners then proceed to write upon the slate must remain, subject, of course, to the overriding power of Parliament to alter and amend or revoke by statute. I see myself no repugnancy between the notion that the Electricity Commissioners should have power to revoke antecedent Orders and prepare the ground for their own work and the notion that when they proceed to their work there must be finality about it, subject to a statute. But what is the contrary suggestion? As the argument has proceeded, it has been borne in upon me with increasing force that the contrary suggestion, however ingeniously and however persuasively it may be put, involves nothing less than this: that we are to read into section 26 of the statute, which expressly confers the power to revoke a Provisional Order, the power which is not there to revoke a Special Order, and that too although the revocation of the Special Order may involve the result that individuals are deprived of valuable rights which they have acquired at no small expense. It is answered that at any rate the section does contain the power to revoke a Provisional Order. So it does, but that power is expressed in clear words. Where are the words conferring the power to revoke a Special Order? I am extremely reluctant to think that this Act or any Act of Parliament ought to be construed as depriving individuals of acquired rights of value to them, without using unambiguous language for that purpose. If this statute had said, as it might have said, "any Provisional or Special Order made under the Acts may be amended or revoked by Special Order," there would have been no controversy. The section would have contained two more words than it does, and that is the extent of the variation. These two words are not there, and as they are not there, I am not prepared to read this section as if they were there.

In my opinion, therefore, the Electricity Commissioners, in making this Order, have exceeded their jurisdiction, and I think that this rule ought to be made absolute.

On a summons against the appellants for giving a false warranty there was evidence that toffee made partly with coconut fat had been sold for years as "rum and butter toffee." The justices convicted the appellants. Held (Talbot, J., dissenting), that the description "butter toffee" implied that no fat, except butter, was used in the manufacture, and therefore the conviction must be affirmed.—RILEY BROS. Held, that this provision applies to a notice to quit given by a tenant, as well as to a notice to quit given by a landlord.—FLATHER v. HOOD [Charles, J.] 698

AGRICULTURE — Minimum wage — Deduction —Sale of milk by employer—Set-off price—Agricultural Wages (Regulation) Act, 1924 (14 and 15 Geo. V., c. 37), s. 8 and Orders thereunder].—By an Order of the Agricultural Wages Board minimum rates of wages were fixed for workers in agriculture in the county of Dorset, and by an Order of the Dorset Agricultural Wages Committee it was provided that no benefit or advantage, except a cottage or board and lodging, should be reckoned as payment of wages in lieu of payment in cash. The respondent employed a cowman under a contract in pursuance of which the employer supplied one pint of new milk daily, which was to be purchased by the cowman. The purchase price, amounting to 1s. 5½d. per week, was deducted from the cowman's wages. The justices found that the arrangement was "in the nature of a sale," and that the cowman "in effect" paid the purchase price by the deduction, but as there was, apart from his allowance, a deficiency in the wages paid they convicted the respondent. On a case stated as to the deduction of the price of milk, Held, that the respondent had done the very thing which the statute and Orders forbade. The set-off of the purchase price was simply reckoning the milk as payment in lieu of payment in cash.—HAYES v. CURTIS [Div. Ct.] 619

Treaty of Peace — "Nationals of the former Kingdom of Hungary"—Charges on British property—Acquiring nationality of Allied or Associated Power—Satisfaction of the Administrator—Jurisdiction of the Court—Treaty of Peace (Hungary) Order, 1921, ss. 1 (ix.), 2].—By s. 1 (ix.) of the Treaty of Peace (Hungary) Order, 1921, it is provided that "All property rights and interests within his Majesty's Dominions or Protectorates belonging to nationals of the former Kingdom of Hungary at the date when the treaty came into force"—namely, on July 26, 1921, shall be charged as therein mentioned. Held (following Rothschild v. Administrator of Austrian Property [1923] 2 Ch., 542), that the expression "nationals of the former Kingdom of Hungary" meant persons who were Hungarian nationals on October 28, 1918, when the Austrian Empire ceased to exist by the deposition of the Emperor. Where the Administrator of Hungarian property has determined that he is not satisfied that a national of the former Kingdom of Hungary has acquired ipso facto in accordance with the provisions of the Treaty the nationality of an Allied or Associated Power, the Court cannot go behind the decision of the Administrator and investigate the question anew. *Baron Reizes de Marienwert v. ARBITRATION—Contract—Assignment to third party of moneys due thereunder—Arbitration clause—Whether transferred to third party—Power of arbitrator—Effect of assignment—Law of Property Act, 1925 (15 Geo. V., c. 20), s. 136 (1)].—Building contractors assigned to a bank all moneys due and to become due to them under the building contract, which contained an arbitration clause, and the proper notice of the assignment was served on the building owners. Disputes having arisen regarding a claim by the contractors for compensation and extra payment, recourse was had to arbitration. Held, that the arbitrator had jurisdiction to entertain the arbitration since the contractors' rights under the arbitration clause did not constitute a "legal" or "other remedy" for the debt within the meaning of s. 136 (1) of the Law of Property Act, 1925, and were, therefore, not passed and transferred to the bank by the assignment. Held, further, that the arbitrator had to consider not merely the terms of the contract within the limits of the document but also the application and enforcement of those terms having regard to the whole legal position which the parties had created, including the relinquishment by the contractors themselves by the assignment of their right to claim the debt, and, therefore, that he must make his award in favour of the building owners.—COTTAGE CLUB ESTATES, LIMITED v. The purchasers accepted the bill and instructed their bank, the defendants, to pay the bill when due. When the bill became due the plaintiffs indorsed it in blank and handed it to their cashier to take to their own bank for collection. The cashier, however, took it to the defendants and asked for cash over the counter. He received the cash and absconded. In an action for negligence, breach of trust, and conversion, Held,

(1) that, as there was no privity of contract between the plaintiffs and the defendants, there was no duty to take care and therefore no negligence ; (2) that the defendants did not hold the money in trust for the plaintiffs; (3) that, as the demand for payment over the counter was, on the evidence, not so unusual that the defendants' suspicions ought to have been aroused, the defendants were protected by s. 59 of the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882 ; and that therefore the action failed.—AUCHTERONI AND CO. v. Crossed cheques — Protection of collecting banker — No title in customer — Receipt of payment by banker without negligence—Failure of banker to discharge burden of proof—Bills of Exchange Act, 1882 (45 and 46 Vict., c. 61), s. 82].—One L., who was the chief accountant at a branch of the plaintiff bank, and who had authority to sign cheques on their behalf, fraudulently drew upon another bank crossed cheques, signed by himself and by another official of the branch, and payable to the defendant bank, and, by letters written on the plaintiffs' office paper, he instructed the defendant bank to credit the proceeds to the joint account of himself and his wife at the defendant bank. The defendant bank collected the amounts of the cheques and credited them to the account, and L.'s practice was to draw the amounts out quickly after paying them in, and observation of the account would have shown that L. was engaged in extensive speculations through stockbrokers. In an action for damages for conversion of the cheques the defendants relied on the provisions contained in s. 82 of the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882. Held, that although the cheques were payable to the defendants themselves they had received payment "for a customer" within the meaning of the section and had done so in good faith, but that they had not discharged the burden of proving the absence of negligence on their part, and the plaintiffs were entitled to recover. V., c. 59), s. 38 (c)].—A bankrupt, before the date of the receiving order, had sold goods and handed over delivery orders to the purchasers upon payment made. The purchasers did not attempt to take delivery of the goods, which were in store, until after the date of the receiving order, and delivery was then refused upon the instructions of the bankrupt's agent, by whom the delivery orders had been signed, and in whose name and to whose order the goods were held in store. The trustee in bankruptcy claimed that the goods were in the possession, order, or disposition of the bankrupt at the date of the receiving order, and formed part of the bankrupt's estate. Held, on the facts, that the goods were not in the possession, order, or disposition of the bankrupt in such circumstances that he was the reputed owner thereof within the meaning of s. 38 (c) of the Bankruptcy Act, 1914 and did not form part of the bankrupt's estate.—SIMEONS AND COMPANY, LIMITED v. BILLS OF SALE—Validity—Contemporaneous mortgage forming part of contract—"Defeasance or condition"—Bills of Sale Act, 1878 (41 and 42 Vict., c. 31), s. 10 (3)].—By the Bills of Sale Act, 1878, s. 10 (3) : "If the bill of sale is made or given subject to any defeasance or condition, or declaration of trust not contained in the body thereof, such defeasance, condition, or declaration shall be deemed to be part of the bill, and shall be written on the same paper or parchment therewith before the registration, and shall be truly set forth in the copy filed under this Act therewith and as part thereof, otherwise the registration shall be void." The grantor of a bill of sale for £1,000 was being pressed by other creditors and approached the grantee for further financial assistance. It was ultimately agreed that the grantee should pay the other creditors a sum of £600, and receive a new bill of sale from the grantor for £1,600, the old bill being cancelled. Contemporaneously with the bill of sale, and as part of the same bargain, a mortgage instrument was executed by way of collateral security. The bill of sale provided for the repayment of the principal "on the 24th day of December next," and the mortgage instrument provided as follows : "The mortgagor . . . covenants with the mortgagee to pay him on the 24th day of December next the sum of £1,600 . . . and it is hereby agreed and declared that (subject to the right of the mortgagee to require repayment of the said principal sum on the 24th day of December next according to the foregoing covenant by the mortgagor or at any time thereafter) the principal money secured shall be repaid by instalments of not less than £20" on agreed dates. Held, that the clause in the mortgage providing for the repayment of the principal by instalments was not a variation of the terms of the bill of sale so as to amount to a "defeasance or condition" within the mischief of section 10 (3) of the Bills of Sale Act, 1878. Nova Scotia—Direct taxation—Powers of Province — Business tax — Imposition on owner of premises instead of occupier—Whether a "direct" tax—British North America Act, 1867 (30 and 31 Vict., c. 3), s. 92 (2)].—The respondent estate, which was the owner of premises in Halifax, Nova Scotia, and leased them to the Crown for use as a railway ticket office, the Crown to pay the business taxes (if any), was assessed and rated to business tax on the premises by the Halifax Corporation under its charter, which provided that the owner of property let to the Crown or to any person exempt from taxation should be deemed to be in occupation thereof and should be assessed and rated to business tax if the premises were used for business purposes. Ontario — Education — Roman Catholic separate schools — British North America Act, 1867 (30 and 31 Vict., c. 3), s. 93 (1)].—By s. 20 of the Separate Schools Act, 1863, of the United Province, afterwards divided into the provinces of Ontario and Quebec, "Every separate school shall be entitled to a share in the fund annually granted by the Legislature of this Province for the support of common schools, and shall be entitled also to a share in all other public grants, investments and allotments for common school purposes now made or hereafter to be made by the province or the municipal authorities. . . ." By section 26 the Roman Catholic separate schools were to be subject to such inspection as might be directed from time to time by the Chief Superintendent and were to be "subject also to such regulations as might be imposed from time to time by the Council of Public Instruction for Upper Canada." The above Act was in force at the passing of the British North America Act, 1867, which provided by s. 93: "In and for each province the Legislature may exclusively make laws in relation to education, subject and according to the following provisions:—(1) Nothing in any such law shall prejudicially affect any right or privilege with respect to denominational schools which any class of persons have by law in the province at the union. . . ." Held, that as the legislation in force in 1867, in what is now the province of Ontario, provided for the regulation of separate schools and did not entitle them to a fixed share in the fund granted for the support of common schools, the Legislature of the province of Ontario was not precluded by s. 93 (1) of the Act of 1867 from passing Acts for the regulation of separate schools and for the alteration of the amount of their share in the educational grant. VII., c. 16 (Quebec statute), ss. 1, 6].—By s. 1 of the Quebec statute, 3 Edw. VII., c. 16, "Any provision to the contrary notwithstanding, in all the municipalities of the Province, whether governed, as regards schools, by the Education Act or by special laws, or by the Education Act and by special laws, persons professing the Jewish religion shall, for school purposes, be treated in the same manner as Protestants, and, for the said purposes, shall be subject to the same obligations and shall enjoy the same rights and privileges as the latter." By s. 6, "After the coming into force of this Act, the children of persons professing the Jewish religion shall have the same right to be educated in the public schools of the Province as Protestant children, and shall be treated in the same manner as Protestants for all school purposes." Held, that under s. 93 of the British North America Act, 1867, this statute is not ultra vires except so far as it would enable persons professing the Jewish religion to be appointed to the Protestant Board of School Commissioners in the City of Quebec or Montreal or to any Protestant Board of Examiners or to take part with Protestants in the establishment of a dissentient school outside those cities, and except so far as it would confer the right of attendance at dissentient schools outside the cities of Quebec and Montreal upon persons of religious faith different from that of the dissentient minority. The Provincial Legislature can pass legislation to establish separate schools for persons who are neither Roman Catholics nor Protestants, provided that it does not interfere with the rights of the two Christian communities in their denominational schools. Held, that where an agreement affecting land has not been executed and attested in the manner required by the above enactment, the operation of the enactment cannot be avoided either by an application of the principle of the decision in Forster v. Hale (3 Ves., 696; 5 Ves., 308) or under the equitable doctrine of part performance, but such an agreement may be valid merely for the purpose of establishing a partnership between the parties. *Pate v. COMPANIES—Agreement by director confirmed by secretary — Ostensible authority — Estoppel].—Two rival companies, the P. Company and the W. Company, formed a new company, the respondent company, to take over certain branches of their business of fruit importers, the shares in the new company being held in equal proportion by the old companies, and the board of the new company consisting of two directors of the P. Company, namely, M.L. and his brother, and two directors of the W. Company. By an agreement embodied in a letter of July 22, 1924, between M.L. and the appellants, a firm of fruit brokers, it was arranged that the appellants should make certain advances to the P. Company and should receive all fruit consigned either to the P. Company or to the respondent company and keep back 70 per cent. of the net proceeds in reduction of the advances, and it was stipulated that the respondent company should subscribe to this arrangement. This arrangement was followed by a formal agreement under the seal of the P. Company, but there was no corresponding agreement by the respondent company. The secretary of the respondent company, however, wrote to the appellants purporting to confirm the arrangement. This arrangement was not known to the directors of the respondent company, other than the L. brothers, until some months after it had been put in operation, and, as soon as they became aware of it, it was put an end to. The appellants obtained certain fruit consigned to the respondent company without production of the bills of lading on giving an indemnity to the ship, and they sued the respondents for delivery of the bills of lading. The respondents counterclaimed for the proceeds of fruit belonging to the respondents and not accounted for. Held (Lord Shaw of Dunfermline dissenting), (1) that there was not in fact any agreement binding on the respondents; (2) that the respondents were not estopped from denying the existence of the agreement by the knowledge of the two directors who were participators in the wrong done to the respondents, or on the ground that an inspection of the books of the company would have disclosed the arrangement. In re Hampshire Land Company (12 The Times L.R., 517; [1896] 2 Ch., 743) applied. The plaintiff proceeded overseas and performed his duties under the agreement till differences arose and he resigned. In an action by the plaintiff for salary due under the agreement, Held, that the agreement was ultra vires the board, and since the plaintiff's remuneration had never been determined by the company in general meeting, as required by Art. 69 of Table A, he could not recover, but must repay to the company on their counterclaim the money paid to him under the agreement.—KERR v. VII., c. 69), ss. 81 (1) (e), 285].—The plaintiff had invested £3,000 in a company of which the defendant was the principal promoter and managing director, having been induced to do so by statements contained in two documents drafted by the defendant, one being signed by the defendant and his co-directors, of which about 20 to 30 copies were typed for circulation by the directors among their friends with the object of raising additional capital, and the other being a letter, on the company's notepaper on which the names of the directors appeared, sent by the defendant to a co-director. The letter was marked private and confidential. The plaintiff, who was an utter stranger to the company and unknown to any of its directors, received a copy of the documents through a friend of one of the directors of the company to whom the documents had been sent with the knowledge of the defendant and other directors of the company with the object of raising capital from wealthy clients or from fathers who had a son to place. In an action by the plaintiff, claiming damages for a breach of the requirements of section 81 (1) (e), of the Companies (Consolidation) Act, 1908, in that the documents omitted to state the number and amount of shares which within the two preceding years had been issued as fully paid otherwise than in cash, these two documents were found by the jury on the evidence to constitute an offer of shares made by the company to the public. This finding was not challenged; but to the question whether the documents were in fact issued to the public, the jury answered, "There is no proof of this." They also found that the plaintiff had suffered damage because the documents had omitted to state that a number of the shares had been issued as fully paid up otherwise than in cash within the two preceding years. Held (Scrutton, L.J., dissenting), that the plaintiff was a member of the public, and it had been proved that the documents, which had been settled and approved by the directors of the company, who were making desperate efforts to raise capital, were reproduced for the purpose of reaching a limited section of the public, and that the documents, which ultimately reached the hands of the plaintiff, a stranger, were issued by or on behalf of the company or by or on behalf of a person who was or had been engaged or interested in the formation of the company within the meaning of section 81 of the Companies (Consolidation) Act, 1908, and as the plaintiff had proved that he had suffered damage by reason of the omission of the documents to state the information required by subs. (1) (e) of that section the plaintiff was entitled to recover damages against the defendant.—LYNDE v. NASH [C.A.] 357

VII., c. 69), ss. 131 (2), (3), and (6), 210, 212].—Less than three months before the commencement of its compulsory winding-up in a County Court, a company having a paid-up capital of less than £10,000 issued debentures to the extent of £4,500 in favour of two persons. The liquidator moved in the County Court for a declaration that the debentures were invalid either as a fraudulent preference under s. 210 or as a floating charge created otherwise than for cash under s. 212 of the Companies (Consolidation) Act, 1908, and that the persons named in the debentures had no rights in respect of the sums expressed to be secured thereby except as unsecured creditors. Held, that the deputy County Court Judge had jurisdiction to entertain the liquidator's application, and, as he had done so, his discretion could not be interfered with. In re Ilkley Hotel Company ([1893] 1 Q.B., 248) and In re Centrifugal Butter Company, Limited ([1913] 1 Ch., 188) distinguished.—IN RE F. Winding-up—Insurance of company against claims—Judgment against company—Subsequent liquidation—Payment by insurers to liquidator—Whether amount payable to judgment creditor—Availability for general creditors].—The applicant obtained judgment against a limited company for damages for personal injuries and costs. Afterwards the company went into liquidation, and the insurance company with which the company in liquidation was insured paid the amount of the damages and costs to the liquidator. Held, that the applicant was not entitled to have the amount in question paid to him by the liquidator, but it formed part of the assets for distribution among the general creditors, including the applicant. Winding-up — Proof — Contract of marine insurance — No stamped policies — Rejection of proof]. — Held, that the liquidator had rightly rejected a proof by the English Insurance Company, Limited, in the winding-up of the National Benefit Assurance Company, Limited, in that the contract between the two companies in respect of which the proof of debt was advanced was a contract of marine insurance and no stamped policy of marine insurance was issued to the English Insurance Company, Limited, as required by law, and therefore the contract was invalid. There is no authority for allowing costs out of the estate in a probate action to an unsuccessful party who merely seeks to prove, in the case of a will duly executed by a testator of sound disposing mind, that the testator had a domicile under the law of which that party would take a large part of the testator's

CONSPIRACY—Duress—Trade union—Member's breach of rule—Threat to put on "stop list"—Offer to withdraw threat for payment—Payment—Whether money recoverable].—The plaintiffs were motor dealers and were members of a trade union which had rules providing that motor cars were not to be sold below a certain price and that persons breaking the rules might be put on the "stop list," in which case other members were forbidden to deal with them. By giving certain allowances to the purchaser of a car the plaintiffs sold it at less than the fixed price and the "stop list" committee of the trade union informed them that their names would be put on the "stop list" unless they paid £200 to the indemnity fund of the union. The plaintiffs paid a first instalment of £100 and brought an action against an official and two members of the committee of the union to recover it on the ground of conspiracy to obtain it from them under duress. Held, that it was lawful to put a man on the "stop list" for breaking a rule, and the intimation of an intention to put him on it when he had broken a rule could not be unlawful, and the agreement to accept the payment was not unlawful but was a mere compromise of a dispute which involved no criminality, and therefore the action failed. *Rex v. CONTRACT — Actor — Appearance — Leading actor of company—Provision for substitute in case of illness of a principal—Illness of leading actor—Impossibility of appearing—Whether basis of contract gone].—The plaintiff, who was an actor, made with the defendants an agreement by which the plaintiff was to find a company, described as consisting of himself and a full company, and in the event of the non-appearance of a principal the plaintiff was to provide a deputy to the satisfaction of the defendants. The plaintiff became too ill to appear, but he provided a substitute. The defendants thereupon alleged that as the plaintiff could not appear the basis of the contract was gone. In an action for damages for breach of the contract, Held, that the plaintiff was a principal to whom the clause as to the provision of a deputy applied and his absence was not a frustration of the contract and he was entitled to damages. Breach — Restraint of trade — Penalty or liquidated damages — Hops pickable but not picked — Whether grown or produced].—The plaintiff company, which was formed to act as selling agents for members growing hops, made with the defendant, who was a member and a hop grower, a contract whereby the defendant agreed that he would deliver to the plaintiffs, for sale by them, all the hops "grown" by him on particular lands in certain years, including 1926, and that if he failed to deliver to the plaintiffs any hops "produced" by him, or if he disposed of such hops otherwise than through the plaintiffs, he would pay to the plaintiffs £100 per acre as liquidated damages. The defendant cultivated the 1926 crop in the usual way, and from August 10, when the hops were pickable, but not picked, he leased the lands in question for five years to a company controlled by himself. In an action for breach of contract by reason of failure to deliver the 1926 crop to the plaintiffs, Held, (1) that although the defendant had leased the lands with the hops still growing upon them he had nevertheless "grown or produced" the hops inasmuch as they were pickable, and by disposing of them otherwise than to the plaintiffs he had broken the contract; (2) that the contract was not an unreasonable restraint of trade; (3) that the £100 per acre was to be deemed to be liquidated damages and not a penalty; and that therefore the plaintiffs were entitled to recover that amount.—ENGLISH HOP GROWERS, LIMITED v. DERING [C.A.] .. 443

Building contract — Retention fund — Specific fund — Assignment — Debentures—Floating charge—Appointment of receiver —Priorities].—By a lump sum building contract entered into in 1922 between S. and Co., Limited ("the contractors"), and the defendants, provision was made for interim payments on the architect's certificates, to be given monthly at the rate of 90 per cent. of the value of all work executed. The remaining 10 per cent. ("the retention fund") was to be retained and deposited in a bank until the final adjustment of accounts. The contract was varied by consent, and in the events that happened the retention fund amounted to £1,000 at the beginning of 1924; this was never deposited in a bank and remained a merely notional fund, but both parties treated it as a separate sum capable of being earmarked. It was included, without distinction, in the architect's final certificate for £1,848 10s. 2d., on January 28, 1927. Meanwhile, the plaintiffs, who were supplying cement to the contractors, found that the latter were getting into arrears with their payments, and to obtain further credit the contractors, being then indebted to the plaintiffs in the sum of £671 on April 7, 1924, assigned to them the retention fund by a document in these terms: "In reduction of the amount now or to be owing from us to you for goods supplied by you, we hereby assign to you all moneys now or hereafter to become due to us from the Hemsworth R.D.C. for retention moneys in respect of the G. Housing Scheme, and for which your receipt shall be a sufficient discharge. . . ." Due notice of that assignment was given to the defendants next day. The contractors had at various dates between 1900 and February 2, 1924, issued to the Manchester and County Bank, Limited, a number of debentures charging the undertaking of the contractors and all their property, both present and future, the charge being a specific charge on the contractors' freehold and leasehold property, machinery, goodwill, and uncalled capital, and a floating charge on all the company's other assets, subject to a proviso that the contractors were not to be at liberty to create any mortgage or charge on any of their assets in priority to the debentures. On October 13, 1924, a receiver for the debenture-holders was appointed, who duly entered into possession. On October 20, 1924, a resolution was passed for the voluntary winding-up of the company. The receiver refused to recognize the right of the plaintiffs to payment under their assignment in priority to the debenture-holders, and on the architect's final certificate being given in January, 1927, the defendants declined to interplead and paid the retention moneys to the receiver for the debenture-holders, and the plaintiffs thereupon brought their action on their assignment. The Judge gave judgment for the plaintiffs, and the defendants appealed, not raising any question as to priorities, but contending that the assignors ought to have been joined as parties. Held, that the retention money, although not becoming payable until a later date than the assignment, constituted a debt or legal thing in action which could be assigned, and could be sued for in an action without joining the assignors as parties; and that the assignment was a good assignment, and the plaintiffs were entitled to recover on it. Carriage of goods by sea — Obligations of shipowners — Alleged breach of duty — Repair of ship — Hatches left open — Damage to cargo—Negligence—Exception—"Management of ship"—Carriage of Goods by Sea Act, 1924 (14 and 15 Geo. V., c. 22), Schedule, Art. IV. (2) (a)].—The plaintiffs had a quantity of tinplates shipped for conveyance by the defendants' steamer from Swansea to Vancouver, and, after the tinplates had been taken on board, the ship went to Liverpool and had to be detained there for repairs. For this purpose part of the cargo had to be shifted, and through the negligence of the ship's officers the hatches were left open with the result that rain got into the hold, and when the tinplates were discharged at Vancouver they were found to have been damaged by rust. In an action for damages for breach of duty in the carriage of the tinplates, Held (Greer, L.J., dissenting), that as the negligent management of part of the ship, namely, the hatches, caused the damage, and as this management was in the course of repairing the ship for the voyage, there was "management of the ship" within the exception in Article IV. (2) (a) of the Schedule to the Carriage of Goods by Sea Act, 1924, and the action failed. Decision of Wright, J. (43 The Times L.R., 544; [1927] 2 K.B., 432), reversed.—GOSSE MILLARD, LIMITED v. Commercial traveller — Use of motor-car — Motoring offence — Suspension of licence — Dismissal — Claim for damages — Non-disclosure of motoring offence before the agreement].—The plaintiff, who was a commercial traveller, was employed by the defendants under an agreement which provided that the plaintiff was to use a motor-car for the carriage of samples. The plaintiff was convicted of driving the car to the common danger and was fined £10 and his driving licence was suspended for three months. The defendants thereupon terminated the plaintiff's employment on the ground that these facts constituted misconduct justifying dismissal. In an action for wrongful dismissal the defendants also pleaded that before the agreement was made the plaintiff ought to have informed them that he had previously been convicted of being drunk when in charge of a motor-car and been sentenced to imprisonment for driving it in a manner dangerous to the public. Held, that in the case of such an agreement as the plaintiff had with the defendants there was no obligation on him to disclose his previous conviction for a motoring offence, and that the conviction during the currency of the agreement, even although the plaintiff's licence was suspended, was not a ground for terminating the agreement, as the plaintiff could have got someone to drive the car. The plaintiff was therefore held entitled to damages.—HANDS v. SIMPSON FAWCETT AND CO., LIMITED [Finlay, J.] .. 295

Company — Russian insurance company—Decree of Soviet Government — Confiscation — Effect on reinsurance treaties with English reinsurance company—Frustration].—By virtue of a Decree of the Soviet Government, which came into operation on December 1, 1918, and of certain subsequent decrees, insurance business in Russia was declared to be the monopoly of the State and financial transactions in Russia were regulated. An action was commenced for the determination of the effect of the above decrees on certain treaties of reinsurance entered into between a Russian reinsurance company, having a branch office in London, and an English reinsurance company. Held, that the above decrees did not prevent the Russian company from discharging their liabilities to the English company under one of the treaties by a payment in London out of their assets outside Russia or by means of a set off against the liabilities of the English company to them under the treaties.—FIRST RUSSIAN INSURANCE COMPANY (IN LIQUIDATION) v. Determination — No provision giving power to determine — Supply of gas to local authority — Whether contract binding for ever].—The plaintiffs, a gas company, made a contract with the defendants, a local authority, to light all the public lamps in the defendants' area "from and after the first day of September in every year up to the following first day of May inclusive." The contract contained no provision for its determination by either party, but it recited an earlier agreement which was to remain in force until the defendants should determine it; and a supplemental agreement provided that the property in new lamps was to vest in the defendants if the contract lasted 15 years. After some years the defendants served on the plaintiffs a notice determining the contract on the expiration of four months. In an action for a declaration that the defendants could not determine the contract without the plaintiffs' consent, Held, that it was in the power of the defendants to determine the contract, and the action failed. Decision of Russell, J. ([1927] W.N., 325) affirmed.—CREDITON GAS COMPANY v. CREDITON URBAN DISTRICT COUNCIL [C.A.] 369 hirers for damage to crane—Owners' breach of contract to insure—Failure of claim].—The defendants hired a crane-barge from the plaintiffs, one of the terms of the contract being that the plaintiffs would insure the crane against all risks, the defendants paying the premium. The plaintiffs accordingly took out a policy covering, as they thought, all risks. The crane, when proceeding to lift a load, broke away from its bedplate and fell over and was damaged. It was then found that the accident was not covered by the policy, and the defendants refused to pay for the damage. In an action for breach of contract, Held, that though the defendants had failed to discharge the onus, which was upon them, of proving that what happened was not the result of negligence by their servants, yet, as the agreement in regard to insurance was intended to be an arrangement for the benefit of both parties, and as the accident came within the description "all risks" and the defendants had stipulated that they were not to bear those risks, the action failed.—BRICE AND SONS v. CHRISTIANI AND NIELSEN [Rowlatt, J.] 335

Indemnity — Undertaking to indemnify against all claims — Whether inclusive of claims by the persons giving the undertaking].—The plaintiffs took a lease of premises from the defendant railway company, and, by an agreement supplemental to the lease, the defendants gave the plaintiffs permission, on certain terms, to use for the transport of materials a portable gangway which could be moved over certain of the defendants' railway lines. One of the terms was that the plaintiffs "agree and undertake to indemnify the said [railway] company against all claims and demands or liability whatsoever whether in respect of damage to person or property arising out of or in connexion with the existence or user of the said gangway." When the plaintiffs were using the gangway some trucks were shunted down the line, and a lorry standing on the gangway was damaged. In an action for damages for negligence and/or breach of duty the defendants denied liability and pleaded the aforesaid term of the supplemental agreement. On a preliminary point as to the construction of the agreement, Held, that the undertaking was only one to hold the defendants harmless against claims by third parties, and the preliminary point must be decided in favour of the plaintiffs. Decision of the Court of Appeal (43 The Times L.R., 679) affirmed.—GREAT WESTERN RAILWAY COMPANY v. J. DURNFORD AND SON, LIMITED [H.L.] 415

Sale of goods — C.i.f. contract — Resale by buyers — Bill of lading — Date of shipment incorrectly stated—Repudiation by sub-purchasers—Measure of damages payable by vendors to original buyers].—In 1920 the plaintiffs bought from the defendants a quantity of sugar in Java, the sale being c.i.f. Bombay, and shipment was to be made in September, 1920. The sugar was not loaded on the steamer till October. The bill of lading, which was dated September 30, stated that the sugar had been shipped, and the plaintiffs, being unaware of the true facts, took up the shipping documents on presentation and paid the price. The plaintiffs then resold part of the sugar by a contract which stated that the bill of lading should be conclusive evidence of the date of shipment. The market was falling, and the sub-purchasers, having discovered that the sugar was not of September shipment, refused to carry out their contract, and the plaintiffs sold the sugar by auction at a lower price. In an action by the plaintiffs against the defendants for breach of contract, Held, that it was an implied condition of the contract that the bill of lading should correctly state the date of shipment, and the plaintiffs were not bound to enforce against their sub-buyers a statement which they (the plaintiffs) knew to be untrue, and the measure of the damages to which the plaintiffs were entitled was the difference between the contract price which they had paid on taking delivery and the market price of the sugar.—JAMES FINLAY AND CO., LIMITED v. Sale of goods — Conditions — Notice of appropriation — Date of bill of lading to be stated — Notice to be given within seven days from such date — Provisional invoice — Whether a good notice of appropriation — Whether despatch within the seven days sufficient].—The respondents in Rotterdam contracted to buy from the appellants in Hamburg 6,000 tons of South Russian wheat, the conditions of the contract providing that notice of appropriation with ship's name and date of bill of lading should be given by the shippers to the buyers within seven days from date of bill of lading, and that provisional invoice with ship's name and date of bill of lading should be sent by the shippers' London house to the buyers within three days from the arrival of the documents in London. The sellers shipped the wheat at Novorossisk, and within the seven days the sellers sent to the buyers a telegram and confirming letter, which the sellers alleged to be a notice of appropriation, but neither document stated the date of the bill of lading. On the same day the sellers posted to the buyers a provisional invoice which gave the date of the bill of lading, but the provisional invoice was not received by the buyers until after the expiry of the seven days. The buyers contended that there had been no tender in conformity with the contract, and it was found by the Appeal Committee in an arbitration that there had been no good notice of appropriation in the telegram and confirming letter and that the provisional invoice was not intended as a notice of appropriation, and that it was a recognized custom that notice of appropriation and provisional invoice should be separate documents, and that therefore the buyers were under no liability to the sellers. Held, on a case stated, that even if the provisional invoice constituted a notice of appropriation, yet, as it was not received by the buyers within the contract time, the sellers had not satisfied the contract, since despatch within that time was not a compliance with the condition that the notice should be given to the buyers within that time. Semble, the provisional invoice was not a notice of appropriation. Decision of Wright, J. (44 The Times L.R., 10), affirmed.—COMPAGNIE CONTINENTALE D'IMPORTATION v. Sale of goods—"Note or memorandum in writing"—Action originally founded on previous contract—Plea in defence in that action — "Earnest" — Undertaking to pay third party's debts—"Part payment"—Sale of Goods Act, 1893 (56 and 57 Vict., c. 71), s. 4 (1)].—Partners in a firm brought an action for damages for breach of a written contract for the sale of goods. In the defence, which was signed by counsel, the defendants pleaded that the firm had been converted into a limited company and that it had been orally agreed between that company and the defendants that, in consideration of the company's undertaking to pay certain debts owing to the defendants by the firm and to perform the obligations of the firm under the written contract, the defendants would supply to the company the goods sold under the written contract. Subsequently the action was amended, the company being substituted as plaintiffs and the cause of action being expressed to be for the breach of the oral agreement. Held, that the plea in the original defence in which the oral agreement was set out was a "note or memorandum in writing . . . signed by the party to be charged or his agent in that behalf" of that oral contract within s. 4 (1) of the Sale of Goods Act, 1893. Held, further, that the undertaking to pay the firm's debts did not constitute the giving of "something in earnest to bind the contract" within s. 4 (1), being rather part of the consideration for the contract, but that the payment of those moneys was given "in part payment" within the subsection.—FARR, SMITH, AND CO., LIMITED v. Wages agreement — Whether submission to an award].—By a Conciliation Board Agreement provision was made for the payment of a subsistence allowance to low-paid colliery workers in South Wales, and, the parties having failed to agree as to the amount and conditions of payment, the matter came before the independent chairman of the Board and he gave a decision. The parties failed to agree as to the interpretation of the decision, and the chairman gave a supplemental decision, but he declined to give any further interpretation. Representative workmen then brought an action against representative employers for declarations, (1) that on the true construction of the decision the subsistence allowance ought to be calculated for each shift separately, and

(2) as to the method of reckoning overtime for the purpose of calculating subsistence allowance. The Judge in chambers, on the grounds that the wages agreement incorporating the conciliation agreement amounted to a submission to arbitration, and that the chairman's decisions were awards, made an order that the action be adjourned and that the awards be remitted to the chairman to deal with the two questions raised by the pleadings. Held, on appeal, that the chairman's decisions were not awards but had become parts of an agreement between employers and workmen which must be construed by the Court, and the order of the Judge must be set aside.—CHARLES AND OTHERS v. Broadcasting—Opera—Music—Performance in public—"Broadcasting" by wireless telephony—Grant by composer of right to perform—Assignment or licence—Whether grant determinable on death—Copyright Act, 1911 (1 and 2 Geo. V., c. 46), s. 1].—By an agreement dated March 23, 1905, the plaintiff granted to G. E. "the sole and exclusive right of representing or performing" in certain areas a play, of the music of which the plaintiff was the composer. G. E. died in 1915, and in 1920 his executors assigned to a limited company the benefits of copyright and other rights previously held by G. E. In October, 1926, the limited company agreed to permit the defendants to "broadcast" by wireless telephony a performance of the opera. The defendants "broadcast" the opera from their studio, to which the public was not admitted. In an action for breach of copyright the Judge held, (1) that the defendants gave a public performance of the opera within section 1 of the Copyright Act, 1911, and (2) that, as the agreement of March 23, 1905, was not an assignment by the plaintiff to G. E. of all his performing rights, but was a licence confined to ordinary performances at a theatre, and of such a personal character as to be determinable on the death of G. E., the defendants had acquired no lawful licence to perform the opera in public and were, therefore, liable in damages to the plaintiff. On an appeal by the defendants on the second point, Held, that the agreement of March 23, 1905, was not limited to performances at a theatre and was not a mere licence but was an assignment to G.E. of rights which either he or his executors could assign, and the defendants were protected, and therefore the action failed. Decision of McCardie, J. (43 The Times L.R., 818) reversed.—MESSAGER v. BRITISH BROADCASTING COMPANY, LIMITED [C.A.] .. 247

Original literary work — Phrase in advertisement — Beauty "a social necessity"—Copyright Act, 1911 (1 and 2 Geo. The defendant, who carried on the business of a beauty specialist and was in the habit of advertising his beauty treatment, then began to use in his advertisements the words, "A youthful appearance is a social necessity." In an action for breach of copyright, Held, that the plaintiff's phrase was not an "original literary work" within s. 1 of the Copyright Act, 1911, and the action failed. Decision of Humphreys, J. Infanticide — "Newly-born child" — Child a month old—Infanticide Act, 1922 (12 and 13 Geo. V., c. 18), s. 1 (2)].—The appellant was charged with the murder of her child who had been born on August 19, 1927, and had been strangled by her on September 21, 1927. The Judge at the trial held that there was no evidence to go to the jury that the child was "newly-born" within s. 1 (2) of the Infanticide Act, 1922. Held, that that ruling was correct. Observations on the form of statements made by accused persons while under arrest.—REX v. O'DONOGHUE [C.C.A.] 51

Vagrancy—Incorrigible rogue—Previous conviction—"Shall be deemed a rogue and vagabond" — Vagrancy Act, 1824 (5 Geo. IV., c. 83), ss. 4, 5].—It is not necessary in order that a person may be dealt with as an incorrigible rogue under s. 5 of the Vagrancy Act, 1824, on a second conviction for any of the offences named in s. 4 of that Act, that the previous conviction should use the actual words "rogue and vagabond," since the statute itself provides that a person convicted of any of those offences "shall be deemed a rogue and vagabond."—REX v. TEESDALE [C.C.A.] 30

DEFAMATION — Libel — Defence that statement was not defamatory—Finding of jury to that effect — Refusal of new trial].—Observations on the circumstances in which the finding of a jury that an alleged libel was not defamatory is unassailable.—LOCKHART v. HARRISON [H.L.] 794

Libel — Privilege — Absolute privilege —Letter to solicitor from client].—Defamatory written statements made to a solicitor by a client for the purpose of obtaining professional advice and assistance are absolutely privileged, at all events where they are relevant to that purpose. Judgment of Swift, J. (44 The Times L.R., 546), affirmed.—MORE v. WEAVER [C.A.] 710

DEFAMATION] PAGE

Slander — Chauffeur giving "joy rides" in employer's motor-car — Verdict that words were not defamatory].—The plaintiff, a chauffeur formerly employed by the defendant, brought a slander action against the defendant, complaining that during his employment she had falsely alleged that he gave "joy rides" to women in her motor-car. The jury found that the defendant spoke the words but that they were not defamatory of the plaintiff. On an application for a new trial on the ground that the verdict was perverse and one which no jury could reasonably find, Held, (Russell, J., dissenting), that it was for the jury to say whether the words did or did not constitute a slander, and their verdict must stand.—BROOME v. AGAR [C.A.] .. 339

DENTISTS—Register—Erasure of name—Conviction—"Felony or misdemeanour"—Offence triable summarily—Dentists Act, 1878 (41 and 42 Vict., c. 33), s. 13—Dentists Act, 1921 (11 and 12 Geo. V., c. 21), s. 8].—The power given to the General Medical Council by s. 13 of the Dentists Act, 1878, as amended by s. 8 of the Dentists Act, 1921, to erase from the Dental Register the name of any dentist who has been convicted of "felony or misdemeanour," includes a power of erasure in the case of an offence triable summarily and not upon indictment.—PICKUP v. DENTAL BOARD OF THE UNITED KINGDOM [Div. Ct.] 544

Register — Retention of name — Annual fee — Non-payment — Regulation providing for removal of name — Whether intra vires — Dentists Act, 1921 (11 and 12 Geo. V., c. 21), s. 7].—By s. 7 of the Dentists Act, 1921, the Dental Board may make regulations as to keeping a register of dentists, as to removal from the register and restoration thereto, and as to prescribing a fee for retaining thereon in any year the names of persons registered after July 27, 1921, but the Act contained no provision for removing from the register the name of a person failing to pay the fee for retention. The Board made a regulation providing that an annual fee of £5 should be paid for retaining on the register the name of any person registered after the above date and that unless it was paid before December 31 the Registrar should remove the name from the register. Held, that as non-retention on the register was a necessary consequence of non-payment of the fee for retention the regulation was within the powers conferred by the Act.—TATTERSALL v. SLADEN [Astbury, J.] 237

DIVORCE — Application to expedite — Wife's petition—Expected birth of child of woman named in petition — Public policy — Refusal].—The Court, on the ground of public policy, refused an application by a wife, petitioning for a divorce on the ground of her husband's adultery, that the trial of the suit in the undefended list might be expedited so that the decree might be made absolute, and the respondent might marry the woman named in the petition, before the birth of a child expected to be born as the result of the respondent's relations with that woman.—P. v. P. [Lord Merrivale, P.] 114

Costs—Husband's petition for dissolution of marriage — Wife's admission of birth of child—No allegation by her that petitioner was the father—Denial of adultery with co-respondent—Security for costs].—On a husband's petitioning for divorce on the ground of his wife's alleged adultery with a named co-respondent, the paternity of a child being in dispute, the wife by her answer admitted the birth of the child, and she did not allege that the petitioner was the father, but she denied adultery with the co-respondent. It was urged on behalf of the petitioner that the pleadings showed that the wife had not a good ground for her defence so as to justify an order against her husband to secure her costs. In accordance with an offer made by the petitioner an order was made for security to be given without payment into Court.—S. v. S. AND P. [Lord Merrivale, P.] 52

Decree absolute for wife — Permanent maintenance — Husband's disposable income—Calculation of tax].—In estimating the disposable income of a divorced husband in order to ascertain the amount of permanent maintenance to be paid to his former wife, deductions in respect of income-tax and supertax, allowable from his gross income, are the normal amount of such taxes chargeable against him. An abnormal income-tax charge made in a particular year in respect of much greater earnings in a previous period cannot be deducted from the gross income for the purpose of calculating the disposable income in futuro. *Dayrell-Steyning v. Judicial separation—Jurisdiction—Residence—Service—Respondent outside jurisdiction at commencement of suit—Matrimonial home—Statute of Citations, 1531 (23 Henry VIII., c. 9), s. 2—Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925 (15 and 16 Geo. V., c. 49), s. 32].—Personal presence of the respondent in England at the date of the filing of a petition for judicial separation is not essential for the founding of such a suit, although the proceedings are governed by the principles and rules of the Ecclesiastical Courts. The real question is whether at the time when the petition, endorsed with the citation, is issued for service the respondent is resident within the jurisdiction. Graham v. Graham (39 The Times L.R., 139 ; [1923] P., 31) and Armytage v. Armytage (14 The Times L.R., 480 ; [1898] P., 178) distinguished.—RAEBURN v. RAEBURN [Lord Merrivale, P.] 384, 421

Court's refusal to proceed with petition for alimony pendente lite—Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act 1925 (15 and 16 Geo. V., c. 49)—Matrimonial Causes Rules, 1924, Nos. 57-59 and 61].—After a wife has been granted a decree of judicial separation it is too late to proceed with her petition for alimony pendente lite, even though it may have been commenced before the decree was pronounced.—M. v. M. [Lord Merrivale, P.] 299

Judicial separation — Wife's petition — Husband's adultery—Powers of Court—Limited discretion to refuse decree—Matrimonial Causes Act, 1857 (20 and 21 Vict., c. 85), ss. 16, 31—Matrimonial Causes Act, 1923 (13 and 14 Geo. V., c. 19), s. 1—Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925 (15 and 16 Geo. V., c. 49), ss. 178, 185].—Where a wife petitions for judicial separation on the ground of adultery proved to have been committed by her husband since July, 1923, the Court has only a limited discretion to refuse a decree of judicial separation. Such a refusal must be based on some legal ground that constituted an absolute or discretionary bar according to the practice of the Ecclesiastical Courts, or upon the ground that the suit is not brought bona fide but merely for some collateral purpose. The Court's opinion that the relief to be granted should be dissolution of marriage and not judicial separation is not a legal ground for refusing the relief prayed for.—BLANCHARD v. BLANCHARD [Hill, J.] 313

Jurisdiction—Parties domiciled in England at time of and after marriage—Desertion of wife by husband—Decree of judicial separation granted to wife—Wife's suit for divorce—Husband's protest to jurisdiction—New domicile alleged—Wife's plea of estoppel].—A wife married in England to an Englishman, domiciled in England, was granted a decree of judicial separation on the ground of her husband's desertion. He afterwards took up his abode in France. Later she filed a petition for the dissolution of her marriage. The husband appeared under protest to the jurisdiction, on the ground that he had acquired a new domicile in France. An order was made by the Registrar for the question of domicile to be tried as a preliminary issue. The wife appealed against the order on the ground that the husband, having deserted his wife, could not be heard to say that he had changed his domicile for the purpose of ousting the jurisdiction in divorce of the English Court. Held, that jurisdiction in divorce in England depends upon domicile, and that the domicile is that of the husband ; that the apparent exception to this rule stated by Lord Gorell in Armytage v. Armytage (14 The Times L.R., 480 ; [1898] P., 178) and Ogden v. Ogden (24 The Times L.R., 94 ; [1908] P., 46, at p. 78) cannot be sustained on an examination of the authorities ; and that estoppel is a rule of evidence which cannot be invoked as a bar in limine, though such a plea may be considered at the trial of the issue of domicile.—H. v. H. (No. 2) [Lord Merrivale, P.] 711

Maintenance — Deed of separation — Covenant by husband to provide allowance —Covenant by wife not to sue for further support, alimony, or maintenance—Decree absolute for dissolution granted to wife on the ground of husband's adultery—Petition by her for maintenance—Covenant pleaded in bar—Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925 (15 and 16 Geo. V., c. 49), s. 190].—A woman who in a deed of separation covenants in consideration of certain benefits not to claim from her husband in the future maintenance or alimony, and is afterwards granted a decree absolute of divorce, is not debarred from petitioning for maintenance after the dissolution of marriage, notwithstanding that the deed contained no provision for its termination on the marriage being dissolved. So held, per Lord Hanworth, M.R., Scrutton, Greer, and Sankey, L.JJ.—Lawrence and Russell, L.JJ., dissenting. Decisions of Hill, J. (44 The Times L.R., 466) and Lord Merrivale, P. Nullity — Husband's petition — Ceremony of marriage in England — French decree dissolving wife's previous marriage — Decree not complete—Wife's order for restitution of conjugal rights—Appearance by husband — Estoppel].—If a man goes through the form of a ceremony of marriage in England with a woman who is not really free to marry owing to a foreign decree of divorce not having become effective at the time of the English ceremony, and if afterwards, with full knowledge of this fact, he does not raise the question of the validity of the English marriage when sued for restitution of conjugal rights, and thereupon a decree of restitution is granted in which the couple are declared "lawful man and wife," the man is estopped from impeaching the validity of his marriage, and a petition by him for a declaration of nullity of marriage will be dismissed.—WOODLAND v. WOODLAND (OTHERWISE BELIN) [Hill, J.].. 495

Permanent maintenance — Calculation of amount — Wife's ownership of valuable jewellery — Whether to be taken into account].— In fixing the amount of permanent maintenance for a wife who has obtained a decree of divorce the Registrar is entitled to take into consideration the fact that she is the owner of valuable jewellery which could be sold so as to produce an income.—LYSAGHT v. LYSAGHT [Lord Merrivale, P.] 723

Permanent maintenance — Husband's remarriage — Increased income — Settlement on second wife—Order for increased maintenance — Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925 (15 and 16 Geo. V., c. 49), s. 190 (2) (b)].—A man who had been divorced by his wife and whose means subsequently increased remarried and settled by ante-nuptial settlement on his second wife certain interests from the income of which he benefited by way of a joint establishment. He also had an income of £1,500 a year which was not the subject of the settlement. On an application by his former wife for increased maintenance, Held, that it was not right to proceed on the footing that the man's income was £1,500 a year plus the income settled on the second wife, and award the former wife a third of the combined amount, but in making the award account should be taken not only of the £1,500 a year of which he had the free disposition but also of the pecuniary advantages accruing to him from the enjoyment of the joint establishment with the second wife.—N. v. Practice — King's Proctor's rights — Powers of the Court — Intervention by King's Proctor before decree nisi—Collusion not charged—Matrimonial Causes Act, 1857 (20 and 21 Vict., c. 85), s. 29—Matrimonial Causes Act, 1860 (23 and 24 Vict., c. 144), s. 7—Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925 (15 and 16 Geo. It was held that the Attorney-General was entitled, in the circumstances, to direct the King's Proctor to present new evidence.—SLOGGETT v. SLOGGETT [Lord Merrivale, P.] 394

Practice — Wife's undefended petition for dissolution — Temporary separation — Evidence of husband's association with a known woman — Charge of adultery at a hotel with woman unknown — Evidence based on hotel incidents].—Held, that the petition must be dismissed because his Lordship was not satisfied as to the fact of the adultery alleged to have occurred at a hotel. It was one of the class of cases that cast a great reproach on the administration of justice in the Divorce Division. His Lordship would not sanction the practice of resorting to hotels to establish a prima facie case for dissolution of marriage.—AYLWARD v. AYLWARD [Lord Merrivale, P.] 456

ECCLESIASTICAL LAW—Church Assembly—Legislative Committee — Prohibition—Certiorari—Whether writs will lie].—Neither the Legislative Committee of the Church Assembly nor the Church Assembly itself is a body to which a writ of certiorari or of

Disused churchyard — Erection of electric transformer chamber — Whether a "building" — Refusal of sanction—Disused Burial Grounds Act, 1884 (47 and 48 Vict., c. 72), s. 3].—By s. 3 of the Disused Burial Grounds Act, 1884, "After the passing of this Act it shall not be lawful to erect any buildings upon any disused burial ground, except for the purpose of enlarging a church, chapel, meeting-house, or other places of worship." By reason of this enactment the Board refused to sanction an agreement for the construction, by an electric lighting company, of a transformer chamber in a disused churchyard, holding that the proposed structure, although not substantially raised above the ground level, would be a building "erected upon" the churchyard and therefore came within the prohibition. In re St. Nicholas Cole Abbey ([1893] P. 58) not followed. EDUCATION — Local education authority — Education committee — Powers—Delegation to sub-committee — Provided schools—Dismissal of teachers by sub-committee — Whether delegation ultra vires — Education Act, 1921 (11 and 12 Geo. V., c. 51), ss. 4, 148 (1)].—The plaintiffs were employed by the defendants, a local education authority, as assistant teachers in provided schools and were subject to a month's notice. Owing to financial difficulties the defendants, considering the matter to be urgent, appointed a sub-committee with plenary powers to carry out measures of economy, and the education committee of the defendants handed over their powers in the matter of economy to this sub-committee. A month's notice was given to the plaintiffs by the sub-committee, and they brought actions against the local education authority and each moved for an interlocutory injunction restraining the defendants from attempting to enforce the notice. The ground on which the plaintiffs moved was that under s. 4 of the Education Act, 1921, the defendants had acted ultra vires in delegating their powers under the Act to the sub-committee. Held, that under s. 4 of the Act both the local education authority and their education committee had a right to delegate their powers, and the motions failed.—RICHARDSON v. ABERTILLERY URBAN DISTRICT COUNCIL. THOMAS v. SAME [Eve, J.] .. 333

School attendance — Employment — Refusal of exemption — Non-attendance — Extenuating circumstance — Education Act, 1921 (11 and 12 Geo. V., c. 51), Part IV.]—Where an education authority has refused an application for exemption from school attendance on the ground of employment the fact of such employment can be neither a "reasonable excuse" for non-attendance, nor an extenuating circumstance entitling the justices under the Probation of Offenders Act, 1907, to dismiss a summons against the parent.—THOMAS v. School—Attendance—Withdrawal of child for one hour weekly—Music lesson—"Under efficient instruction in some other manner"—Education Act, 1870 (33 and 34 Vict., c. 75), s. 74—Education Act, 1921 (11 and 12 Geo. Any of the following reasons shall be a reasonable excuse, namely: (a) that the child is under efficient instruction in some other manner. . . ." Held, that these words mean that the child is receiving the whole of its instruction in some other manner, and do not entitle a parent to withdraw a child for one hour a week for the purpose of attending private lessons in a subject not approved by the Board of Education for elementary schools.—OSBORNE v. MARTIN [Div. Ct.] 38

ELECTIONS — Corrupt practices — Expenses incurred by unauthorized person — Three candidates—Opposition to one—No invitation to vote for particular candidate — Representation of the People Act, 1918 (7 and 8 Geo. V., c. 64), s. 34 (1)].—By s. 34 (1) of the Representation of the People Act, 1918, "A person other than the election agent of a candidate shall not incur any expenses on account of holding public meetings or issuing advertisements, circulars or publications for the purpose of promoting or procuring the election of any candidate at a Parliamentary election, unless he is authorized in writing to do so by such election agent." Held, that where there are three candidates and a person other than an election agent incurs such expenses without written authority for the purpose of opposing one of the three candidates but does not specifically invite voters to vote for a particular candidate, he nevertheless contravenes the sub-section since "any candidate" must be construed as including "any candidates" and such action must be deemed as having been intended to promote or procure the return of a candidate other than the one opposed.—REX v. tricity — Application of the expression "primary business" to the particular facts—Electric Lighting Act, 1909 (9 Edw. VII., c. 34), s. 23].—The plaintiffs, a local authority empowered to supply electricity within a certain area, sought an injunction under s. 23 of the Electric Lighting Act, 1909, to restrain the defendant from supplying electricity to certain consumers in the area. By that section the plaintiffs had a monopoly in the area, subject to the proviso that "this section shall not prevent any company or person from affording a supply of electrical energy to any other company or person where the business of the company or person affording the supply is not primarily that of the supply of electrical energy to consumers." Held, on the facts, that as the supply of electrical energy was not the defendant's primary business, the action failed.—CAERPHILLY URBAN DISTRICT COUNCIL v. GRIFFIN [Russell, J.] 132

Special order — Revocation — Electricity Supply Act, 1919 (9 and 10 Geo. V., c. 100), s. 26]. — The power conferred by s. 26 of the Electricity Supply Act, 1919, to amend or revoke by special order any provisional order made under the Electric Lighting Acts and confirmed by Parliament does not include a power to amend or revoke a special order by another special order.—REX v. Supply—Company—Special Act—Application by local authority to take over supply—Whether consent of company required—Yorkshire Electric Power Act, 1901 (1 Edw. VII., c. cxvi.), s. 49].—The Yorkshire Electric Power Company were by the Yorkshire Electric Power Act, 1901, empowered to supply energy within an area including the urban district of Silsden. Section 49 of the Act provided: "Nothing in this Act shall prejudice any application which is now being or may hereafter be made by any local authority company or person for a Provisional Order under the principal Acts for power to supply energy within the area of supply under this Act and in any Provisional Order to be granted by the Board of Trade [now the Electricity Commissioners] authorizing any local authority company or person so to supply energy provision may be made as to the taking over of any supply then given by the company for use exclusively within the area of supply defined in such Order." The Silsden Urban District Council having applied to the Commissioners for a Special Order (taking the place of the former Provisional Order) for power to supply energy within their urban district, and to take over the supply given by the Yorkshire Electric Power Company, the company sought to prohibit the Commissioners from proceeding with the consideration of the Draft Special Order, on the ground that the consent of the company was required. Held, that s. 49 clearly contemplated proceedings in invitum and that the consent of the company was not necessary, and that the Commissioners were not usurping jurisdiction in proceeding to consider the Draft Order.—REX v. EXECUTORS—Debt due to testator—Executor one of joint and several makers of promissory note—Right to sue co-makers—Release of debt by appointment of executor].—A testator made his will appointing the plaintiff executor thereof. The plaintiff and the defendant and two others subsequently made a joint and several promissory note whereby they promised to pay the testator £100. The note was unpaid at the death of the testator. Held, that the plaintiff, as executor, could not sue his co-debtors, since his appointment as executor released the debt at common law, and even if he would have been liable in equity the debt was deemed to be paid at probate.—JENKINS v. JENKINS [Div. Ct.] 483

FACTORIES — Dangerous machinery—Fencing—Guard provided by employer not replaced by workman—Fatal accident—"Neglect" to observe provisions of Act—Factory and Workshop Act, 1901 (1 Edw. VII., c. 22), ss. 10 (1) (c), 136, 141].—The duty to fence securely dangerous machinery under s. 10 of the Factory and Workshop Act, 1901, is absolute, and it is no answer to a charge under s. 136, where a person has been killed or injured in consequence of the neglect to observe that provision, that the occupier provided proper guards and placed on the workmen the responsibility of using them. "Neglect to observe" does not import any element of wilfulness: mere non-observance is "neglect" within the section, and the occupier is liable unless he has recourse to the provisions of s. 141 (1), and brings the actual offender before the Court.—THOMAS v. HIGHWAY — Main road through tunnel — Tunnel out of repair—Annual payment by Council towards cost of repair — Local Government Act, 1888 (51 and 52 Vict., c. 41), ss. 11 (2), 97].—The Reigate Corporation were liable for the repair of all the highways within their district repairable by the inhabitants at large. Tunnel-road was a main road running through a tunnel. It was necessary to repair the tunnel, and the question was whether the cost of the repair was part of the cost of repair of the road towards which the Surrey County Council was bound to make an annual payment within s. 11 (2) of the Local Government Act, 1888. Held, that the walls and roof of the tunnel were necessary to keep the road open, and might properly be said to be part of the road, and that even if the walls and roof were not part of the road yet their repair and maintenance were necessary to the repair and maintenance of the road, and the costs of such repair and maintenance

Road maintenance — Obligation imposed by private Act — Increase of traffic —Extent of obligation—Manchester Corporation Waterworks and Improvement Act, 1875 (38 and 39 Vict., c. clxi.), s. 14 (ii.)].—The plaintiffs were empowered by statute to make a road in accordance with the provisions of the Act and to the reasonable satisfaction of the defendants' predecessors. The road was duly made and completed in 1878, in accordance with the Act and to the satisfaction of the defendants' predecessors, but the traffic and cost of maintenance had of late years greatly increased, and the road had fallen into disrepair. Eve J. held, following Sharpness New Docks and Gloucester and Birmingham Navigation Co. v. Attorney-General (31 The Times L.R., 254 ; [1915] A.C., 654) that the plaintiffs were only liable to repair the road according to the standard of requirement of 1878, but that as that standard would not last long under the strain of modern traffic it would be wasteful to order them to do it, and there must be an inquiry as to what contribution the plaintiffs should make towards the cost of durable repairs. Held, on appeal, that the Judge had correctly estimated the plaintiffs' liability, but that there was no jurisdiction to make any other order or to direct the proposed inquiry. Decision of Eve, J. INDUSTRIAL SOCIETY—Rules—Amendment—Validity].—A rule of a society registered under the Industrial and Provident Societies Act, 1893, originally provided: "Individual members shall hold at least one share for every 20 acres or fraction of 20 acres farmed by them up to 500 acres, and at least one share for every 40 acres or fraction of 40 acres above 500. . . ." By successive amendments the words "one share" were altered to "shares of the nominal value of £5." The respondents had become members of the society before the date of the last amendment, and they took no steps for the purpose of dissenting from it. On the society going into liquidation a summons was taken out by the liquidator for the determination of the question whether, in settling the list of contributories, the amended rule was to be taken as binding on the respondents. Held, applying *Biddulph and District Agricultural Society, Limited v. INSURANCE (INDUSTRIAL)—Child under six years of age—Assurance of payments on death exceeding £10—Offence—Time for institution of proceedings—Friendly Societies Act, 1896 (59 and 60 Vict., c. 25), s. 62—Industrial Assurance Act, 1923 (13 and 14 Geo. V., c. 11), s. 2 (1)].—A child was born on November 12, 1921, and shortly after his birth the respondents, an industrial assurance company, issued three policies of assurance in respect of him; each policy contained a table showing the amount payable in the event of the child's death at various dates before maturity, and on October 18, 1926, while he was still under six years of age, the total amount assured under the three policies was £15 10s. Each policy contained the proviso: "The provisions of the Act of Parliament enacting that no greater amount than a sum of £6 shall be paid on the death of a child under the age of five years or than the sum of £10 on the death of a child under the age of ten years shall apply to this policy." These limits had since been altered by statute so as to permit a maximum of £10 in the case of a child under six, and £15 in the case of a child under ten. Held, (1) that to assure a child for more than the permitted amount was an offence, no less than to pay more than the permitted amount; (2) that the proviso in the policies did not protect the respondents, as it had no legal effect, since the statute applied of its own force and not by agreement between the parties; (3) that there was an assurance of the child with each acceptance of a premium, and that therefore the date of the last acceptance of a premium was the date from which the time for taking proceedings began to run.—HARKER v. INSURANCE (LEAKAGE)—Certificate—Issue under alleged policies—Time limit for claim—Limit in policies—No limit in certificate—Volatility of thing insured—Bulk dependent on temperature—Whether "leakage" confined to loss of contents].—The plaintiffs had an interest in a certificate of insurance on 100 barrels of turpentine shipped from Florida to Rotterdam. This certificate had been issued under what were said to be policies of insurance subscribed by the defendants. The policies provided for payment for "leakage" in excess of 1 per cent., and, as the practice was to measure, but not to weigh, the amount shipped, and to weigh, but not to measure, the amount delivered, and as, owing to the volatility of turpentine, the weight of a gallon depended on the temperature, it was provided that the conversion of kilograms into American gallons should be on the basis of 3.25 kilograms to the gallon. The alleged policies contained a condition that no claim under them could be maintained unless brought within a year, but in the certificate there was no such condition. When the turpentine was discharged, the weight was short, as compared with the weight calculated from the number of gallons shipped, but the defendants declined to pay in the absence of injury to the barrels or some clear sign of leakage. The action was brought on the certificate but not within the year. Held, that the contract was to pay for loss of weight or bulk, even if this was caused by change of temperature and not by loss of some of the contents of the barrels, and that, as the certificate was the actual insurance, and as, in the circumstances, the clause as to limitation of time could not be read into it, the plaintiffs were entitled to recover. INSURANCE (LIFE)] PAGE

INSURANCE (LIFE)—Condition against suicide—Exception in favour of "third party" assignee—Assignment of policy to insurers—Suicide of assured—Whether insurers included in "third party"].—An owner of leasehold premises demised them by way of mortgage to the plaintiffs, an insurance company, and assigned to them a policy of insurance effected with them upon his life. The policy provided:—"The policy shall be void if the life assured dies by suicide or by the hand of justice. . . . The policy shall remain in force to the extent of the pecuniary interest of third parties bona fide acquired for valuable consideration, provided notice thereof in writing shall have been received and admitted by the directors at least one month prior to the date of death." While the policy was in force the assured committed suicide. In an action by the insurance company against the assured's legal personal representative, Held, that the insurers were not included in the expression "third party" and therefore the policy was void and they were not bound to satisfy themselves out of it but were entitled to enforce their security against the leasehold premises.—ROYAL LONDON MUTUAL INSURANCE SOCIETY, LIMITED v. BARRETT [Tomlin, J.] 363

Policy for one year—Assignment—Renewal for three months—Death of assured during renewal period—Policy money—Whether belonging to testator's estate or to assignee].—The plaintiffs' testator took out an insurance policy on his life for 12 months and assigned the benefit of it to the defendant absolutely. Before the expiry of the policy he renewed it for a further period of three months, and the policy was altered by endorsement, no new policy being issued and no fresh stamp duty being paid. While the further period of three months was running, the testator died. Held, that as the intention was to continue and extend the original contract but not to rescind it, the renewed policy enured for the benefit of the defendant, and not for the benefit of the testator's estate.—ROYAL EXCHANGE ASSURANCE v. HOPE [C.A.] 160

INSURANCE (LOSS)—Clause in policy but not in slip—Warehouse to warehouse clause—Loss "reasonably attributed to fire"].—The respondents, who were cork growers and had a factory and a warehouse near Algeciras, sent from the factory to Algeciras quantities of cork for shipment and allowed it to accumulate on the jetty till there should be enough for a cargo. While an accumulation on the jetty was awaiting shipment the respondents effected with the appellants an insurance by a slip. Before the policy was issued a fire broke out on the jetty, and to prevent its spreading to the cork the authorities jettisoned part of the cork and threw sea-water on the rest, with the result that a large portion was lost or damaged. The policy, when issued, contained a free of capture and seizure clause and a warehouse to warehouse clause and provided for payment of any loss "which may reasonably be attributed to fire," and a clause in the margin provided that shore risk against fire was not covered where the assured had fire insurance. The marginal clause was not in the slip. The respondents, who had another insurance against fire, claimed under the insurance effected with the appellants, and in an arbitration an award was given in the respondents' favour. Held, (1) that as the goods at the time of the loss had reached the jetty in the ordinary course of transit they were covered by the warehouse to warehouse clause, (2) that the goods were lost by a peril insured against, (3) that the underwriters were not relieved from liability by the f.c. and s. clause, and (4) that the question whether the policy, so far as it contained a fire insurance clause, was or was not contrary to the usual form of marine insurance on goods, must be referred back to the abritrator. Decision of Roche, J. (44 The Times L.R., 392), varied.—SYMINGTON AND CO. v. UNION INSURANCE SOCIETY OF CANTON, LIMITED [C.A.] .. 635

INSURANCE (MARINE)—General average—Accident — Repairs — Items recoverable — York-Antwerp Rules, 1924].—The respondents insured the claimant's steamer by a policy providing that general average was to be adjusted according to the York-Antwerp Rules of 1924. The ship was chartered to go to Bordeaux to load for Cardiff, the charterparty also providing that average, if any, should be settled according to those Rules. During loading at Bordeaux the foremast broke, and damage was done to the ship. For the purpose of repair she was moved to another dock within the port and the shipowners incurred expenses as follows: (1) Wages and provisions of crew; (2) cost of handling and discharging cargo for the purpose of repairs; (3) cost of coal consumed in going in and out and keeping steam up; and (4) expense of towing in and out and mooring and port expenses, and cost of coal consumed in shifting the vessel. While staying at Bordeaux the ship was in no danger. On completion of repairs and loading she left for Cardiff, and while she was at sea she fouled some wreckage without any negligence of those on board her and though there was no immediate danger she was made unfit to encounter the ordinary perils of the sea, and the master put into Cherbourg, as a port of refuge, and had repairs effected. The expenses at Cherbourg were similar to those at Bordeaux. On a case stated by an arbitrator, Held, (1) that the cost of repairs in each case was recoverable as particular average; (2) that the other expenses at Bordeaux could not be claimed as general average, since no danger was in operation there; and (3) that the other expenses at Cherbourg could be claimed as general average since, though there was no immediate danger, the vessel was not fit, without repair, to encounter the perils of the sea.—VLASSOPOULOS v. BRITISH AND FOREIGN MARINE INSURANCE COMPANY, LIMITED [Roche, J.] 725

INSURANCE (MARINE)] PAGE

Particular average damage — Ship in collision — Both to blame — Amount recoverable from insurers].—The defendants insured the plaintiffs' steamer against the usual marine risks, the steamer being valued in the policy at £4,000. During the currency of the policy the steamer collided with another steamer. The ship was repaired at the cost of the plaintiffs, and a collision action by the plaintiffs against the owners of the other steamer was settled on the basis of both ships being to blame. The owners of the other steamer then paid over to the plaintiffs £2,500 as being half the damages, and for the purpose of the argument of the present case the amount of the damages was assumed to be £5,000. The plaintiffs brought this action against their marine insurers to recover whatever amount the Court might hold to be due to them under the policy, and the plaintiffs contended that as the balance of their loss was £2,500 they were entitled to recover this amount, it being less than the value of £4,000 put on the steamer in the policy. The defendants contended that they were liable only for £1,500, being the difference between £4,000 and £2,500, the amount recovered by the plaintiffs from the owners of the other ship. Held, that the contention of the defendants was correct.—GOOLE AND HULL STEAM TOWING COMPANY, LIMITED v. OCEAN MARINE INSURANCE COMPANY, LIMITED [MacKinnon, J.] 133

Total loss — "Immediate consequence" — Chain of causation].—The plaintiffs, having undertaken the reinsurance of a risk under a marine policy, reinsured their own risk with the defendants, the policies being subject to the following conditions: "In the event of the vessel not being at the place of destination on the date of the expiration of the policy the insurance shall continue in force till the end of the day when the vessel arrives at her first place of destination. If the insured object is in a damaged condition at the time when the insurance expires . . . the risk shall continue for the immediate consequence of such damage until the object without unnecessary delay has been repaired or sold." On the date of the expiration of the original policy the vessel was on a voyage and had not reached her first place of destination, and after that date and before reaching such place she grounded on a reef, but got off and proceeded. When she reached her first place of destination, it was found that she was badly damaged. There were no local facilities for repair, but temporary repairs were effected to enable her to proceed on her voyage to a place where she could be repaired. She then proceeded, but began to leak badly and had to be run ashore to prevent sinking, and was subsequently sold as a wreck. The original insurers paid as for a total loss, and the plaintiffs, having paid them, claimed against the defendants. Held, that the loss was an "immediate consequence" of the damage caused by the original stranding and as the risk continued until the vessel was repaired with no unnecessary delay the plaintiffs were entitled to recover. Decision of Rowlatt, J. (44 The Times L.R., 312), reversed.—MERCHANTS' MARINE INSURANCE COMPANY, LIMITED v. LIVERPOOL MARINE AND GENERAL INSURANCE COMPANY, LIMITED [C.A.] .. 512

INTERNATIONAL LAW—Diplomatic privilege —Action to recover rent—Entry of appearance under protest—Plea of privilege by defendant—Consular secretary attached to German Embassy — Intervention of Attorney-General on behalf of Foreign Office].—In an action for arrears of rent due under a lease of a dwelling-house the defendant entered a conditional appearance under protest, and pleaded that being an official of the German Embassy he was protected by diplomatic privilege. It appeared that he was a "consular secretary" formerly working at the German Consulate, but that he had been transferred to the German Embassy. The Attorney-General upon the instructions of the Foreign Office appeared and informed the Court that the defendant was recognized by the Foreign Office as being on a list comprising the suite of the German Ambassador. Held, that the statement of the Attorney-General on the instructions of the Foreign Office as to the status of a person claiming diplomatic privilege was conclusive. The justices refused the application, and the applicants appealed to quarter sessions, the justices being the respondents. Quarter sessions allowed the appeal, but stated a case. The applicants took a preliminary objection that by reason of s. 29 (5) of the Act quarter sessions had no power to state a case. That subsection provides that on an appeal against the refusal of a special removal "the judgment of the Court of Quarter Sessions shall be final and conclusive for all intents and purposes." He subsequently brought an action in the County Court alleging that the bungalow was not completed in a good and workmanlike manner, and giving particulars. In this action the plaintiff recovered £24 damages. He subsequently commenced a second action in the same Court, alleging the same contract, but with new particulars. The defendant inter alia pleaded res judicata. The County Court Judge held that the plea succeeded so far as the damages claimed in the second action were known to, or ascertainable by, the plaintiff at the date of the first action, but gave judgment for the plaintiff for the balance of his claim. Held by the Divisional Court, allowing the appeal of the defendant, that the cause of action was the same in both actions, and that the plea of res judicata was sufficient. To sustain a second action on the same contract or the same facts there must be a distinct cause of action, not merely different damages.—CONQUER v. BOOT [Div. Ct.] .. 486

The effect of this section is not to oust the jurisdiction of the High Court to entertain an appeal by case stated where the case is signed by only two of the three justices who heard the complaint in the police court, the reason for the absence of the signature of the third justice being that he has died between the determination of the complaint and the statement of the case.—MARSLAND v. If this difference were not refunded by the lessors within fourteen days of demand the tenant was to be at liberty to deduct such difference from the next instalment of rent. The lease contained a covenant by the tenant that he would duly and punctually pay and discharge all rates, taxes, duties, charges, assessments, and outgoings payable in respect of the demised premises. The tenant in a year of the tenancy between midsummer and midsummer paid three half-years' rates, amounting in all to over £125, and having demanded the refund of the excess from the landlords and having failed to get payment of the same within 14 days of the demand, deducted it from his next instalment of rent. Restrictions — Dilapidations — Transfer of burden to tenant — Non-occupation by tenant — Subletting of part furnished — Assessment of dilapidations — Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920 (10 and 11 Geo. V., c. 17), s. 2 (3)].—The plaintiff was the lessor and the defendant was the lessee of a flat consisting of ground floor and basement, the lease exempting the lessee from liability for loss arising from fair wear and tear. When the lease expired in 1921 the plaintiff granted to the defendant a fresh lease but the above exemption was withdrawn. The defendant never occupied the flat but sublet the ground floor furnished and the basement unfurnished. When the lease expired both the ground floor and the basement were vacant and the defendant gave up the premises. In an action for dilapidations, Held, (1) that non-occupation by the tenant did not take away the protection given to the tenant by s. 2 (3) of the Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920, as regards the transfer of a liability for cost of repairs, (2) that the subletting of the ground floor furnished, which had come to an end, did not take any part of the premises outside the Act, so far as a claim for dilapidations was concerned, and (3) that the defendant was liable only for damages on the basis of the exemption contained in the earlier lease.—EBNER v. LASCELLES [Div. Ct.] 460

Restrictions — Dwelling-house — Decontrol —Possession by "landlord" — Subsequent letting of part — Whether part so let controlled — Grant of lease to tenant—Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920 (10 and 11 Geo. V., c. 17), s. 12 (2), (7)—Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions Act, 1923 (13 and 14 Geo. V., c. 32), s. 2 (1), (2)].—The term "landlord," in section 2 (1) of the Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions Act, 1923, is not to be construed as requiring a contract of tenancy; it must be construed in the looser sense of "owner," or in the sense of a person who, at a later stage, is going to appear in legal proceedings as landlord contesting with the tenant the terms of his tenancy. Cohen v. Gold (43 The Times L.R., 376; [1927] 1 K.B., 865) overruled. Where a dwelling-house has been decontrolled under section 2 (1) of the Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions Act, 1923, every part of the dwelling-house is decontrolled—i.e., the Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920, ceases to apply to the whole dwelling-house, so that a subsequent letting of the dwelling-house, or any part of it, does not revive control. Decision of the Divisional Court in Lloyd v. Cook (44 The Times L.R., 455) on this point reversed. Ratkinsky v. Jacobs (44 The Times L.R., 548) approved. The words "the tenant" in section 2 (2) of the Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions Act, 1923, refer to the sitting tenant—i.e., to the particular person who is the tenant when the lease referred to in the subsection is granted, Restrictions — Non-occupation by tenant — Whole premises sub-let by tenant — Claim for order for possession against tenant — Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920 (10 and 11 Geo. V., c. 17), s. 5 (1) (5)]. —Where there has been no default by a tenant within section 5 of the Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920 [as re-enacted by section 4 of the Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions Act, 1923], no order for possession or ejectment can be made in respect of premises protected by the Act, so long as they are lawfully occupied ; and, therefore, the fact that a tenant, who has sub-let the whole of the premises and is not in occupation of any part thereof himself, has received notice to quit is not a ground for an order for possession being made against the tenant. Gidden v. Mills ([1925] 2 K.B., 713) explained and followed.—WEST WALES JOINT BOARD FOR THE MENTALLY DEFECTIVE v. EVANS AND ANOTHER [Div. Ct.] 565

Restrictions — Rates paid by owner instead of occupier — Nine-tenths only of full rate payable — Claim to increase rent by full rate — Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920 (10 and 11 Geo. V., c. 17), s. 2 (1) (b)].—In 1927 the Sheffield City Council, by virtue of section 56 of the Sheffield Corporation Act, 1920, passed a resolution to the effect that from October 5, 1927, the owner and not the occupier of premises where the rateable value did not exceed £10 should be rated to the consolidated rate on a basis of nine-tenths of the full consolidated rate. There was thus a difference of 10 per cent. of the full consolidated rate between the full rate previously payable by the occupier and the rate now payable by the owner. The landlords of certain premises, within the rateable value limit fixed by the resolution, claimed the right to increase their tenant's rent under the Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920, by the full consolidated rate as previously paid by the tenant, and not by the amount, equal to nine-tenths of that rate, now payable by the landlords. Held, that section 2 (1) (b) of the Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920, was applicable to the facts of the case, and that there had been an " increase " in the amount for the time being payable by the landlords in respect of rates over the corresponding amount paid in respect of the period including August 3, 1914 ; but that the landlords could only increase the rent by the amount of nine-tenths of the full consolidated rate, and not by the amount of the full rate previously paid by the tenant.—HODGKINSON AND ANOTHER v. Restrictions — Rent — Increase — Repairs — Landlord's responsibility for the whole — Question for determination — Application to county court — Decision final — Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920 (10 and 11 Geo. V., c. 17), s. 2 (6)].—The landlords of a cottage gave the tenant notice of an increase of 25 per cent. in the rent under s. 2 (1) (d) of the Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920, on the ground that they were responsible for the whole of the repairs. The tenant disputed the increase on the ground that he was partly responsible for repairs, and the landlords applied to the county court under s. 2 (6) to determine, (1) whether the notice of increase was valid, and (2) whether they were responsible for the whole of the repairs. The deputy county court Judge answered both questions in the affirmative. On an appeal by the tenant the landlords took a preliminary objection that by s. 2 (6) the decision of the county court was final. The tenant contended that the sole question was as to the construction of the terms of the tenancy and that this question did not arise under s. 2 (1), (2) or (3), and that therefore the decision was not made final by s. 2 (6). Held, that the county court had jurisdiction to determine the questions on the application and its decision was final, and therefore the appeal must be dismissed.—ELVINGTON TENANTS, LIMITED v. Restrictions—Statutory tenant—Right to sublet—Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920 (10 and 11 Geo. V., c. 17), s. 15 (1)].—A "statutory tenant" (i.e., a tenant who after the expiration of his tenancy at common law holds over under the Rent Restriction Acts against the will of the landlord, or any other person who is protected from eviction by the Acts) has a right to sublet a portion of the premises occupied by him to a sub-tenant, if he was not forbidden to sublet in his original contract of tenancy. Decision of the Divisional Court (44 The Times L.R., 177) reversed.—ROE v. RUSSELL [C.A.] 278

Restrictions—Weekly tenancy—Determination —Agreement by tenant to purchase house — Rescission of agreement — Position of tenant — Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920 (10 and 11 Geo. V., c. 17), s. 12 (7)].—By an agreement in writing dated August 28, 1926, the defendant, who was the weekly tenant of a house to which the Rent Restrictions Acts applied, agreed to buy it from the plaintiff, the landlord, for £900. The agreement also provided that the defendant acknowledged owing the plaintiff £63 10s. arrears of rent and that the plaintiff would accept £50 in settlement ; that, until certain mortgages had been transferred from the plaintiff to the defendant, the plaintiff should remain in absolute ownership of the premises ; and that, until the completion of the conveyance, the defendant, who was to remain in possession, should pay to the plaintiff interest on the £950 at the rate of 6 per cent. with interest on interest dating from September 1, 1926. The defendant also agreed to pay certain deposits, the plaintiff, on failure of such payments, to be entitled to rescind the agreement and enter into possession of the house. The defendant agreed to maintain the house in a good state of repair and to pay rates, taxes, and insurance. On February 27, 1927, the plaintiff rescinded the agreement under the powers reserved in it and on the defendant's refusing to give up possession brought an action claiming, inter alia, possession. Held, (1) that the agreement of August 28, 1926, amounted to a surrender of the weekly tenancy previously held by the defendant, and (2) that the defendant was not protected by the Rent Restrictions Acts, because after the agreement of August 28, 1926, if the defendant remained in possession of the house as a tenant, she was a tenant at will at no rent and her tenancy came within s. 12 (7) of the Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920, being at a rent less than two-thirds of the rateable value and by reason of that subsection must be ignored and the plaintiff had an unrestricted right to possession. Decision of the Divisional Court (44 The Times L.R., 105) affirmed.—TURNER v. WATTS [C.A.] 337

LANDS — Compulsory acquisition — Compensation—Bridge—Construction under statutory powers — Interference with access to wharf — Compensation obtainable by wharf-owners].—A county council was authorized by statute to construct a bridge over a navigable river giving access to a wharf resorted to by sea-going vessels and used for storage. The county council built the bridge and it interfered with access to the wharf, so that goods had to be transhipped into barges and the owners of the wharf had to acquire a new one. The freeholders and a mortgagee and the occupiers of the old wharf, the last-mentioned persons being tenants at will, claimed compensation as follows :—(1) Depreciation of freehold value of wharf, (2) cost of new wharf, (3) damage through loss of traffic at old wharf, (4) damage by reason of extra cost of handling traffic at new wharf, (5) damage to river sailing barge traffic, (6) damage from stoppage of dumb craft with goods for oversea, and (7) damage from loss of storage rents. Held, that the wharf-owners were entitled only to compensation under the first head and not under any of the other heads.—HEWETT AND OTHERS v. ESSEX COUNTY COUNCIL [Div. Ct.] 373

the Legitimacy Act, 1926, for the legitimation of a person who was born illegitimate, but whose parents were married subsequently to his birth, is not a proceeding which entitles the petitioner to a hearing in camera. LICENSING—Intoxicating liquor—Redundancy—Same justices acting as licensing justices and as compensation authority—Offer to licensing justices of payment to compensation fund—Extraneous consideration—Effect on decision of compensation authority].—A question arose which of two adjacent licensed houses should be granted a renewal of its licence, and which should be suppressed. The owners of each house submitted to the licensing justices plans of proposed alterations, and the owners of one of the two houses offered to pay £1,250 to the compensation fund if the alterations were sanctioned. The same licensing justices sat as compensation authority to consider the question of redundancy, and decided to renew the licence of the house whose owners had offered the contribution, it appearing from the evidence that this house, when altered, could be made the better of the two. They then, as licensing justices, approved the alterations to this house. Held, that in considering the question of the contribution offered to the compensation fund the licensing justices had taken extraneous matter into account, and that this must be held necessarily to have affected their minds as compensation authority, and their decision must be quashed. Per AVORY, J.—It is contrary to the spirit of the Licensing Acts, though it may be within the letter of them, that the powers of the compensation authority should be delegated to the licensing committee so that the two bodies are identical. It was clearly intended that they should be separate and independent bodies.—REX v. SHEFFIELD JUSTICES—EX PARTE T. RAWSON AND CO., LIMITED, AND ANOTHER [Div. Ct.] 43

He had never at any time been authorized to sell to or supply customers. Held, that he was not a servant or agent of the employer within the meaning of s. 4 (a) of the Licensing Act, 1921, so as to make the employer liable under that section for supplying intoxicating liquor otherwise than during the permitted hours.—ADAMS v. Lunatic — Funds in Court — Administration — Escheat — Payment out — Indemnity — Mistake of fact — Petition of right to recover — Lapse of time—Droits of the Crown—Limitation Act, 1623 (21 Jac. I., c. 16)].—In 1799 and 1801 the Crown made an ex gratia grant of certain funds in Court, which were claimed as bona vacantia, and took an indemnity in respect of the funds so granted. These funds represented the residuary estate of the father of a female lunatic, and she was entitled to them at the date of her death in 1798. In 1794 the Master had reported that she had no heir-at-law or next-of-kin. In July, 1926, a petition of right was presented by persons alleging that it had recently been established that the lunatic did in fact leave next-of-kin surviving her, and that they represented the next-of-kin, and they sought to recover from the Crown the personal estate of the lunatic. Held, that as the Crown had not created a trust in favour of any person the claim of the suppliants was barred by the Limitation Act, 1623. Decision of Romer, J. The company's published accounts habitually referred to the debenture debt as outstanding, and in 1925 the accounts, which were signed by two directors and the secretary, stated the amount of the arrears of interest. Held, that the statement in the accounts was a written acknowledgment within s. 5 of the Civil Procedure Act, 1833, and therefore an action to recover the principal and interest was not barred by the 20 years limitation fixed by s. 3 of that Act. —VISCOUNT BURNHAM v. Receiver of lunatic's estate — Order to pay to creditors — Death of lunatic before drawing up of order—Cesser of jurisdiction in lunacy].—An order was made in lunacy for the payment of £1,800 out of the lunatic's assets to certain of his creditors. The lunatic died three days after the order was made and before it was drawn up. Held, that the death of the lunatic operated as a cesser of the jurisdiction in lunacy, and therefore the order ceased to be operative, and the executors of the lunatic were entitled to ask to have all his assets transferred to them. The creditors could not claim that they had any charge in respect of the proposed payment; for the order was made at the instance of the receiver, as a matter concerning the management of the lunatic's estate only, and the persons receiving the £1,800 would have had no interest or right in that sum until payment was actually made to them.—IN RE WHEATER [C.A.] 156

MASTER AND SERVANT—Compensation for injury by accident——Arising out of and in the course of the employment—Assault—Special risk of the employment—Whether "arising out of"].—When the appellant, a porter employed by the respondents, who were upholsterers, was engaged in carrying furniture from the respondents' premises to a railway company's van, an altercation arose between the appellant and the carter in charge of the van and the latter assaulted the appellant with the result that the appellant's eye was so injured that it had to be removed. On an application for compensation the Judge found that the assault, which he assumed to have been unprovoked, though an accident arising in the course of the employment, did not arise out of it, as the appellant was not exposed by his employment to the risk of being assaulted and it was not his employment that brought that risk upon him. The Judge therefore made an award in favour of the respondents. Held, that as the Judge had found that no special risk of being assaulted attached to the employment and that it was not the employment that brought the risk upon the appellant, and as these were questions of fact, the Judge's award must be affirmed.—LEE v. S. AND J. BRECKMAN, LIMITED [C.A.] 235

Compensation for injury by accident — Basis — Average earnings for 12 months — Break in employment — Workmen's Compensation Act, 1925 (15 and 16 Geo. V., c. 84), s. 9 (2)].—The appellant, who was employed by the respondents as a riveter on piecework, received notice, on September 3, 1926, owing to the coal strike of that year, that there was no more work available for him. He accordingly ceased to work till December 8, when he was re-employed by the respondents. On January 11, 1927, he met with an accident causing total incapacity. On an application for compensation, the county court Judge held that the interruption was a normal incident and that there was no break in the employment, and he awarded compensation on the basis of the appellant's earnings for the 12 months prior to the accident. Held, that on the facts the interval was not one of the incidents of a discontinuous employment, and there was therefore a break in the employment, and the case must go back to the Judge to assess compensation on this basis.—GARDNER v. VICKERS, LIMITED [C.A.] 563

Compensation for injury by accident —Commercial traveller killed by falling tree while cycling on employers' business—Accident arising "out of . . . the employment"].—A commercial traveller, motor-cycling along a road in the course of his employment, was struck by a falling tree and killed. The fall of the tree was caused by a violent wind which was blowing at the time. Compensation was awarded to the widow. On an appeal upon the ground that the accident occurred by reason of the gale, and did not arise out of his employment, Held, by Sankey and

Compensation for injury by accident —Reduction to lower grade by reason of partial incapacity—Ability to perform lower-paid work — Inability to obtain it owing to state of labour market — Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906 (6 Edw. VII., c. 58), Sched. I. (1) (b), (3)—Workmen's Compensation Act, 1923 (13 and 14 Geo. V., c. 42), s. 16].—Held (Lord Shaw of Dunfermline and Lord Blanesburgh dissenting), that a skilled workman who would, if uninjured, have continued to be employed as a skilled workman, but who, as the result of an accident arising out of and in the course of his employment, has been reduced to the grade of an unskilled workman and driven to seek work in such lower grade, and who, though he has recovered sufficiently to be able to perform such unskilled work, is, in fact, unable to obtain such unskilled work solely on account of labour conditions, is nevertheless, for the purpose of the calculation of compensation, to be treated as "able to earn" the wages of a worker in such lower grade.—BEVAN v. Compensation for injury by accident — Weekly payment — Alleged recovery of workman — Stoppage — Application by employers for review — Denial of liability — Payment into Court of amount up to date fixed for hearing—Alleged breach of statutory duty — Tribunal to determine question of incapacity — Workmen's Compensation Act, 1925 (15 and 16 Geo. V., c. 84), ss. 12, 21].—The plaintiff, a workman in the employment of the defendants, was injured by an accident, and the defendants admitted liability and made a weekly payment of compensation. Ultimately a doctor reported that the plaintiff had recovered, and the defendants stopped the weekly payment and applied to the county court for a review thereof, and, when a date had been fixed for the hearing, they paid into Court, with a denial of liability, the amount of all the weekly payments up to that date. While the county court proceedings were still pending, the plaintiff brought an action, alleging that he had not recovered from his injury, and claiming (1) a declaration that under section 12 of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1925, the defendants had committed a breach of their duty by stopping the weekly payment otherwise than in pursuance of an agreement or arbitration, and (2) an injunction restraining a continuance of the breach. Held, (1) that there was no enforceable obligation on the employers to continue the weekly payment when the issue raised by them was that the workman was no longer incapacitated, and (2) that as under section 21 of the Act the only tribunal to determine the question of incapacity was the county court, and as that question had not yet been determined by that tribunal, the plaintiff could not show that his incapacity was continuing since the date when the defendants stopped the weekly payments, and therefore the action failed. Compensation for injury by accident — "Workman" — Exception — Employment in non-manual labour — Remuneration exceeding £350 a year — Part of salary agreed to be for expenses—Workmen's Compensation Act, 1925 (15 and 16 Geo. V., c. 84), ss. 3 (2), 10 (iv.)].—The appellant, a traveller employed by the respondents, who were distillers, had been engaged at a salary of £450 a year, but subsequently the respondents by a letter agreed at his request to show his remuneration as being £150 salary and £300 for expenses. The appellant met with an accident and applied for compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1925. The County Court Judge found that the agreement in the letter was a thing done for income-tax purposes and that the appellant's earnings must be treated as £450 a year, and that therefore he was not a workman within the meaning of the Act. Held, that as there was no evidence as to what the appellant's expenses in fact were, the County Court Judge's decision was right.—SKIDMORE V. BULLOCK, LADE, AND CO., LIMITED [C.A.] 575

Minimum wage — Trade board — Employment both on work of "specified trade" and on other work — Claim for wages at minimum rate during whole time of employment — Trade Boards Act, 1918 (8 and 9 Geo. V., c. 32), s. 8].—The plaintiff was employed by the defendants as "working manager" of a branch shop. During about half of the business hours he was employed in working at a trade for which minimum rates of wages had been fixed under the Trade Boards Acts, 1909 and 1918. During the rest of those hours he was engaged in cleaning the shop, keeping the books, selling goods by retail and performing under his contract of service other duties for which no minimum wage had been fixed. Held, that the plaintiff was not, by s. 8 of the Trade Boards Act, 1918, to be deemed to have been employed during all the business hours on work for which a minimum rate of wages had been fixed, since the defendants had proved that he was present on their premises during those hours for some purpose (a) unconnected with the METROPOLIS—Stage carriage—"Plying for hire"—Motor omnibus—Seats available only to ticket-holders—Tickets bought at least ten minutes before arrival of omnibus at booking office—Passengers picked up at several booking offices—Antecedent contract—Metropolitan Public Carriages Act, 1869 (32 and 33 Vict., c. 115), s. 7—London Cab and Stage Carriage Act, 1907 (7 Edw. VII., c. 55)].—A motor omnibus belonging to the appellants, which was not licensed to ply for hire within the Metropolitan Police district, picked up at three points within that district passengers who had taken tickets for seats for journeys to destinations outside the district. These tickets were obtained by the passengers at the several offices of the appellants at least ten minutes before the arrival of the omnibus there. Held, that, as the passengers did not necessarily enter into their contracts of carriage before the vehicle started on its journey, but in some cases did so when it had been travelling for some time, the vehicle was plying for hire within the Metropolitan Police district. *Sales v. MINES — Coal-mine—Checkweighers—Minority and majority checkweighers—Co-existence—Whether possible—Coal Mines Regulation Act, 1887 (50 and 51 Vict., c. 58), s. 14 (1)—Coal Mines (Weighing of Minerals) Act, 1905 (5 Edw. VII., c. 9), ss. 1, 3].—Under the Coal Mines Regulation Act, 1887, and the Coal Mines (Weighing of Minerals) Act, 1905, the co-existence of a minority checkweigher and of a majority checkweigher, even if possible under the Acts, is no defence to a claim by a duly appointed majority checkweigher against a weight-paid worker for a proportion of the majority checkweigher's wages. But, Semble, the statutes do not contemplate such co-existence, and the appointment of a minority checkweigher is

Coal-mine — Working facilities — Ancillary right — Carrying away coal — Conveyance over land outside lease—Jurisdiction to sanction — Aerial ropeway — Mines (Working Facilities and Support) Act, 1923 (13 and 14 Geo. V., c. 20), ss. 1, 2, 6].—The Court held that under ss. 1, 2, and 6 of the Mines (Working Facilities and Support) Act, 1923, the Railway and Canal Commission had jurisdiction to sanction a scheme for an aerial ropeway for the conveyance of coal from the Tilmanstone colliery to Dover Harbour, on the ground that the scheme was in the national interest. Decision of the Railway and Canal Commission (43 The Times L.R., 795) affirmed.—IN RE APPLICATION OF TILMANSTONE (KENT) COLLIERIES, LIMITED [C.A.] 167

MONEYLENDERS—Agent or canvasser—Prohibition against acting as such—Illegality of transaction — Employment by moneylender —Whether necessary to be proved—Moneylenders Act, 1927 (17 and 18 Geo. V., c. 21), s. 5 (3) (6)].—By s. 5 (3) of the Moneylenders Act, 1927, "No moneylender or any person on his behalf shall employ any agent or canvasser for the purpose of inviting any person to borrow money or to enter into any transaction involving the borrowing of money from a moneylender, and no person shall act as such agent or canvasser, or demand or receive directly or indirectly any sum or other valuable consideration by way of commission or otherwise for introducing or undertaking to introduce to a moneylender any person desiring to borrow money." By s. 5 (6), "Where it is shown that a money-lending transaction was brought about by a contravention of any of the provisions of this section, the transaction shall, notwithstanding that the moneylender was duly licensed under this Act, be illegal, unless the moneylender proves that the contravention occurred without his consent or connivance." Held, that the above provisions apply not merely where the person said to be an agent or canvasser is employed as such by the moneylender, but are intended to prevent any transaction brought about by touting, provided that the moneylender consents to or connives at the touting; and to prove the illegality of the transaction it is not necessary to show that the moneylender gave any authority to the tout.—VERNER-JEFFREYS v. MORTGAGE — Redemption — Receipt of payment—Authority of mortgagee's solicitor—Receipt of interest—Whether an implication of authority to receive principal].—An authority to receive the interest on a mortgage does not imply an authority to receive the principal.—BONHAM v. MAYCOCK [Roche, J.] 387

MORTGAGE] PAGE

Redemption — Shares in company — Non-payment of interest — Retention of shares by mortgagee for long period but without foreclosure—Subsequent increase in value of shares and payment of dividends—Summons to redeem—Delay—Laches—Claim for dividends received in excess of mortgage interest—Relief granted on summons—Rules of the Supreme Court, Order LV., r. 5 a].—In 1900 B. mortgaged shares in a company to L. to secure a loan with interest, the shares being afterwards registered in the mortgagee's name, and further shares being added to them. Dividends were received by L. sufficient to clear the interest up to 1908, when they ceased, and the shares became of little value, L. retaining them, without foreclosing. In 1916 dividends were resumed, and they and the value of the shares increased enormously, so that by 1921 L. had received dividends sufficient to pay off the loan and interest. L. died in 1923, and in 1926 the plaintiffs, who were entitled to the equity of redemption in the shares, took out a summons claiming redemption, and also repayment of the excess of the amount of dividends received by L. or his executors over and above the amount due under the mortgage. Held, affirming a decision of Russell, J. (44 The Times L.R., 457), that equity would not deprive a mortgagor of his right to redeem if the debt had been or could be repaid, the security was still available, and the position of the mortgagee had not been altered to his prejudice by the delay; also that the limit of twelve years applicable by the Real Property Limitation Act, 1874, in the case of a mortgage of realty would not, by equitable principles, be extended so as to support a plea of delay and laches and be made applicable to a mortgage of personalty. Held, further, reversing the decision of Russell, J. (supra), that an order for payment of the excess claimed against the mortgagee could, by the provisions of Order LV., r. 5 a, be obtained upon originating summons.—WELD v. PETRE [C.A.] 739

MOTOR-CARS—Tractor and trailer—No person on trailer—Brakes — Trailer brake independent of tractor brakes—Brakes operated by driver of tractor—Locomotives on Highways Act, 1896 (59 and 60 Vict., c. 36), s. 7—Motor Cars (Use and Construction) Order, 1904, Art. III. (3)].—By Article III. (2) of the Motor Cars (Use and Construction) Order, 1904, every vehicle exceeding 2cwt. in weight unladen drawn by a motor-car is required to have an efficient brake, and by paragraph (3) of the same Article is required to "carry upon the vehicle a person competent to apply efficiently the brake. Provided that it shall not be necessary to comply with this condition if the brakes upon the motor-car by which the vehicle is drawn are so constructed and arranged that neither of such brakes can be used without bringing into action simultaneously the brake attached to the vehicle drawn; or if the brake of the vehicle drawn can be applied from the motor-car by a person upon the motor-car independently of the brakes of the latter." The appellants appealed against a conviction by the Stipendiary Magistrate of the Staffordshire Potteries District for an offence under this Article. They had a motor-tractor and trailer in charge of one man. The trailer had an independent brake operated by hand by the driver of the tractor, which had also a foot brake and a hand brake, neither of which was connected with the trailer brake. The lever controlling the trailer brake was on the opposite side of the driver from the lever controlling the hand brake of the tractor. The driver could apply simultaneously the foot brake of the tractor and the trailer brake, or the two brakes of the tractor. He could not apply simultaneously the hand brake of the tractor and the trailer brake without abandoning the steering-wheel. Held (without deciding whether the "person" on the motor-car to control the trailer brake under the second proviso to Art. III. (3) must always be a person other than the driver of the motor-car) that the Stipendiary Magistrate had not misdirected himself in holding that the driver in this case was not able "to apply efficiently" the brake of the trailer.—ROBINSONS, LIMITED v. RICHARDS [Div. Ct.] 507

NEGLIGENCE—Architect—Building contract—Interim certificates].—The plaintiffs, a local authority, made a contract with builders under which the defendant was the architect. Clause 29 provided: "No certificate of the architect, except for the final balance, shall be considered conclusive evidence of any works or materials to which it relates nor of the value thereof, nor shall it relieve the contractor from his liability to make good any defects as provided by these conditions, nor shall it in any way prejudice the employers in the final settlement of the accounts in any case where the contractor has been overpaid during the progress of the works." The Ministry of Health had the right to require the use of materials which the Disposals Board had for sale. While the houses were in course of erection the defendant gave interim certificates, and he also gave documents under which the plaintiffs paid the Board for articles supplied by the Board. Under these certificates and documents the plaintiffs had to pay both the builders and the Board for the same material. In an action by the plaintiffs to recover the amount from the defendant on the ground of negligence the defendant contended that he was a quasi-arbitrator and therefore not liable, and that the matter could be rectified under his final certificate which had not yet been given. The trial Judge held that the defendant was not, in giving the interim certificates, acting as an arbitrator or quasi-arbitrator, but was merely acting as agent for the plaintiffs, and was liable to pay the amount claimed. Held, that as the certificates were only interim certificates, and as the defendant on going into the figures with the plaintiffs had indicated to them that the amount paid to the Disposals Board was to be deducted from the final balance due to the contractors, the defendant had not been guilty of negligence, and the action failed. Decision of Sankey, J. (43 The Times L.R., 739; [1927] 2 K.B., 556), reversed.—WISBECH RURAL DISTRICT COUNCIL v. WARD [C.A.] 62

Bare licensee — Obvious danger in road — Road not a public highway — Injury to licensee—No liability on owners of road].—The defendants, a local authority, were engaged in making, in connexion with a building estate of theirs, a road which was a cul-de-sac and was not a public highway and was still unlighted at night. People were in the habit of using the road to gain access through a hole in the fence to the defendants' land for the purpose of making a short cut to a golf links, and the defendants had done nothing to stop them. The plaintiff went along the road in daylight to reach the short cut to the golf links, and he failed to notice that there was across the road an open trench which had been made for the purpose of laying an electric main. In returning after dark the plaintiff was injured by falling into the trench, which was unlighted and unfenced. In an action for damages, Held, that the plaintiff's position could not be put higher than that of a bare licensee, and, as he entered the road on the first occasion in daylight and the trench was obvious and the road was obviously unfinished, there was no evidence of the defendants' having exposed the plaintiff to a danger which was not obvious or not reasonably to be expected, and the action failed.—COLESHILL v. MANCHESTER CORPORATION [C.A.] 258

Duty to adjoining owner — Ancient wall]. — The defendants were the owners, but not the occupiers, of a part of the ancient city wall of Exeter, which also formed the back wall of an ancient inn owned by the plaintiffs. The portion of the wall belonging to the defendants collapsed, demolishing the plaintiffs' inn. In an action for damages the Judge held that, though the ancient wall was not a thing essentially dangerous within Rylands v. Fletcher (L.R., 3 H.L., 330), yet on the principle of Todd v. Flight (9 C.B., N.S., 377), the defendants, being owners, though not occupiers, were under a duty to prevent the wall from causing damage to adjoining property. He therefore gave judgment for the plaintiffs. Held, (1) that the doctrine of Rylands v. Fletcher (supra) had never been applied to affect the liability of an owner who was out of possession at the time when the injury took place; though the defendants did not erect the wall, they took it over when they bought the property as the boundary and retaining wall for their property and they were only using that property in the ordinary ways in which property is used, so that they were outside the authority of that case; (2) that there was no reason to suppose that when they let the property to their tenant it was in a ruinous condition or that in the exercise of a reasonable diligence they should have ascertained that it was in a ruinous or dangerous condition. In these circumstances the plaintiffs failed to bring their case within the principles of the decision in Todd v. Flight (supra). Decision of Acton, J. (44 The Times L.R., 479), reversed.—ST. ANNE'S WELL BREWERY COMPANY v. ROBERTS AND OTHERS [C.A.] 703

Gas explosion — Search for escape of gas by two persons — Agency — Control of proceedings — Joint tortious enterprise].—The landlord of a shop where the tenant carried on business lived on adjoining premises communicating internally with the shop. The tenant had requested the landlord to visit the shop occasionally at night to see that everything was secure. The landlord and a lodger of his entered the shop one night, believing that there was an escape of gas. In the shop was a gas-pipe running down from the ceiling to the floor. The landlord lit a burner at the lower end of the pipe, and nothing untoward occurred. The lodger, who was a much younger man than the landlord, then got on to the counter of the shop and began to examine the upper part of the pipe with a naked light. An explosion followed, and the tenant's goods on the premises were damaged. In an action by the tenant against the landlord, Held, that the landlord was liable on the grounds (1) that the lodger was his agent, (2) that the landlord was in control of the proceedings, and (3) that the proceedings constituted a joint tortious enterprise. The Koursk (40 The Times L.R., 399; [1924] P., 140) applied. Held, further (per Talbot, J.), that the landlord was liable also on the ground that, having undertaken the examination, he was under a duty to take reasonable care to avoid damage resulting from it, and could not escape liability by getting another person to make the examination or part of it for him, whether that person was an agent or contractor or a mere voluntary helper.—BROOKE v. Practice — Personal injuries — Defendant insured — Statement of that fact to the jury — Discharge of jury — Discretion of Judge].—On the trial by a Judge and jury of an action for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by negligence the jury should not be informed by or on behalf of the plaintiff that the defendant is insured. —Whether dock-owners protected by condition—Whether lock included in "dock"].—The defendants, who were the owners of Chelsea Dock and of a lock connecting it with the River Thames, received the plaintiffs' barge into the dock on the condition that "All barges or vessels while in Chelsea Dock are at the sole risk of owners or persons bringing or causing the same to be brought into the dock." While the barge was in the lock on its way out from the dock to the river, it was damaged through the negligence of the defendants' servants. Held, (1) that the words of the condition were adequate to exempt the defendants from liability for the negligence of their servants, and (2) that the word "dock" in the above condition must be interpreted as including the lock, and therefore the defendants were exempt from liability. Decision of Avory, J. (43 The Times L.R., 769), reversed.—FORBES, ABBOTT, AND LENNARD, LIMITED v. GREAT WESTERN RAILWAY COMPANY [C.A.] 97

H. died and the partnership was thereby dissolved. Held, that the expression "net profits" was not necessarily to be interpreted as having the same meaning in every part of the articles, and that the appellant, in calculating the share of the net profits payable to the executors, was not entitled to deduct any salary for himself.—WATSON v. Such a loan does not become due and payable until application for repayment is made to the person relieved, and therefore the period of six months limited by s. 11 of the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1848, does not begin to run till the date of such application. Quaere whether it begins to run till there is actually an employer against whom an order can be made.—ASHBY-DE-LA-ZOUCH GUARDIANS v. PRACTICE—Action—Costs—Order for stay of proceedings—Action ultimately settled upon terms that defendants pay plaintiffs' costs—Costs incurred by plaintiffs between stay and settlement—Whether premature—Costs incurred before issue of writ—Whether incurred usefully — Discretion of Taxing Master].—An order in an action for stay of proceedings does not necessarily mean that all activities should be stayed. Therefore, if one of the parties during a stay incurs costs for some useful purpose, as, for instance, the taking of the evidence of seamen before they become dispersed, and afterwards becomes entitled to his costs of the action, the costs incurred during the stay may be allowed. It is a matter within the discretion of the Taxing Master to say whether costs so incurred were incurred prematurely, or whether the outlay was advisable and useful for the purposes of litigation still liable to take place. In his discretion the Master may even allow costs incurred before issue of the writ in the action, provided that he is satisfied of the advisability of incurring them.—SOCIÉTÉ ANONYME PÊCHERIES OSTENDAISES v. The plaintiff in his reply disputed his signature and said that he was not bound by the alleged undertaking. The plaintiff then applied for an order that the issue as to the alleged undertaking and its construction should be tried separately before the other issues. Held, that when a plaintiff asked for an order that one issue should be disposed of before the trial of the other issues the order should be made only when there were special circumstances justifying it, and as there were none in the present case the order must be refused.—BOTTOMLEY v. PRINCIPAL AND AGENT — Agent's commission—Sale of business—Claim for commission from purchaser—Concurrent findings of Courts below].—Although commissions on sales are usually paid by the vendor, an express bargain may throw the commission upon the purchaser. Where an agent is employed to make inquiries about a particular business with a view to his employer's acquiring it, on the terms of his being paid by the purchaser a commission on the purchase price if business is transacted, and where the parties are brought together through his agency, he is entitled to commission, even where the actual purchase is ultimately effected through the intervention of another agent, provided that his services are really instrumental in bringing about the transaction. In an action by an agent for a claim for commission from the purchaser on the sale of a business, the Lord Ordinary found on the facts that the agent had earned his commission and his decision was affirmed by the First Division of the Court of Session in Scotland. the formalities required and made a provisional apportionment on the respondents, being the frontagers on the street in question, according to their respective frontages. The respondents objected that the works were unnecessary. On the hearing of this objection the respondents called no evidence. The stipendiary magistrate held that some works were necessary, but was of opinion that the estimated expenses were too heavy. He reduced the estimate and ordered that one respondent should pay one-half and each other respondent two-thirds of the respective sums named in the provisional apportionment. Held, that inasmuch as the Corporation had not resolved that the apportionment should be on any basis other than frontage, the stipendiary magistrate could not direct an apportionment on any other basis. Subject to that limitation, he must consider and determine, upon evidence, whether the proposed works were in any, and what, respect unnecessary, and must have regard to any alternative proposals (if the respondents made any and supported them by evidence) and to the cost thereof.—BIRMINGHAM CORPORATON v. Valuation list — Return demanded from occupier—Particulars required—Licensed premises — Gross takings — Tenant's remuneration and capital — Invalidity of form—Rating and Valuation Act, 1925 (15 and 16 Geo. V., c. 90), s. 40].—The Court granted a declaration that the defendants, a rating authority, had no right under s. 40 of the Rating and Valuation Act, 1925, and the Rating and Valuation Act (Return) Rules, 1926, to require the plaintiff, who was the licensee and occupier of licensed premises, to make for the purposes of valuation a return stating the gross takings for the last three years, the outgoings for the last three years, tenant's remuneration, wages and equivalents, breakages and depreciation, lighting, heating, &c., and tenant's capital, since these particulars were, upon the evidence, not such as in the words of s. 40 could be "reasonably required" for the purposes of the Act.—GRANT v. KNARESBOROUGH URBAN DISTRICT COUNCIL [Astbury, J.] 224

REPLEVIN—Distress for non-payment of rates—No beneficial occupation of premises—Jurisdiction of justices to issue warrant—Maintainability of action].—Up to March 31, 1926, the plaintiffs, as education authority, had managed as an industrial school certain premises within the parish of which the defendants were the overseers of the poor. On that day the premises were closed and the plaintiffs' furniture, stores, documents, and other equipment were removed, with the exception of some furniture which was left in two rooms for a caretaker and of a few articles which were regarded as of so little value as scarcely to be worth removing. The caretaker remained on the premises with his family as a mere caretaker. Repairs to the premises were executed from time to time. The future use of the premises was in doubt until March, 1927, when plans were made which necessitated the erection of entirely new buildings, and work on them was started after April, 1927. The defendants rated the plaintiffs in respect of the premises for the half-years ending September 30, 1926, and March 31, 1927. Held, that during the periods in question the plaintiffs were not in beneficial occupation of the premises in the sense that their occupation was of benefit or advantage to them in the performance of their public duties, and they were therefore not rateable. When the plaintiffs refused to pay the rates the defendants seized a tramway-car belonging to the plaintiffs under a distress warrant issued by justices for the non-payment of the rates. Held, that the plaintiffs could not recover damages for the seizure in an action of replevin because the jurisdiction of the justices to issue the distress warrant depended not on beneficial occupation of the premises by the plaintiffs, but simply on occupation within the parish.—LONDON COUNTY COUNCIL v. HACKNEY BOROUGH COUNCIL [Wright, J.] 592

RESTRAINT OF TRADE—Price maintenance agreement—Validity].—The defendant, who was a wholesale and retail dealer, purchased from the plaintiffs 12 gross of Palmolive soap tablets and signed an agreement that he would not sell the plaintiffs' soap at less than 6d. a tablet. The defendant then sold the soap at 5d. a tablet, and, in an action to restrain him from breaking the agreement, he contended that it would be robbing the public to sell at 6d. a tablet and that the agreement was in restraint of trade and illegal. Held (Sargant, L.J., dissenting), that the agreement was valid and enforceable and the plaintiffs were entitled to the injunction claimed.—Decision of Astbury, J. ([1927] 2 Ch., 333), affirmed.—PALMOLIVE COMPANY (OF ENGLAND), LIMITED v. FREEDMAN [C.A.] 86

V., c. 22), s. 17 (3)].—By s. 17 (3) of the Finance Act, 1926, "Any Court before which a bookmaker is convicted of any offence under this Part of this Act or otherwise in connexion with his business as a bookmaker, may order him to be disqualified for holding a bookmaker's certificate for such period as the Court may think fit. . . ." Held, that a judgment for penalties on an information by the Attorney-General in the High Court under s. 17 (1) for failure to make returns of bets is a "conviction" within the meaning of s. 17 (3).—ATTORNEY-GENERAL v. V., c. 22), ss. 15, 18].—The defendant company owned a club and managed on the premises a totalisator and a pari mutuel by means of which members could back horses running in races. The amount staked by backers of losers formed the fund for paying the backers of winners, the defendant company deducting 10 per cent. for expenses. Held,

Estate duty — Succession duty — Foreign disposition — Settlement of property situate in Hong-kong by testator domiciled there — Appointment of English trustees of settlement—Applications to English Courts by trustees—Trust funds abroad—No direction in disposition to establish trust in England—Original succession not changed—Succession Duty Act, 1853 (16 and 17 Vict., c. 51), s. 2—Finance Act, 1894 (57 and 58 Vict., c. 30), s. 2 (2)].—Under the will made in English form of a testator domiciled in Hong-kong his residuary property, which mainly consisted of investments in local companies and real estate in Hong-kong, was left, subject to an annuity to his widow, upon trust for his son for life, with remainder to the son's two infant children. The testator died in 1905. The tenant for life desiring to borrow money, the lenders insisted on English trustees being appointed, and by a deed of appointment made in 1911 he appointed English trustees of the settlement along with himself. Later, it having been discovered that the tenant for life, while sole trustee, had drawn upon the capital of the trust funds, various applications were made, against his wish, to the English Court in the Chancery Division for directions regarding the administration of the trust, and orders were made thereon, and his sons were made wards of Court. The trust property remained in Hong-kong. The tenant for life died in 1922. The Crown having claimed succession and estate duty upon the property, Rowlatt, J., held under section 2 of the Succession Duty Act, 1853, that a trust was established in this country as a result of a foreign disposition, and therefore estate duty was payable, although the trust was not so established here as a result of any directions in the disposition, but that no succession duty was payable, as section 24 of the Finance Act, 1925, was not retrospective. On appeal, as to estate duty, Held, that the succession was originally a foreign succession, having been established by the death of the testator abroad in 1905, and that it could not be changed into an English succession or settlement by any acts of the successors not amounting to an entirely new disposition, and that as there was no direction in the testator's will directing that any trust should be established in England, it remained a succession under the laws of Hong-kong, and the property was not liable to estate duty. Income-tax — Award by Royal Commission—Government user of patented invention—Income Tax Act, 1918 (8 and 9 Geo. V., c. 40), Sched D].—The Court held that income-tax was payable on certain sums awarded by the Royal Commission on Awards to Inventors, it appearing that the sums in question were not a capital payment made for the Crown's acquisition of a patented invention but were sums paid for the user thereof.—MILLS v. JONES [Rowlatt, J.] 351

Income-tax — Carrying on trade—Successive adventures — Additional assessment—When made—Time limit—Income Tax Act, 1918 (8 and 9 Geo. V., c. 40), s. 125 (2), Schedule D].—During the "boom" in the Lancashire cotton trade in 1919, the appellant, in company with other persons, engaged in the operation known locally as "turning over" a cotton mill—i.e., acquiring a controlling interest in the mill, organizing its administration and finances, and reselling it to a new company. The operation was successful and the appellant was asked to join and did join other syndicates, composed partly, but not entirely, of the same persons engaged in "turning over" three other mills. In each case a profit resulted to the appellant. On March 24, 1923, the Additional Commissioners for the Division in which the appellant resided signed the book containing an estimated assessment upon the appellant to income-tax under Schedule D for the year 1919-20. The book was not delivered to the General Commissioners until April 18, 1923; notice was given to the appellant on May 5, 1923, and the assessment was signed by the General Commissioners on September 5, 1923. Held, that though each adventure of "turning over" a mill, taken singly, was not a trade, but a capital transaction, yet the succession of such adventures, in each of which the appellant took part, might constitute the carrying on of a trade, and the Special Commissioners on an appeal against the assessment were not estopped by their previous decisions from reconsidering the whole of the facts, and finding that the appellant in so doing was carrying on a trade on the profits of which he was liable to income-tax and excess profits duty on the profits. Held also, that the assessment was made in time, having been made when it was signed by the Additional Commissioners within the three years allowed by s. 125 (2) of the Income Tax Act, 1918. The subsequent steps need not be within that time.—PICKFORD v. QUIRKE. PICKFORD v. INLAND REVENUE COMMISSIONERS [C.A.] 15

Income-tax — Charity — Exemption — Agricultural society—Income Tax Act, 1918 (8 and 9 Geo. V., c. 40), s. 37 (1) (b)].—The appellants, an agricultural society, founded mainly for the purpose of promoting and holding an annual agricultural show, had also among their objects the improvement of live stock and poultry and of machinery and appliances used in agriculture, and agricultural education and scientific research, and they claimed exemption from income-tax upon the dividends from their investments on the ground that they were a society established for charitable purposes only. The Special Commissioners found that the society was established for charitable purposes only, and they held that the claim should be allowed. Held, that there was evidence on which the Special Commissioners could so find, and their decision must be affirmed.—INLAND REVENUE COMMISSIONERS v. YORKSHIRE AGRICULTURAL SOCIETY [C.A.] 59

Income-tax — Charity — General Medical Council — Whether entitled to exemption — Income Tax Act, 1918 (8 and 9 Geo. Decision of Rowlatt, J. (44 The Times L.R., 117), affirmed.—GENERAL MEDICAL COUNCIL v. COMMISSIONERS OF INLAND REVENUE. ENGLISH BRANCH COUNCIL OF THE GENERAL MEDICAL COUNCIL v. Income-tax — Company — Residence — Real business abroad — Whether resident in this country — Income Tax Act, 1918 (8 and 9 Geo. V., c. 40), Sched. D, Cases IV. and V.].—A company which is registered in this country but carries on its real business abroad does not necessarily reside in this country, so as to be liable to income-tax, because it is obliged by law to perform in this country certain duties which cannot be performed abroad, such as having a registered office and keeping a register of shareholders. For income-tax purposes a company resides where its real business is carried on. Income-tax — Deduction — Guarantee given in hope of obtaining orders — Trade expense — Income Tax Act, 1918 (8 and 9 Geo. V., c. 40), Sched. D, Cases I. and II., Rule 3].—The respondents, who were asphalters, subscribed to the guarantee fund of the British Empire Exhibition at Wembley, solely, as the General Commissioners found, in the hope of obtaining preferential treatment in the allocation of contracts for asphalting work within the Exhibition grounds. They did not in fact obtain any contract at all from the Exhibition authorities. Having been called upon to pay a considerable part of the amount guaranteed, they sought to deduct the sum so paid from their profits assessable to income-tax as a trade expense. Held, that it was not an allowable deduction.—MORLEY v. LAWFORD AND CO. [Rowlatt, J.] 716

Income-tax — Deductions from profits — Railway investments — Effect of grouping — Income Tax Act, 1918 (8 and 9 Geo. V., c. 40), Sched. D., Case I.].—The appellants, an insurance company, had investments in British railway stocks, and it was admitted by the Crown that any loss suffered by the appellants on such investments was deductible from the appellants' profits for purposes of income-tax. The result of the Railways Act, 1921, was that the appellants received in exchange for their various railway holdings stocks in the four amalgamated railway companies created by that Act. The market value of these new stocks was less than the original cost to the appellants of the old stocks, and the appellants claimed that the loss so occasioned to them should be allowed as a deduction from their profits for 1922 and 1923 in computing their income-tax liability under Case I. of Schedule D. Held, that as the effect of what had happened was that the old investments had been closed and realized and new investments had been begun, the appellants were entitled to the deduction claimed.—ROYAL INSURANCE COMPANY, LIMITED v. Income-tax — Estate duty — Payment — Surrender of Victory Bonds — Valuation—Accrued but unpaid interest taken into account—Whether interest subject to income-tax—Finance Act, 1917 (7 and 8 Geo. Income-tax — Excess profits duty — Non-resident—Trade exercised within United Kingdom—Assessability of British agents—Receipts of profits or gains—Income Tax Act, 1842 (5 and 6 Vict., c. 35), s. 41—Finance (No. 2) Act, 1915 (5 and 6 Geo. V., c. 89), s. 31].—The House affirmed three decisions of the Special Commissioners of Income Tax that the several appellants, who acted in this country as agents of foreign shipping companies, were assessable to income-tax on the principal company's profits, and a fourth decision that the appellants in the fourth case were in similar circumstances assessable to excess profits duty. Decisions of the Court of Appeal (42 The Times L.R., 704, and [1927] 1 K.B., 780) affirmed.—TARN v. SCANLAN. NEILSEN, ANDERSEN, AND CO. v. COLLINS. WILLIAM H. MULLER AND CO. (LONDON), LIMITED v. Income-tax — Excess profits duty — Profits of trade — Syndicate for development of patented invention — Agreement with foreign company for grant of licence and option of purchase—Exercise of option of purchase for sum in cash—Whether a profit of trade or the realization of a capital asset —Finding of Special Commissioners affirmed —Income Tax Act, 1918 (8 and 9 Geo. V., c. 40), Sched. D, Case I].—A syndicate formed to work and develop a group of English and foreign patents carried on business mainly by granting licences to manufacturers at royalties. Certain foreign manufacturers, however, refused to take licences unless they were also given an option of purchase exercisable within a given period. The syndicate entered into a contract with an American company to grant it a licence to use and work the syndicate's American patents, with an option of purchase thereof. The company exercised its option of purchase and paid to the syndicate the sum of £15,898 for the purchase of the American patents out and out. The syndicate having been assessed to income-tax and excess profits duty upon this sum, the Special Commissioners found that the profits made on the sale of the patents were profits of the syndicate's trading. Held, that as the Special Commissioners had not misdirected themselves in law and had in effect found the sum received for the patents to be a receipt of the syndicate's business in contrast to the realization of a capital asset, and as there was evidence to support this finding, their decision must be affirmed. aggregate amount in any year of assessment of that income and the income from any other fund subject to the like trusts for accumulation and of the total income of that person from all sources (hereinafter referred to as 'the aggregate yearly income') is of such an amount only as would entitle an individual either to total exemption from tax or to relief from tax, that person shall . . . be entitled . . . to have repaid to him on account of the tax which has been paid in respect of the income during the period of accumulation a sum equal to the aggregate amount of relief to which he would have been entitled if his total income from all sources for each of the several years of the said period had been equal to the aggregate yearly income for that year. . . ." "Specified age" in this section means an age expressed by a definite number of years and not an age which can be ascertained only by reference to some other occurrence as, for instance, the death of a testatrix who has directed that an accumulated fund shall be paid to a beneficiary 20 years after her death.—WHITE v. Income-tax — Exemption — Hospital — Convalescent home — Maintained by unregistered friendly society for its members —No payment by patients—Accommodation for small proportion of total membership—Eleemosynary character—Income Tax Act, 1918 (8 and 9 Geo. V., c. 40), Sched. A, No. VI., Rule 1 (c)].—Rule 1 of No. VI. of Schedule A of the Income Tax Act, 1918, provides :—"The following further allowances shall be made under this Schedule :— . . . (c) the amount of the tax charged on any hospital, public school, or almshouse, in respect of the public buildings, offices, and premises belonging thereto. . . ." An unregistered friendly society, of which there were over two million members, had for its principal objects the relief of distressed members and the widows and orphans of members and the promotion of social intercourse and recreation in its lodges. Members of the society paid a small subscription, which was divided and allocated to various benevolent funds. A house and grounds were bought by the society for use as a convalescent home by its members. The purchase price was paid partly by the society and partly by contributions by its members. The home was maintained by the society and was furnished to accommodate 20 or 30 members. No expense was incurred by a member during his residence at the home, and medical men gave their services to it gratuitously. Held, that the home was a hospital within Rule 1 (c) of No. VI. of Schedule A, and the society was, therefore, entitled to be allowed the amount of tax charged in respect of the premises of which the home was composed.—GRAND COUNCIL OF THE ROYAL ANTEDILUVIAN ORDER OF BUFFALOES v. Income-tax — Farmer — "Seller of milk" — Assessment under Schedule B — Additional assessment under Schedule D — Income Tax Act, 1918 (8 and 9 Geo. V., c. 40), Sched. D, Case III., r. 4].—By rule 4 of the rules applicable to Case III. of Schedule D of the Income Tax Act, 1918, "If the Commissioners find that lands which have been charged under Schedule B on the assessable value and which are occupied by a dealer in cattle or a dealer in or a seller of milk are insufficient for the keep of the cattle brought on to the lands, so that the assessable value affords no just estimate of the profits, they may require a statement of the profits to be delivered, and charge such further sum thereon as, together with the charge under Schedule B, will make up the full sum wherewith the dealer or seller ought to be charged in respect of the like amount of profits charged according to rule 2 of the rules, applicable to this Case." Held, that a farmer may be a "seller of milk" within the above rule even though he merely sells, by wholesale, the milk produced on his farm ; and it is not necessary that, to come within the rule, he should own some outside trading organization for the disposal of the milk.—H. AND C. STEPHENSON v. WALLER [Rowlatt, J.] 155

Income-tax—Income accumulated for benefit of a person contingently — Beneficiary having only a life interest — Claim to relief — Meaning of "benefit" — Income Tax Act, 1918 (8 and 9 Geo. V., c. 40), s. 25].—By s. 25 of the Income Tax Act, 1918 :—"Where in pursuance of the provisions of any will or settlement any income arising from any fund is accumulated for the benefit of any person contingently on his attaining some specified age or marrying, and the aggregate amount in any year of assessment of that income and the income from any other fund subject to the like trusts for accumulation and of the total income of that person from all sources (hereinafter referred to as 'the aggregate yearly income') is of such an amount only as would entitle an individual either to total exemption from tax or to relief from tax, that person shall, on making a claim for the purpose within three years after the end of the year of assessment in which the contingency happens, be entitled . . . to have repaid to him [a sum calculated as therein mentioned]." Held, that the words "for the benefit of" include a case where the accumulations of income are added to the capital of a trust fund in which the beneficiary has only a life interest and where therefore the accumulations never pass to the beneficiary. Decision of Rowlatt, J. (43 The Times L.R., 481 ; [1927] 2 K.B., 491), affirmed.—DALE v. MITCALFE [C.A.] 21

Income-tax — Profits and earnings of employment — Solicitor-trustee—Power to charge — Remuneration by percentage of trust funds — Income Tax Act, 1918 (8 and 9 Geo. V., c. 40), Sched. D, Case II.]—Case II. of Schedule D of the Income Tax Act, 1918, provides that income-tax "shall extend to every employment by retainer in any character whatever, whether such retainer shall be annual or for a longer or shorter period, and to all profits and earnings of whatever value arising from employments, and shall be computed on the full amount of the balance of the profits, gains, and emoluments of the professions, employments or vocations upon a fair and just average of three years. . . ." A solicitor-trustee was empowered by clauses in the instruments creating the trusts to charge for work done by him in connexion with the trusts. By agreement between himself, his co-trustees, and the beneficiaries his remuneration was calculated as a percentage of the annual income of the trust funds, which income had already been brought into charge to tax. Held, that this remuneration was chargeable to income-tax on the solicitor under Sched. D, Case II., of the Income Tax Act, 1918, as his profits or earnings arising from an employment and was not constituted of annual payments payable wholly out of profits or gains brought into charge to tax within Rule 19 of the General Rules applicable to All Schedules of the Income Tax Act, 1918. In re White (14 The Times L.R., 503 ; [1898] 2 Ch., 217) ; In re Brown ([1918] W.N., 118) ; and *Baxendale v. Income-tax — Trading profits — Deduction — Multiple shops — Shops closed and opened as demanded by business as a whole — Difference between cost of new fittings in new shops and price realized for old fittings—Capital or income expenditure —Income Tax Act, 1918 (8 and 9 Geo. V., c. 40), Schedule D, Case I.].—A trading company with a number of branch shops controlled by a head office followed a policy of opening and closing their branches in accordance with the local demands and the probabilities of profit or loss. Held, that the difference between the cost of new fixtures, fittings, and utensils for the new shops, and the receipts from the sales of equivalent second hand fixtures, &c., from the shops that were closed was a capital expenditure, and was not a revenue expenditure which could be debited to the trading account of the company in ascertaining the profits which were assessable to income-tax. Income-tax — Voluntary pension — Lump sum in lieu thereof — Whether recipient assessable—Income Tax Act, 1918 (8 and 9 Geo. V., c. 40), Sched. E].—The respondent had been the managing director of a company and after his retirement the directors paid him a voluntary pension and subsequently stopped the pension, and instead thereof gave him a lump sum as a personal gift. The respondent was assessed to income-tax on the amounts so paid to him. Held, that as the payments were merely gifts moved by remembrance of past service already sufficiently remunerated, the respondent was not liable to be assessed upon them.—BENYON v. Income-tax — Water authority — Interest on stock and debentures — Deduction and retention of tax — Whether interest paid out of profits not brought into charge—Liability to account for tax—Income Tax Act, 1918 (8 and 9 Geo. V., c. 40), All Schedules Rules, Rules 19, 21].—The profits of the Metropolitan Water Board are assessable under Schedule A. No. III., Rule 3, of the Income Tax Act, 1918, by reference to the profits of the year preceding the year of assessment. The accounts of the Board for the year ending March 31, 1922, showed a loss, and therefore no assessment was made on the Board under Schedule A, No. III., for the year ending April 5, 1923. The accounts for the year ending March 31, 1923, showed a profit of over two millions, out of which the Board paid over one million interest on water stock and debentures, deducting and retaining the income-tax thereon. On an information claiming that under Rule 21 of the All Schedules Rules the Board was liable to account to the Commissioners of Inland Revenue for the amount of the tax so deducted, the Board contended that the interest paid for the year 1922-23 was payable out of profits brought into charge for 1922-23 within Rule 19 of the All Schedules Rules and was in fact paid out of the profits for 1922-23, and that, although the income-tax for 1922-23 was to be measured by the profits of the preceding year, the profits for 1922-23 were profits "brought into charge," and Rule 21 did not apply. Held, that as the Board had been assessed at zero under Schedule A for 1922-23, the interest had not been paid out of profits brought into charge, and the Crown was entitled to succeed. Legacy duty — Chattels settled on persons in succession — Ultimate vesting in person with absolute interest—Valuation—Whether duty payable on value at date of testator's death or at date of vesting—Legacy Duty Act, 1796 (36 Geo. III., c. 52), s. 14].—A testator bequeathed chattels to trustees upon trust to allow them, so far as the rules of law and equity would permit, to go and be enjoyed with his mansion house. The testator died in 1846, and after divers intermediate life interests the defendant became, in 1909, tenant in tail male in possession of the mansion house, and in 1924, on attaining the age of 21 years, he became absolutely entitled to the chattels, with power to sell or dispose of them. They had greatly increased in value since 1846. No legacy duty had been payable in respect of them before 1924. Held, that legacy duty was payable on the value of the chattels in 1924, not on their value in 1846.—ATTORNEY-GENERAL v. RUDGE [Rowlatt, J.] 708

Mechanically propelled vehicles — Duty —Petrol-electric vehicle — Electrical propulsion — Generation of electricity by internal combustion engine on vehicle—Rate of duty—Finance Act, 1926 (16 and 17 Geo. V., c. 22), Sched. I. (5)].—A vehicle propelled by electricity generated by an internal combustion engine on the vehicle is not an electrically propelled vehicle within clause 5 of the First Schedule to the Finance Act, 1926, and is therefore subject to the higher duty imposed upon a vehicle mechanically propelled otherwise than by electricity. limited, as regards the particular trustees or guardian, to that income with which the trust or guardianship is concerned. Supertax — Principal shareholder in company — Scheme for transfer of shares to employees—Dividends to belong to principal shareholder till transfer — No transfer till total dividends amounted to par value—Liability to assessment — Income Tax Act, 1918 (8 and 9 Geo. V., c. 40), s. 27].—The appellant, who was the principal shareholder and held the controlling interest in a company, set aside a certain number of his shares for transfer to certain employees of the company on the terms that, until the actual transfer, he was to receive the dividends, and that when the total of the dividends on the shares set aside for an employee amounted to the par value of a share the share so paid for should be transferred to the employee. The appellant was assessed to supertax on the dividends received by him on the shares so set aside. Held, that since the dividends, as they accrued, were dividends of the appellant, although he might be under obligations with regard to them in the future, they formed part of his income for the purpose of assessment to supertax. Payment by instalments — Death of purchaser — No instalments ever paid —Resumption of possession of furniture by vendor — Claim against purchaser's executors for instalments].—By the terms of a lease of a house granted by the Crown the lessee agreed to pay six yearly instalments in respect of furniture on the premises which on completion of the instalments was to become his property, but in interim belonged to the Crown. The lessee died without paying any instalments and the Crown subsequently brought an information against his executors and his widow, to the latter of whom he had bequeathed his interest under the lease, claiming three instalments which had become due at the time when the widow had surrendered the lease, and, together with the executors, her sons, had vacated the premises owing to financial difficulties. When the defendants left the premises the Crown took charge of and dealt with the furniture in a manner prejudicial to the defendants' interests in it. Held, that there was an agreement for the sale of the furniture, payment to be made by instalments, the property not to pass until the price was fully and finally satisfied; and that by resuming possession of the furniture when it was abandoned by the defendants the Crown had disentitled itself to sue for a part of the purchase price. The proper course of action was to sue for damages for breach of agreement to purchase.—ATTORNEY-GENERAL v. PRITCHARD AND OTHERS [Swift, J.] 490

War — Goods sold to Turkish customers — Delivery of goods to customers after outbreak of war — Payment received in piastres by seller's agents — Claim by seller against his agents for sterling—Treaty of Lausanne, 1923, Art. 84—Treaty of Peace (Turkey) Order, 1924].—The defendant bank, a Turkish subject, was at the outbreak of war between this country and Turkey holder of sight bills drawn in sterling for the purchase price of goods consigned by the plaintiff from Manchester for his customers in Beirut which had arrived in Beirut before the outbreak of war and were subsequently delivered by the bank to the purchasers against payment to the bank in piastres. At the conclusion of the war the defendant bank claimed to be entitled to pay to the plaintiff an amount in sterling which represented the then depreciated value of the piastres which they had received in exchange for the goods. The plaintiff, on the other hand, claimed to be entitled to be paid the sterling amounts of the bills at sight. Held, that since the completion of the execution of the contracts, as between the plaintiff and his customers, required no intercourse between a British subject and the enemy, the contracts were not abrogated by the outbreak of war, and the plaintiff was entitled to recover from the defendant bank the amount of the bills in sterling. Appeal from decision of the Court of Appeal (43 The Times L.R., 369; [1927] 2 K.B., 254) allowed.—OTTOMAN BANK v. JEBARA [H.L.] 525

SAVINGS BANKS—Nomination—Invalidity of form—Receipt of payment by nominee—Right of administrator of nominator to recover amount—Post Office Savings Bank Regulations, 1921, regs. 65, 66, 87].—One P., who had money to his credit in the Post Office Savings Bank, signed a nomination form by which he left the money to the defendant. The name of a witness appeared on the form, but P. had not signed the form in his presence as required by reg. 66 (1) of the Post Office Savings Bank Regulations, 1921. After P.'s death, as the form appeared on the face of it to be valid, the Postmaster-General paid the money to the defendant. The plaintiff, having taken out letters of administration of P.'s estate, claimed the money from the defendant, as money received by him to the use of the plaintiff. Held, that the form was invalid, and the position of the defendant was the same as if he had received payment under a will

SETTLED LAND — Vendor and purchaser — Land no longer settled land after death of tenant for life—Probate granted to executor of tenant for life—Title to convey—Special executors—Law of Property Act, 1925 (15 Geo. V., c. 20), s. 204 (1)—Administration of Estates Act, 1925 (15 Geo. V., c. 23), s. 22 (1), 37 (1)].—On January 1, 1926, A was tenant for life, under the Settled Land Act, 1925, under a settlement of land, which on A's death was devised on trust for sale. Probate of the will of A (who died in 1926) was granted to B, her sole executor, settled land not being excluded by the grant. In December, 1926, B contracted to sell part of the property. After the date of the contract B and another trustee were appointed trustees of the original settlement. The purchaser objected to the title on the ground that the legal estate was vested in the surviving Settled Land Act trustee of the original settlement, under s. 22 of the Administration of Estates Act, 1925, and that neither B nor the new trustees, after an assent by B, could convey the legal estate. Held, (1) that, so long as the general grant of probate remained unrevoked, B had power to convey the legal estate to the purchaser; (2) that, as on the death of the tenant for life the land ceased to be settled land, the persons who were immediately before the death trustees of the settlement were not special personal representatives under s. 22 of the Administration of Estates Act, 1925.—IN RE BRIDGETT AND HAYES' CONTRACT [Romer, J.] 222

SHIP—Bill of lading—Deviation clause—Loss by perils of the sea—Exceptions clause—Loss on usual route—Shipowners protected].—The plaintiff at Malaga shipped, on a steamer of the defendants, goods to be carried from Malaga to Liverpool. The bill of lading contained clauses excepting the shipowners from responsibility for (inter alia) loss, damage, or injury by perils and risks of seas or for any risk which might be an insurable one. It also contained a deviation clause: "with liberty to touch at any ports whatsoever although they may be outside the route without it being considered a deviation." For some years the defendants had been taking, from Malaga to Liverpool or other ports of this country, two distinct routes for the vessels of their line, one "via Levante," which meant going north-east up the coast of Spain with calls at various ports, and then coming back from the farthermost port down the Mediterranean and through the Straits to this country, and the other, "Directo," coming directly from Malaga to ports of this country. The plaintiff knew, when he delivered to the ship the goods to be carried under the bill of lading in this case, that the route for that particular ship would be "via Levante." In this case the ship on leaving Malaga went north-eastward with the intention of picking up cargo at Cartagena before going to Liverpool. Between Malaga and Cartagena the ship met with bad weather, and some of the plaintiff's goods were lost. The plaintiff claimed damages, but the defendants relied on the exceptions clauses in the bill of lading. The plaintiff answered that the steamer had deviated from the contract voyage and that therefore the exceptions clauses did not apply. Held, that no question of deviation arose, because at the time of the loss the ship was on one of the known and usual routes, and therefore on an agreed route, towards Liverpool. Accordingly, the defendants were protected by the exceptions clauses in the bill of lading. Decision of Rowlatt, J. (44 The Times L.R., 329), reversed.—FRENKEL v. MACANDREWS AND CO., LIMITED [C.A.] 580

Charterparty—Coal cargoes—Strike clauses—Coal strike of 1926—Embargo on coal exports—Frustration of adventure—Termination of charterparty].—By a charterparty dated March 24, 1926, the plaintiffs chartered the defendants' steamship to run consecutive voyages with cargoes of coal from one of the South Wales ports to one or other of specified Italian or Sicilian ports for a period of "twelve months as and from date of notice of readiness to load for first voyage." The charter was on the printed form of the Chamber of Shipping Welsh Coal Charter, 1896, and contained the ordinary clauses as to strikes and lock-outs, with the addition of the following written clause: "Steamer not to be ordered to any loading port at which there is a strike in force. Steamer to be free to interpose a substantially similar voyage if charterers unable forthwith to order steamer to another loading port stipulated in charter, free of strike." In May, 1926, the defendant shipowners, through their agents, and in accordance with the provisions of the charterparty, gave notice to the plaintiff charterers that the ship would be ready to load about the first week in June, and they asked for orders as to the port of loading. Meanwhile the coal strike had begun, resulting in a total prohibition of coal exports by the British Government, and on June 12 the charterers replied that they could not order the vessel to a port to load, and must leave the owners to make their own arrangements. Thereupon the owners, under the written clause in the charterparty, arranged to interpose two "similar" voyages, after which, as the strike was still proceeding, and as the charterers were still unable to order the ship to a loading port, the owners took independent action and chartered the vessel for voyages to America and back to Naples, Huelva, and Rouen. At the end of November, when the strike had become restricted in its operation (although the Government embargo upon the export of coal remained in force until December 17), the charterers notified the shipowners that the ship must be ready to carry out the charter within a reasonable time after the settlement of the strike. The shipowners replied that by reason of the prolonged strike and the Governmental embargo on coal exports the commercial venture had been frustrated, and the contract therefore became null and void. In these circumstances the charterers claimed damages for breach of contract. Held, that the total impossibility of any export of coal from the South Wales ports for a period of upwards of six months was a circumstance not contemplated by the parties which had prevented the performance of the charter according to its true intent, and that, the charterers not having been "ready and willing" to perform their obligations under the charterparty at the material times, the shipowners were justified in treating the contract as at an end.—THE PENELOPE [Lord Merrivale, P.] 597

Charterparty — Discharge of cargo — Meaning of "alongside"—Discharge on to quay and into lighters—Custom of Port of London—Respective obligations of shipowners and receivers].—The plaintiffs' steamer was chartered for the conveyance of a cargo of timber from Archangel to London, the charterparty providing, "The cargo to be brought to and taken from alongside the steamer at the charterer's risk and expense as customary." The defendants were indorsees of bills of lading which incorporated the terms of the charterparty. On arrival the plaintiffs discharged part of the cargo on to the quay and stacked it there and discharged part of it into lighters and stowed it in the lighters, and they brought this action, alleging that as the defendants did not take the cargo from alongside the steamer they (the plaintiffs) had had to incur the expense of stacking on the quay and of stowage in the lighters. The defendants pleaded that by the custom of the Port of London the shipowners were bound to bear the cost of unloading and stacking timber on the quay alongside the ship, and, in the case of overside discharge, the cost of delivery and stowage in the lighters. Held, that by the custom in question the shipowners were under an obligation to bear all costs of unloading and stacking on the quay and of delivery and stowage in the lighters, and as there was no inconsistency between the custom and the charterparty the action failed. Collision — Motion to stay proceedings].—A collision having occurred in Egyptian waters between a British steamship and a German steamship, an action in respect thereof was instituted by the owners of the British vessel in the Egyptian Courts against the German shipowners, who in due course put in bail. Subsequently the German shipowners also issued a writ in the Egyptian Courts against the British shipowners, but eventually they abandoned their proceedings in Egypt and issued their writ in the present action. On a motion by the British shipowners to set aside the writ and stay all subsequent proceedings on the ground that the action in this country was in the circumstances vexatious and oppressive, Held, that the fact that a plaintiff in the English Courts was a party, as defendant only, to proceedings elsewhere, was not a ground for depriving him of his undoubted right to sue in this country, and the motion must be refused.—THE JANERA [Hill, J.] .. 193

Collision — Tug and tow — Towage contract — Indemnity clause — Third party action].—The plaintiffs' keel, while at anchor, was damaged by collision with a lighter, which, with five other craft, was being towed by the defendants' steam tug. The collision was caused by the negligence of the defendants' servants. Proceedings were instituted by the plaintiffs against the defendant tug owners for the damage which their keel had sustained, and thereupon the defendants obtained leave to serve third party notices upon (1) the owner (who was also the master) of the lighter, and (2) the hirers of the lighter, claiming to be indemnified, under the conditions of the towage contract, in respect of any sum which they might be found liable to pay to the plaintiffs. The towage contract in question contained the following conditions :—"That on the hiring or employment of the steam tug, the master and crew thereof shall be held to become the servants of and identified with the vessel or craft being towed, and under the control of the person in charge of such vessel or craft during the performance of the contract. The steam tug owners are not responsible for the acts, neglect, or default of the masters, pilots, or crews of the steam tugs . . . or for any loss of life or injury to persons or for any damage or loss that may arise to any vessel or craft being towed, or about to be towed, or having been towed, or cargo on board of same, or any other ship or cargo . . . through collision or otherwise, whether such damage arise from or be occasioned by any accident, or by any omission, breach of duty, mismanagement, negligence, or default of the steam tug owners, or any of their servants or employees, or by any defect or imperfection in the steam tugs or their machinery or the towing gear . . . whether such defect or imperfection is in existence before or at the commencement of the towage or arises during or after the performance thereof . . . and the owners or persons interested in the vessels or craft so being towed, or about to be towed, or having been towed, or the cargo on board of the same, shall and do undertake to bear, satisfy and indemnify the steam tug owners against all liability for the above mentioned matters and against all costs and charges in respect of any law expenses or actions that may arise or be brought against the said tug owners in relation to any such loss or damage, actual or alleged." The hirers of the lighter, with whom the Court found that the towage contract had been made, contended, inter alia, that the towage conditions as worded were so ambiguous as to be inapplicable where a tug was towing more than one vessel or craft at the same time, e.g., the master and crew of the tug could not be held to become the servants of and identified with all the vessels being towed, and under the control of the persons in charge of all such vessels ; and that the words "or persons interested in the vessels or craft so being towed" were not sufficiently clear and unambiguous to cover hirers of such vessels. Held, without deciding whether the whole of the phraseology used in the towage conditions was applicable in cases where a tug was towing more than one vessel, that the hirers of the lighter, as "persons interested" in the vessels being towed, had clearly undertaken to indemnify the tug owners in respect of the matter in question, and judgment must be given against them, with costs. Held, further, that under the towage contract the tug owners were entitled to recover from the hirers of the lighter their costs as between solicitor and client of defending the collision action from the date on which the hirers were joined as third parties.—THE RIVERMAN [Hill, J.] 140

Collision — War or marine risk — Meaning of "warlike operation"].—A steamer belonging to the claimants was requisitioned by the British Government during the War on the terms of a charterparty by which the Government undertook responsibility for loss of the vessel owing to a warlike operation, while the claimants remained responsible for loss by ordinary marine risks. In May, 1918, the claimants' vessel was in a convoy and was carrying from the United States to France steel billets for making shells, but the bulk of her cargo consisted of cereals for the French civilian population. Owing to a defect in her steering gear she collided with an American vessel, which was also in the convoy and was carrying war stores exclusively and was admittedly engaged in a warlike operation. The result of the collision was that the claimants' vessel sank. There was no negligence on the part of either vessel. The Government refused to pay for the loss on the ground that it had not been caused by a warlike operation. In an arbitration it was found by the arbitrator that the claimants' vessel was not engaged in a warlike operation. Held (Greer, L.J., dissenting), that as the question whether the claimants' vessel was engaged in a warlike operation was concluded by the finding of the arbitrator, and as the collision was caused by her sudden departure from her proper course, the American vessel being merely the instrument and not the cause of the loss, the loss was not caused by a warlike operation, and the British Government was not liable. Decision of Wright, J. (44 The Times L.R., 567), affirmed.—CLAN LINE STEAMERS, LIMITED v. BOARD OF TRADE [C.A.] 784

Collision — War or marine risk — Meaning of "warlike operation."].—During the War a steamer belonging to the appellants was requisitioned by the Shipping Controller under a charterparty providing that the Crown should be liable for all consequences of warlike operations but that the owners were to bear the marine risks. After the Armistice the steamer, when still under requisition, was on a voyage with a mercantile cargo of oats and collided at night with another steamer which had been requisitioned by the United States Government and which was taking mines back to America, probably in the belief that they were no longer required for the purposes of the War. The collision was caused by the negligent navigation of both steamers, and the appellants' steamer was off hire for 99 days as the result of the damage which she suffered. An arbitration took place and the arbitrator found that the collision was a consequence of warlike operations and that therefore the Crown was liable to compensate the appellants. Held, (1) that there was evidence on which the arbitrator could find that the steamer requisitioned by the United States Government was at the time of the collision performing a warlike operation, and (2) that the fact that the negligent navigation of the appellants' steamer contributed equally to the loss did not relieve the Crown from liability; and therefore the arbitrator's award must be affirmed.—Decision of Rowlatt, J. (44 The Times L.R., 344) reversed.—HAIN STEAMSHIP COMPANY, LIMITED v. BOARD OF TRADE [C.A.] 624

Damage by ship to electric cable in docks —Absence of negligence—Whether shipowners "answerable" to dock undertakers—Harbours, Docks, and Piers Clauses Act, 1847 (10 and 11 Vict., c. 27), s. 74—Pilotage Act, 1913 (2 and 3 Geo. V., c. 31), s. 15].—The defendants' steamship, while proceeding from one of the plaintiffs' docks to another, through a communication channel, fouled with her anchor and did damage to certain cables owned by the plaintiffs and used for electric lighting and power in the docks. The plaintiffs alleged negligence on the part of the defendants or their servants, but by an amendment of their pleadings also alleged that the damage complained of was damage done by a vessel to a dock or works connected therewith, and that in any event the shipowners were answerable therefor to the plaintiffs, as undertakers of the said dock or works, by reason of s. 74 of the Harbours, Docks, and Piers Clauses Act, 1847, as amended by s. 15 of the Pilotage Act, 1913. Section 74 of the Act of 1847 provides :—

"The owner of every vessel or float of timber shall be answerable to the undertakers for any damage done by such vessel or float of timber, or by any person employed about the same, to the harbour, dock, or pier, or the quays or works connected therewith; and the master or person having the charge of such vessel or float of timber through whose wilful act or negligence any such damage is done shall also be liable to make good the same; and the undertaker may detain any such vessel or float of timber until sufficient security has been given for the amount of damage done by the same: provided always, that nothing herein contained shall extend to impose any liability for any such damage upon the owner of any vessel where such vessel shall at the time when such damage is caused be in charge of a duly licensed pilot, whom such owner or master is bound by law to employ and put his vessel in charge of." The Pilotage Act, 1913, by s. 15, abolished the defence of compulsory pilotage and in effect repealed the proviso to s. 74 of the Act of 1847. Held (Viscount Dunedin and Lord Phillimore dissenting), that under s. 74 the plaintiffs did not require to prove negligence, but had only to show that the action which led to the damage was action attributable to human agency, and therefore that although negligence had not been proved the plaintiffs were entitled to recover. *River Wear Commissioners v. Damage caused by anchor — Obstruction in fairway of navigable river—Duty to buoy or mark anchor].—Persons who drop an anchor in a navigable river, where at a certain state of the tide it will form an obstruction in the fairway, owe a duty to warn other persons navigating up and down the said river of the presence of the obstruction, by buoying or otherwise marking the same, and if they fail in that duty they render themselves liable for any damage resulting therefrom.—THE HARKAWAY [Bateson, J.] 649

Damage to cargo — Bill of lading incorporating the Sea Carriage of Goods Act, 1924 (Australian statute)—Neglect or default in management of the ship—Surrender of statutory immunity].—Cargo, consisting of bales of opossum skins, was shipped at the port of Sydney, New South Wales, under bills of lading which, pursuant to s. 6 of the Australian Commonwealth Sea Carriage of Goods Act, 1924, contained the following :—"Paramount Clause.—This bill of lading is to be read and construed as if every clause therein contained which is rendered illegal or null and void by the Sea Carriage of Goods Act, 1924, had never been inserted therein or had been cancelled and eliminated therefrom prior to the execution thereof, and is issued subject to all the terms and provisions of and to all the exemptions from liability in such Act." By Art. IV., Rule 2, of the Schedule to the above Act, "Neither the carrier nor the ship shall be responsible for loss or damage arising or resulting from (a) act, neglect or default of the master, mariner, pilot, or the servants of the carrier in the navigation or in the management of the ship . . ." During the voyage a seaman, by using an iron rod for the purpose of clearing an obstruction in a lead pipe, which carried off waste water from the crew's wash-house to the ship's side, pierced or cracked the pipe, with the result that water leaked into the ship's strong-room and did damage to the opossum skins which were stored therein. Held, that the act of clearing the pipe of an obstruction was the management of an essential part of the crew's accommodation and therefore of the ship ; that the use of an iron rod with such force as to pierce or crack the pipe was negligence on the part of the seaman ; and that therefore the damage to the cargo was due to neglect in the management of the ship for which the carrier was exempt from liability. By Article V. of the schedule, "A carrier shall be at liberty to surrender in whole or in part all or any of his rights and immunities or to increase any of his responsibilities under the Rules contained in any of these Articles, provided such surrender or increase shall be embodied in the bill of lading issued to the shipper . . ." Inasmuch as the bills of lading expressly stated that "the carriers are not to be responsible for faults or errors of navigation," but no mention was made therein of responsibility for faults of management, it was contended by the cargo-owners that the carrier had impliedly surrendered the immunity in respect of faults of management. Held, that the surrender of a statutory immunity must be clearly stated and was not to be inferred from the needless repetition of another immunity.—THE TOURAINE [Hill, J.] 204

Practice — Collision — Bail given to avoid arrest of ship—Additional bail demanded after judgment—Arrest of ship—Warrant of arrest set aside—Effect of giving bail].—The defendants in an action in rem for damage by collision gave bail in an amount specified by the plaintiffs in order to avoid the arrest of their ship. After judgment had been delivered in the action, pronouncing the defendants' ship alone to blame, the plaintiffs, who in the meantime had dry-docked their vessel and discovered further damage, demanded additional bail and arrested the defendants' ship. The defendants gave the additional bail under protest and moved to set aside the warrant of arrest. Held, that the effect of giving bail was to extinguish the plaintiffs' maritime lien and to release the defendants' ship altogether in that action, and the warrant of arrest must, therefore, be set aside.—THE POINT BREEZE [Bateson, J.] 390

Practice — Collision — Taxation of costs —R.S.C., Order LXV., r. 27 (29)].—A collision between the plaintiffs' barge and the defendants' steamship resulted in damage to the barge and the death of one of her crew. At the inquest on the deceased bargeman the owners of both vessels were represented. Subsequently the plaintiffs issued a writ claiming the damage occasioned by the collision, but after a final order had been made against them to file their preliminary act they discontinued their action. Liability for the collision mainly turned on the question whether the barge was exhibiting a proper light. Therefore, before the discontinuance of the plaintiffs' action the defendants' solicitors had incurred costs in taking statements from independent witnesses, in paying those witnesses for their time and trouble in coming to give their statements, and in attending before the coroner. On taxation the Assistant Registrar disallowed these items of the defendants' costs, on the ground that it was a well-settled principle of taxation that a party was only entitled as against his opponent to incur such costs or expenses as would enable him to conduct his case at the stage which the proceedings had reached, and not to incur expenses in anticipation of matters which, as events turned out, never arose. On appeal to the Judge in Chambers, Held, that a solicitor, in incurring costs, had to have regard not only to the ultimate trial of the action but to the necessity of being in a position to give proper advice to his clients and to place adequate instructions before counsel to settle the preliminary act, by which, in an Admiralty action, a party was bound ; that the costs and expenses in question had been reasonably incurred within the meaning of Order LXV., r. 27 (29), of the Rules of the Supreme Court, and the matter must go back to the Registry.—THE CHANNEL QUEEN [Bateson, J.] 505

Salvage — Contract — Breach — Damages — Foreign judgment — Obtention by fraud — Injunction against enforcement].—The plaintiffs' steamer stranded in the Black Sea, and the defendant L., who was a British subject, agreed to try to salve her on the terms (inter alia) that security for payment of his remuneration should be arranged in London and that he would not arrest the ship unless there was an attempt to remove her before the security had been given. Security was given in London in accordance with the salvage contract, and the ship was refloated and taken to Constantinople for temporary repairs. Before she was ready to leave, the defendant L. brought an action against the master in the Turkish Court on the ground that the ship was about to be removed without security having been given. By order of the Turkish Court the ship was arrested, and, as the master had no evidence of what had been done in London and L. took an oath that security had not been given, the Turkish Court awarded L. £23,890. L. then disposed of the ship, and the plaintiffs brought this action, (1) for damages for breach of contract, (2) for a declaration that the Turkish judgment was invalid, and (3) for an injunction to prevent the Turkish judgment from being enforced. Held, that the plaintiffs were entitled to damages including the value of the ship, and were not liable to be sued in England on the Turkish judgment; and that as the judgment had been obtained by a British subject by fraud there must be an injunction restraining the enforcement of it in any part of the world. Shipping casualty — Court of inquiry in British Possession — Shipmaster censured—Appeal—Allowance of appeal—Costs—Shipping Casualties and Appeals and Re-hearings Rules, 1923, r. 20 (i)].—In allowing an appeal by a shipmaster from the finding of a Court of Inquiry at Singapore that he had been guilty of negligence causing the stranding of his ship the Divisional Court refused to make an order against the Board of Trade for the costs of the appeal but granted to the appellant an order against the Board for the costs of a previous argument of the question whether he had a right of appeal.—THE ROYAL STAR [Div. Shipping casualty — Court of inquiry in British Possession—Shipmaster censured—Rehearing—Right of appeal—Merchant Shipping Act, 1894 (57 and 58 Vict., c. 60), ss. 475, 478—Merchant Shipping Act, 1906 (6 Edw. VII., c. 48), s. 66].—A Court of Inquiry at Singapore, Straits Settlements, which sat to investigate the stranding of the London steamship Royal Star on some unidentified submerged object between Sumatra and the mainland, found the master of the vessel guilty of negligence and censured him, but declared that it did not deem it necessary to deal with his certificate. The shipmaster applied to the Board of Trade for a rehearing, which was refused. On appeal, Held, that whether or not a shipmaster whose certificate had been neither cancelled nor suspended had a right of appeal under ss. 475 and 478 of the Merchant Shipping Act of 1894, the matter was put beyond doubt by s. 66 of the Merchant Shipping Act of 1906, which was passed in order to enlarge the right of appeal; that the appellant, as a person who, having an interest in the investigation or inquiry, had appeared at the hearing and was affected by the decision of the Court, was entitled under s. 66 to appeal in the same manner and subject to the same conditions in and subject to which a shipmaster might appeal under ss. 475 and 478 of the Act of 1894 against the cancelling or suspension of his certificate.—THE ROYAL STAR [Div. Ct.] 163

TITHES—City of London—Rate prescribed by statute—Exemption from prescribed rate—Premises for which less paid before Act—Onus of proof—37 Henry VIII., c. 12].—By the Act 37 Henry VIII., c. 12, and a decree made in pursuance of it in the same year and having the force of a statute, the lessees of houses and all other hereditaments (with certain immaterial exceptions), situated in the City of London, are liable to pay a tithe of 2s. 9d. for every rent of 20s. by the year, "and so above the rent of 20s. by the year . . . by the rate aforesaid." The decree contained a proviso that in the case of premises in respect of which less sums had been accustomed to be paid for tithes before 1545, the date of the Act, the tithes should be paid only at the accustomed rate. In an action by the owners of tithes against the occupiers of premises in the City for tithe at the rate prescribed by the statute, Held, that the onus was on the defendants to prove that the tithe paid before 1545 in respect of the premises was less than the sum prescribed by the statute, and (Lord Atkin dissenting) that they had not discharged that onus, and the action succeeded. Appeal from decision of the Court of Appeal (43 The Times L.R., 367; [1927] 2 Ch., 33) allowed.—BUSBY AND ANOTHER v. AVGHERINO AND OTHERS [H.L.] 551

TREATY OF PEACE — Debt incurred before outbreak of war—Austrian creditor—Action by creditor incompetent — Treaty of Peace Order, Art. 1 (X) (ee)].—The defendant, a Norwegian subject, living in England, incurred a debt to the plaintiffs, an Austrian company, before the outbreak of war. After the Treaty of Peace the plaintiffs sued the defendant for the amount. The Judge in chambers made an order striking out the claim, on the ground that the only right to sue for the debt was in the Administrator of Austrian Property. Held, that as the Treaty of Peace Order made the debt payable to the Administrator and transferred to him all the rights of the creditors the plaintiffs had no right to bring the action. TRESPASS—Building contractor—Demolition of party wall—Limited licence by adjoining owner—Undertaking to make good damage to adjoining premises—Debris dropped on adjoining premises—Omission to clear away debris after completion of demolition operations—Duty to new occupier—Continuing trespass].—In March, 1926, the defendants carried out demolition work on premises adjoining other premises (described here as X) under a limited licence given by the owner of premises X. One of the conditions of the licence was that the defendants should make good all damage done to the premises X by reason of the demolition operations. In the course of these operations, the defendants allowed debris to drop on an inaccessible part of the roof of premises X and did not remove all the debris therefrom when the demolition work was completed. In July, 1926, the plaintiff became the occupier of premises X under a lease and carried on business there as a ladies' blouse and robe maker. In September, 1926, a heavy storm of rain washed the debris, which had been left by the defendants on the roof of premises X in the previous March, into the gutters on the roof, and a gulley was choked and the basement of premises X was flooded and some ladies' gowns which the plaintiff kept there were damaged. In an action by the plaintiff claiming damages for the defendants' negligence Mr. Justice Salter gave judgment for the plaintiff, holding that the act of the defendants in not removing the debris was an act of continuing negligence for which they were liable to the plaintiff. Held, that there could be no negligence as there was no duty on the part of the defendants towards the plaintiff, but that the act of the defendants in leaving the debris where they left it after the completion of the demolition work was a continuing trespass which gave the plaintiff a right of action.—KONSKIER v. B. GOODMAN, LIMITED [C.A.] 91

VENDOR AND PURCHASER—Contract for sale of land—Memorandum in writing—Auctioneer's signature—Law of Property Act, 1925 (15 Geo. V., c. 20), s. 40].—At an auction a freehold house was knocked down to the defendant as the highest bidder, but he afterwards refused to sign the contract because one of the conditions of sale required the purchaser to pay certain road-making charges. On the same day the auctioneer, as soon as he was informed of the defendant's refusal, signed the contract as the defendant's agent. Held, that since in the circumstances the auctioneer's signature could fairly be said to be part of the transaction of sale there was a memorandum in writing sufficient to satisfy s. 40 of the Law of Property Act, 1925.—CHANEY v. MACLOW [Maugham, J.] 700

Deposit — Work to be done by vendor — Extension of time — Work not completed — Rescission — Recovery of deposit—When time of the essence of the contract].—The plaintiff contracted to purchase from the defendant a lease of a house and garage, and paid a deposit of £50, and a further sum of £50 on account of a premium of £150, on October 28 and 29, 1926, respectively. The plaintiff, as the defendant knew, intended to use the premises for the business of a garage proprietor, and the defendant agreed to clear away the hedge and trees in front of the house before the time for completion, which was originally fixed as "on or about December 6, 1926," but was subsequently extended to December 15. On December 10, it being apparent that the defendant could not do the work he had undertaken by December 15, the plaintiff rescinded the contract and claimed the return of the money. Held, that in the circumstances time was of the essence of the contract, and the plaintiff was entitled to recover the money.—BERNARD v. WILLIAMS [Div. Ct.] 437

Lessees' option of purchase—Destruction of premises by fire — Subsequent exercise of option—Refusal of lessor to reinstate premises—Repudiation of contract by lessees—Claim to specific performance].—The defendant demised to the plaintiffs for three years a piece of land with a factory on it, and the plaintiffs were to keep the inside of the factory in repair. The agreement said nothing as to the repair of the outside and as to insurance, but gave the plaintiffs an option of purchase during the term. The defendant insured the factory against fire, and, on the occurrence of a fire which almost completely destroyed it, he received compensation from the insurance company. The plaintiffs then gave notice of the exercise of their option of purchase and paid a deposit, but the defendant declined to reinstate the walls and roof and alleged that in exercising the option the plaintiffs had to take the property as it was. In an action for a declaration that in these circumstances the plaintiffs were not bound to proceed with the purchase the defendant counterclaimed for specific performance. Held, that since at the date of the exercise of the option the plaintiffs, to the knowledge of the defendant, thought that he was going to re-erect the factory, the parties were never ad idem and the plaintiffs were entitled to a return of their deposit and the counterclaim for specific performance failed. WATER—Supply—Premises consisting of two unconnected floors—Whether each floor a separate house—One communication pipe—Failure of one occupier to pay water rate—Cutting off water from both floors—South Shields Water Act, 1921 (11 and 12 Geo. V., c. xlvii.), s. 36].—By s. 36 of the South Shields Water Act, 1921, "The company shall not be bound to supply more than one house by means of the same communication pipe and they may if they think fit require that a separate pipe be laid from the main into each house supplied by them with water." Certain premises in South Shields consisted of a building of two floors wholly unconnected and let to separate occupiers, who had the common use of a yard with a washhouse and other conveniences. A single pipe brought water into the premises. Held, that as the common user of the yard was essential for the reasonable enjoyment of the premises they were not separate houses for the purposes of the section, and the water company was not entitled to cut off the supply to both floors if the occupier of either floor failed to pay his water rate.—SUNDERLAND AND SOUTH SHIELDS WATER COMPANY v. HILTON AND OTHERS [Wright, J.] .. 402

WEIGHTS AND MEASURES—False or unjust weight—Charge against principal—Actual offender—Right of principal to bring before the Court—Weights and Measures Act, 1878 (41 and 42 Vict., c. 49), s. 25—Sale of Food (Weights and Measures) Act, 1926 (16 and 17 Geo. V., c. 63), ss. 12 (5), 15 (1)].—By s. 12 (5) of the Sale of Food (Weights and Measures) Act, 1926, "Where an employer or principal is charged with an offence against this Act, he shall be entitled on information duly laid by him, and on giving not less than three days' notice of his intention to the prosecution, to have any other person whom he charges as the actual offender brought before the Court at the time appointed for hearing the charge, and, if after the commission of the offence has been proved, the employer or principal proves to the satisfaction of the Court that he had used due diligence to enforce the execution of this Act, and that the said other person had committed the offence in question without his consent, connivance or wilful default, the said other person shall be summarily convicted of the offence and the employer or principal shall be exempt from any penalty. . . ." Held, that as s. 15 (1) of the above Act provides that it is to be construed as one with the Weights and Measures Acts, 1878 to 1926, a defendant who is charged under s. 25 of the Act of 1878 with having a false or unjust weight for the sale of food may adopt the procedure provided for by s. 12 (5) of the Act of 1926.—HART v. HUDSON BROS., LIMITED [Div. Ct.] 820

WILL — Annuity — Super-tax—Annuity free of super-tax up to certain sum — Additional income of annuitant—Amount of super-tax payable by the trustees].—By his will a testator bequeathed to his wife an annuity of such a sum as, after allowing for income-tax at the highest rate for the time being and for super-tax, would yield her, free of all such tax, a cumulative net yearly sum of £3,500, and directed that there should be no apportionment of super-tax between the annuity and the rest of his wife's income, but that the whole of the super-tax payable by his wife up to but not exceeding super-tax on £3,500 a year, with the income-tax thereon added to it, should be attributed to the annuity and paid by his trustees. Held, that the trustees were not liable to repay to the annuitant out of residue a sum arrived at on the footing that the annuity was to bear the highest rates of super-tax payable on the annuitant's total income, but were liable for no more than what would be payable on a super-taxable sum of £3,500 with the income-tax added thereto—namely, at the present rate of income-tax, £4,200. With the present exemption, from super-tax, of the first £2,000 of the income the trustees

Construction — Devise of dwelling-house to life tenant — Direction to keep "in good repair and condition (reasonable wear and tear excepted)"—Failure by tenant for life to counteract natural decay—Liability].—Where in an instrument creating a tenancy for life or for years there is an obligation on the tenant to keep the premises "in good repair and condition (reasonable wear and tear excepted)," dilapidations do not come within the exception unless it is shown that they were caused by normal human use or normal action of the elements and also that they are reasonable in amount, having regard to the terms of the contract to keep the premises in good condition and to the other circumstances of the case. The exception does not mean that a tenant is not bound to do such repairs as may be required to prevent a defect originally proceeding from reasonable wear and tear from producing other results which such wear and tear would not directly produce. Where, therefore, a tenant for life under a will containing the above obligation and exception, during a residence in a dwelling-house which lasted for 42 years, while doing nothing actively to injure the premises, omitted almost entirely to repair it and did very little to counteract the natural process of decay, Held, that she was not protected by the exception but that her executors after her death were liable in damages to the trustees of the will creating her tenancy for life.—HASKELL V. MARLOW [Div. Ct.] 171

Legacy—Secret trust—Parol evidence—Admissibility — Acceptance of trust — Validity].—A testator made a codicil bequeathing £12,000 to five of his friends upon trust "for the purposes indicated" by him to them. One of the five friends prepared the codicil, upon the testator's oral instructions, and on the same day made a note of the terms of the trust in a written memorandum; those terms were communicated to all the other trustees and they accepted the trust. The testator's residuary legatees contended that parol evidence could not be given to explain the trust, as this was in fact an infringement of the provisions of the Wills Act, 1837, by which all testamentary documents must be in writing. Eve, J., held that by the decision in In re Fleetwood—Sidgreaves v. Brewer (15 Ch.D., 594) such evidence was admissible, and that the trust was valid. Held, on appeal, that the decision upon that particular point in In re Fleetwood (supra) had been affirmed by the Court of Appeal in In re Huxtable—Huxtable v. Crawfurd ([1902] 2 Ch., 793). The evidence was therefore admissible and the appeal failed.—IN RE BLACKWELL—BLACKWELL V. BLACKWELL [C.A.] 521

Mutual wills by husband and wife — Whether evidence of an agreement to constitute equitable interests].—The mere fact that two wills have been made simultaneously by husband and wife in identical terms does not of necessity imply any agreement beyond an agreement so to make them, and is no evidence of an agreement that after the death of one spouse the other will not revoke his or her will.—GRAY AND OTHERS V. PERPETUAL TRUSTEE COMPANY, LIMITED, AND ANOTHER. [P.C.] 654

Rule against perpetuities — "Period of restriction"—Validity].—A testator by his will, which was made in 1921, left his residuary estate to trustees to pay the income to certain of his issue during "the period ending at the expiration of 20 years from the day of the death of the last survivor of all the lineal descendants of her late Majesty Queen Victoria who should be living at his death." After the expiration of that period the capital was to be distributable. The testator died in 1926. Held, that as it would not be impracticable to obtain legal testimony so as to ascertain the period when the capital would become distributable the limitation was good.—IN RE VILLAR—PUBLIC TRUSTEE V.
